SONNET TO MY PIANO.

BY C. P. CRANCH.

Surely there is a soul within these strings,
So deeply thrills my own, when 'mid thy chords,
Moving with eager hands, my whole frame rings
With inner music, far transcending words.
As after absence long I open thee,
Dear friend, and late here linger at thy side,
To conjure up thy hidden harmony,
A boundless joy runs through me, as a tide
Filling the sandy channels and low shores
Left by the ebb of feelings that depart,
And the dull slime of tame monotonous hours.
Thy dear delicious voice, Harp of my heart,
Hath won me back to thoughts of noble height,
And wrapped me in a reverie of delight.

Jenny Lind's Devotion to her Art.

The prime donne of the opera are seldom great musicians. Many of them have been well trained in the use of the vocal organs, and in the style and spirit of their peculiar line of singing; they know their oft-repeated rôles by heart and what life to infuse into them; but to most of the immortal creations of musical genius they are utter strangers. They have had no deep, broad musical culture. The Swedish songstress, however, is an exception. No one knew the full measure of her power, and wherein she was greater than all others, until he knew her wide range of studies and her many-sided intimacy with all the styles and masters of her Art. She is a musician as well as a singer; with her whole soul she has studied Music, in all its noblest illustrations, as well as the mere art of giving effect to a certain limited range of operatic parts.

BENEDICT, who has been of late in Naples, preparing for the press a book of travels in America, of which he has contributed some chapters to La France Musicale, ascribes the secret of her triumphs to the fact "that the great singer makes a conscience of her Art." We translate what follows:

"The child, brought up and fashioned in the school of adversity, and finding in music all the consolations which a cruel destiny had refused to her; the young girl, who, thanks to the care of her excellent masters and friends, Berg and Lindblad, learned in good season to identify herself with the masterpieces of the great composers; and finally JENNY LIND, at the apogee of her glory, shunning the world and society, and knowing, loving, dreaming nothing but her Art, had certainly some powerful elements of success.

"It would not be easy, in our time, to meet any cantatrice whomsoever, who could play and sing to you from memory, from the first note to the last, the Armida of Gluck, the Chateau de Montenero of Dalayrac, the Vestale of Spontini, the Deux Journées of Cherubini, the operas of Mozart, Weber and Meyerbeer, the oratorios of Handel and Haydn, all the melodies of Mendelssohn, of Franz Schubert, of Schumann, the Mazurkas and Etudes of Chopin, without counting a very extensive dramatic repertoire, comprising the scores of Rossini, Donizetti, Bellini, Verdi.

"It would perhaps be yet more difficult to name an artiste, who could appreciate and comprehend these great schools, become penetrated with their genius, preserve their local colors, and appropriate to herself their styles. It would be almost impossible to find a musicienne, who could at sight decipher the most difficult pieces, retain melodies of an irregular and unusual rhythm, and repeat them, after several days, as if she had created them herself. Mdlle. Lind unites these precious qualities. But this is not all. The grand thing, I repeat it, is that she makes a conscience of her art; that in the smallest city of Germany or of America, she will put the same zeal, the same verve into the execution of the airs she may have selected, or the rôles she may have undertaken, that she would if she were making her debut in the Salle Ventadour, in her Majesty's Theatre, or in Tripler Hall; that she never concerns herself about what is said by critics, friends, enemies, or the public in general, but thinks of her art, and of her art only.

"Detached from what surrounds her, abandoning herself entirely to her inspiration, she impresses on the music that she sings, a stamp of originality, that is irresistible. With an inexorable rigor towards herself, she punishes the slightest imperfection, which she thinks she has discovered in her execution, by a redoubled, tripled labor. But then, when by sufficient trials she has enriched her repertoire with a new piece; when in the plenitude of her means she gives free scope to the resources of her genius so rich and various, who can remain cold and insensible? The sacred flame communicates itself to her audience, a thrill runs through the seats, a profound emotion is engraved upon all countenances, and when at last the solemn silence is replaced by universal acclamations, when we try to account for the impression we have experienced, and ask why we have been seized with admiration and astonishment, the answer is: That we have heard an artist, who MAKES A CONSCIENCE OF HER ART!"

Correspondence.

[From our New York Correspondent.]

Music in New York.

The golden gates of the opera are closed—golden, that is, to all but the manager. The experiment of a democratic opera has been tried, and it has succeeded. At least on the democratic nights—when the price was fifty cents—the house was overfull. "It did not pay," the manager said. But when did managers ever say anything else?

After the quarrel in the early winter the three capital B's withdrew to Niblo's, and we had two admirable operas. SALVI, STEFFANONE and MARINI sang at the Astor Place; BADIALI, BOSIO and BETTINI at Niblo's. The latter troupe you have heard, and have doubtless made your own notes upon theirs. They filled their house nightly, here, and among the other operas, they sang Don Giovanni. The orchestra was inefficient, which is a fatal fault in an opera depending so much upon it, and the whole time was taken too fast, so that Ole Bull went one evening behind the scenes, exasperated, to protest against such murder of Mozart—nor was the opera well sung, except by Bosio. Her Zerlina is by far the best of her rôles. Nature fits her for it. She is arch and of a winning charm in action. She has a sparkling beauty, with extreme feminineness of voice and manner, and she has the ladylikeness that lurks in the gay Spanish peasant and attracted the Don.

Badiali, as Don Giovanni, was wooden and cumbrous, and indulged in unpardonable liberties with the music. To bring down the house—for one can hardly suppose ignorance of the score—he concluded both La ci darem and the Serenade with the most commonplace Italian phrases—nor had he the slightest trace of the irresistible gentleman, which imagination demands in the character. Sanquirico's Leporello is broad buffoonery, sometimes pushed quite beyond patience.

But with every defect it was still pleasant to hear. Music so sweet and rare enchants the eye and the ear. The puppets move upon the stage, but the fair and stately figures of the music throng imagination with their magical and pensive play. As if the music expressed only the sad undertone of life, it flows seriously on, while all the bubbles of evanescent gayety in the plot, break and gleam along its surface. Thus where Leporello is discovered, what is more pathetic than the musical movement? or where before was a minuet made a love-tale teeming with passion?

They sang also Maria di Rohan at Niblo's. In this, Bosio was good, because there were no foregone conclusions about the character, as there are in Lucrezia and Lucia. The heroine is an injured and passionate Italian woman, and that Bosio could represent. But the imperial Lucrezia or the lyrical Lucia are too distinctively attired in imagination to admit any other than a certain style of figure. It is a great defect of the Italian opera, that it persists in selecting historical images, which are already pronounced in the world of fact, and cannot be recreated, except absurdly as in Verdi's Macbeto, in the realm of music. When Charles Lamb said that the scene of Wycherly's and Congreve's dramas lies beyond the pale of conscience, he made one of his most delicate criticisms. In the same way it is, that the world of opera lies beyond that of fact. If you regard an opera as a scene of actual life set to music, it is unmitigatedly ludicrous.

The music of Maria di Rohan is poor enough. It is surprising that artists can hold it in their memories, there seems such want of melody or method. I by no means share the enthusiasm for Badiali. He has a fine baritone voice, and sings well. But his performance is to me like an academic picture, unimpeachably correct and uninteresting. As an actor, he has the gentlemanliness of tranquility, but he is a mere Beneventano when it comes to high passion. Roaring and slashing and hair tearing are effective, but they require profound discrimination. Only an artist of the very highest genius can tear his hair properly.

Against all this we have had Robert le Diable and La Gazza Ladra as the novelties at Astor Place, and to "interpret" them, Steffanone, Salvi, and Marini—

"Was willst Du mehr?"

Steffanone is incomparably the finest lyrical artist we have recently had in America. She is whimsical and uncertain and indolent, and she is always better than she does. There is that fine consciousness of reserved strength in the impression she makes, which is the certificate of genius. I did not see her Norma, which is so warmly described by those who did. But as Alice, in Robert, she was most successful. She was all the simple country girl, safe and strong in her simplicity, and in the very last scene, when she defies Bertram and waves him back, she struck a higher note of the genuine lyrical drama than I have ever seen in America, and which is rarely surpassed in Europe. Whenever Steffanone played, we were sure of our evening. Perhaps she would be out of humor, uninterested, not great in performance, that evening; but it would not be the result of incapacity. We should not be obliged to sit and listen, and while the straining artist was displaying every possible resource of skill and force, be excusing her to ourselves, and saying deprecatingly: "She is doing as well as she can;" that is a kind of doing, which exhausts the listener through his sympathy, almost as much as it does the singer.

In La Gazza Ladra, Steffanone, in her whole movement and method, constantly reminded me of Alboni. They have both a fair embonpoint—both the same easy, loitering movement upon the stage—the same careless indifference—the same exquisite ease in singing, as if the voice were perpetually melodising in the lungs, like streams gurgling beyond hearing, which upon opening the coral gates, will leap and gush in an uncontrolled current.

One evening Steffanone had a little grudge against her old friend Marini, and seriously impaired the effect of the delicious trio. It was amusing to watch her, so like a great pouting girl, who knew she could spoil the scene, and would do it—and did do it; but sang the rest of the opera all the better for it.

Salvi is past his prime. I do not mean vocally, alone, for I doubt if he ever had much more voice than he has had for the last three years, during which he has been heard in New York. But his physique is unequal to the parts he has undertaken. The one drawback to his singing, is the sense of effort. The quality of voice is sweet and sympathetic, and the cultivation quite unsurpassed; but you perceive the manner too clearly. I say that Salvi could hardly have ever had more voice than now, for with such quality and cultivation he must needs have taken higher rank among distinguished tenors. But he secures to the listener the same pleasure in hearing that Steffanone does. You are sure that what is done will be first-rate, and not second-rate.

I am gossiping beyond all limits. But, although I cannot steal enough of your space to say what should be said of the Philharmonic concerts and Eisfeldt's soirées, I must squeeze in a word of ANNA THILLON, who is now singing Auber's operas at Niblo's. If you go to hear moving music, and to be touched with genius or feeling, you will be sadly disappointed. Madame Thillon's beauty and singing and general impression are as cold and unsympathetic as frost-work. It is all artificiality. Every movement, tone, and look, is painfully elaborated by a very commonplace standard. We have no feeling for the woman, no hearty sympathy with her singing, and no permanent emotion from the performance.

But with all that, it is thoroughly French. It is an evening at the Opera Comique to hear her in Auber's rôles. Your employment is Parisian employment. Instead of light you have sparkle, instead of bloom you have paint, instead of grace you have conventional posing. But if you go to hear Madame Thillon, you must not go as to Grisi or to Bosio or Steffanone. It is a ball at the Chateau rouge. Colored lamps—pretty women—spangled dresses—a musical whirl—that is all. Quarrel with it, if you please. I enjoy it.

No—I will not undertake the Philharmonic, at this point of my paper. Be assured that the concerts of this Society are the first in America, and that they are securely based now upon the appreciation of those who intelligently enjoy—of those, I mean, to whom music is not a tickling sensation, but a genuine delight, like the happily married thought and cadence of a great poem. Eisfeldt's soirées are of the same character, and attract a similar audience. In the security of the best music so perfectly performed,

Calm as a Summer's morning, we Can all the Madame Thillons see,

nor fear that the meretricious French fascination

(which is yet, however, fascination) will destroy either our opportunities or our satisfactions in the noblest music.

The Boston Music Hall.

Dear Mr. Editor:—

As a large number of those, who will have the first look at the first issue of your new journal, are interested as stockholders or patrons of art, or both, in the new Music Hall now in process of erection, I make no hesitation in offering you a short history of the enterprise.

You yourself will remember the occasion on which the multifarious projects and plans of a few of us, (so long entertained with hopes growing fainter) finally found expression in a distinct proposal. It was at the annual supper of our little "Harvard Musical Association," Jan. 1851. The new child was born into a genial atmosphere, though the season was mid-winter, and was embraced with a sympathy as generous as it was unanimous. They "of little faith" have since hinted that the ardor of the first embrace smothered the bantling—but they knew not the depth nor the cunning of the maternal instinct!

A committee was drafted on the spot to report a location—with a general plan, estimates, &c.—at an early day. Their action was prompt and vigorous. Within four weeks a meeting of the Society was called to hear the Report. Six localities were presented, with full descriptions, price of land, advantages, and drawbacks, &c. &c. Four were at once rejected on various grounds; the remaining two (the Bumstead estate, and the Apthorp estate, on Tremont, in the rear of Boylston street) were briefly discussed. The former was, however, unanimously adopted, and a new committee charged with obtaining subscriptions and forming an Association, with a view to incorporation. "The baby" had now left off swaddling clothes, and was launched into a somewhat colder climate, and had she been delicate, would probably have succumbed under the successive chills she encountered. But she now exhibited a high degree of vitality and health (traceable, we think, to the circumstances attending her birth and baptism) destined soon to result in an excellent constitution. Triumphant over all obstacles, she at length found favor with the public, money came forward most liberally, and an act of incorporation was obtained; the ground-plans were decided on, the foundations were contracted for and commenced late last autumn, and are now nearly finished, and the building will go steadily and rapidly forward to completion.

The entrances will be very commodious, the Association having recently purchased from Mr. William Phillips a strip of the estate next adjoining their premises on the north-west, and giving them a superb entrance to their west corridor, at the foot of Bumstead place, of about twenty-five feet in width.

Description:—The Music Hall is to be 130 feet long, 78 wide, and 65 high. The lower floor level, and 78 feet square. The orchestra rises from one extremity, and at the opposite, rises a wall supporting an upper floor, or end gallery. At the back of this rises another wall, supporting a second floor, and, from the ends of these, two balconies are carried along the sides of the Hall, projecting 8 feet 6 inches from the walls. The front stage of the orchestra rises 4 feet from the floor, and, from this level, continues rising rear-ward in successive platforms to the extremity of the Hall in that direction, the upper platform being on a level with the lower balcony. The whole orchestra is 30 feet deep and 63 long, and is so connected with the lower balcony that a portion of the latter might, if required, be easily connected with it and occupied by choral singers. The walls of the Hall have a series of piers which support the balconies, and which are formed, above the upper one, into Corinthian pilasters supporting the cornice of the wall and coving of the ceiling. This coving is circular and is groined; semi-circular lights are placed in the walls under the groins, and ventilators in the ceilings of the same. The Hall will be lighted at night by a series of gas-jets along the top of the cornice, which, being placed under the ventilators, will perform the ventilation as well as the illumination of the Hall. Corridors are carried, on the level of the floors and balconies, all around the building, communicating with the Hall by doors in the side walls at intervals of not more than 15 feet. It is estimated that nearly 3,000 persons can be comfortably accommodated in this Hall—none of whom will be so placed that they cannot both hear and see the orchestra, or easily leave the Hall by some adjacent door leading into the corridors.

The drawings for the contractors are now finished and the estimates going on. In a few weeks the architect will also have completed a set of drawings, showing the design of the interior as it will appear when finished.

We will give notice in this Journal where these drawings may be seen by the public. E.

The Drama.—Mrs. Mowatt.

This accomplished lady, extensively known both as an actress and an authoress, has but lately concluded an engagement at the Howard Atheneum. Although she suffered from a severe cold during most of the time, she never, in many important respects, acted better. Some of her finer tones, it is true, were clouded by hoarseness, and on a few evenings her voice was seriously affected; but generally she never exhibited greater vigor and refinement in the conception of her parts, and felicity in their representation. In the play of Ingomar, she appeared in a character wholly new, and one demanding more than ordinary subtlety of sentiment, and she succeeded in popularizing it. Her Armand, Marianne, Juliana, Juliet, were as beautiful as ever, and improved in ease and energy of movement and gesture.

Rosalind and Ion, however, seemed to us her masterpieces. The clear, lark-like merriment of Rosalind was given with inimitable sweetness and grace; and Ion, as an ideal embodiment of moral beauty, we never saw exceeded. It was the thought of the poet taking form and movement before the eye, and it evinced a power and a refinement of imagination rarely witnessed on the stage.

We understand that Mrs. Mowatt is recovering slowly from the severe accident she lately met with, though she will probably not be able to act for some weeks. X.

THE DUSSELDORF GALLERY. We are happy to learn that this most interesting collection of German paintings, which for several years has been a favorite resort of all lovers of Art in New York, will in a few weeks be exhibited in Boston.

ARY SCHEFFER'S "DEAD CHRIST" is again exposed for sale at our friend Cotton's, in Tremont Row. It cost originally $4,000, and was drawn as a prize in the International Art Union by a gentleman in Providence, who had no place for it, and can well afford to offer it at the present very low price.

New Publications.

The Piano Forte Sonatas of BEETHOVEN, a complete Edition. O. Ditson, 115 Washington St., Boston.

This publication, when completed, will form the most valuable contribution, that could possibly be made, to the studies of our young pianists, as well as to the libraries of all true lovers of classical music. Beethoven's Sonatas are the noblest compositions in their kind, the noblest music ever written for the instrument. They are more than thirty in number. Masterly in style, they are at the same time monuments, each in a distinct and characteristic way, of that great tone-poet's purest inspiration. Many of them are in every cultivated home in Germany as familiar as the plays of Shakspeare here; and several, like the "Sonata Pathétique," the "Moon Light" Sonata, in C sharp minor, &c. &c. are becoming indispensable to any character for musical taste and culture even here. Mr. Ditson is supplying a correct, cheap, elegant edition of them all; and the manner in which he is enabled to do it by the lively demand for such things, tells well for the progress of a serious musical interest among us. About half of the Sonatas are already issued.

CZERNY'S Method for the Piano Forte. Published by Oliver Ditson.

There is no need of recommending CZERNY, as a writer of finger exercises and illustrations for the young student of the piano. No man has had the same amount of this kind of experience, or has produced so much in this line. And his Method enjoys an almost universal popularity. He has only been objected to as too voluminous. The present reprint contains three-fourths of the original, which is in three large volumes, and the retrenchments consist wholly in reducing his five or six illustrations of some given points to three or four. Rules and scales and passages are all along well interspersed with examples, or short and attractive pieces.

PERGOLESE'S Stabat Mater. Complete, or in Seven separate Numbers. Words, Latin and English, a new translation, by J. S. DWIGHT. pp. 35. G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row, Boston.

A work world-famous, and yet little known among our cultivators of great sacred music. Without a rival in its kind, it ought to be as familiar among our choirs and amateurs, to say the least, as Rossini's brilliant composition of the same name and words. Rossini's has all the modern effects of the full choir and orchestra, and although grand and beautiful in parts, smacks always of the worldly, epicurean tone of the genius of modern Italian opera. PERGOLESE died a quarter of a century before HANDEL, at the early age of twenty-five. He had shown a genius for the buffo species, some quaint traces of which appear possibly in some of the strains of this remarkable sacred composition. But its pervading style and color are profoundly religious, beautiful and unique. Though written only for one or two voices, (partly soli, and partly, as in some easy fugue portions, for a choir of two parts,) with a mere quintette accompaniment, (here reduced to the piano,) it is full of musical ideas, whose interest seems inexhaustible. No two can practice it without getting more and more enamored with its spiritual beauty. To most of us, with our musical habits, it seems newer than the newest forms of genius of our own day. We would have given much to have heard some strains of it from the Italians, Bosio, &c., in one of their so-called sacred concerts.

The English version is an attempt, (so far as we know, for the first time,) to preserve almost literally the sense of the Latin rhymes, in English at the same time somewhat singable, and married to the music. But perfect success in a thing of this kind is of course impossible; for what English equivalent is there for that succession of long quantities in the first line: Sta-bat ma-ter do-lo-ro-sa?

Scena and Prayer from Der Freyschutz, by C. M. VON WEBER. pp. 11. Geo. P. Reed & Co.

Every note of the Freyschutz has a mysterious charm that never quits its hold. This scena, where Agatha sings at her window, by moonlight, looking out over the forest, in expectation of her lover, for whom she offers up a prayer, then bursts into a strain of rapture at the sound of his footsteps, yet fear still alternating with joy, was one of the most effective and transporting pieces in the concert repertoire of Jenny Lind. It is at least no harder than the florid Italian cavatinas, in which so many waste their voices and their patience, and it repays long study by a real soul satisfaction.

This is a beautiful edition, with words German, English and Italian.

We have a great assortment of new works on hand for notice, for which we have no room now.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 10, 1852.

Introductory.

We here present, some days in advance of date, the first number of a new weekly Journal of Music and the Fine Arts; which we take the liberty of sending, as a specimen, to some thousands of persons, who may be interested in the discussion of these subjects. And yet it hardly can be called a specimen; since in a single number there is barely room to indicate, still less to treat, all sides and points of our design. Besides, it is a first number, a first attempt amid much hurry and distraction, to produce a rough sketch which may serve to give some notion of what we hope to do more perfectly as we become more at home in the outward limitations and conditions of our work.

This time, the accidents of starting have had a large share in the composition and shaping of the number. Our news is necessarily not of the newest; and then the best that we could do was to place one musical region in the foreground and foreshorten all the rest, including Germany, "the land of real music," which another time must occupy the front space and the largest. Our review of our own concert season is diffused over too much ground to amount to much more than a brief, dry abstract. Our Correspondence is scarcely organized. Our best articles and essays, among which we number some choice contributions, have had to yield place for the present to lighter and shorter things; but they will keep. Our talk of other Arts, besides the Tone-Art (as the Germans call it) is a mere intimation that we mean to talk about them, and that we invite sincere communications thereon from the lovers and connoisseurs in each of their departments. Of Sacred Music, as such, and of that formidable business in our land, music-teaching, we have this time not a word; but will not those texts claim their full share of us, as the annual Pentacost of psalm-book makers and Conventions comes round? Take this, then, as a sample only of the outward "form and pressure" of our journalism, of our good printer's clever way of making us "presentable," and for the rest turn to our Prospectus on the first page.

Our columns overflow, and we could barely save ourselves this little space for the unfolding of the motives and the spirit of our undertaking. Without being in any sense a thoroughly educated musician, either in theory or practice, we have found ourselves, as long as we could remember, full of the appeal which this most mystical and yet most human Art, (so perfectly intelligible to feeling, if not to the understanding,) has never ceased to make to us. From childhood, there was an intense interest and charm to us in all things musical; the rudest instrument and most hacknied player thereof seemed invested with a certain halo, and saving grace, as it were, from a higher, purer and more genial atmosphere than this of our cold, selfish, humdrum world. We could not sport with this, and throw it down like common recreations. It spoke a serious language to us, and seemed to challenge study of its strange important meanings, like some central oracle of oldest and still newest wisdom. And this at a time, when the actual world of music lay in the main remote from us, shooting only now and then some stray vibrations over into this western hemisphere. We felt that Music must have some most intimate connection with the social destiny of Man; and that, if we but knew it, it concerns us all.

A few years have passed, and now this is a general feeling. Music is a feature in the earnest life and culture of advanced American society. It enters into all our schemes of education. It has taken the initiative, as the popular Art par excellence, in gradually attempering this whole people to the sentiment of Art. And whoever reflects upon it, must regard it as a most important saving influence in this rapid expansion of our democratic life. Art, and especially Music, is a true conservative element, in which Liberty and Order are both fully typed and made beautifully perfect in each other. A free people must be rhythmically educated in the whole tone and temper of their daily life; must be taught the instinct of rhythm and harmony in all things, in order to be fit for freedom. And it is encouraging, amid so many dark and wild signs of the times, that this artistic sentiment is beginning to ally itself with our progressive energies and make our homes too beautiful for ruthless change.

Our motive, then, for publishing a Musical Journal lies in the fact that Music has made such rapid progress here within the last fifteen, and even the last ten years. Boston has been without such a paper, and Boston has its thousands of young people, who go regularly to hear all good performances of the best classic models in this art. Its rudiments are taught in all our schools. The daughters of not the wealthy only pursue it into the higher branches; and music teachers count up well amid the other industrial categories. Think of fifteen hundred people, listening every week to orchestral rehearsals of the great symphonies and overtures! Think of those August "Conventions," when thousands from all parts of the country spend whole weeks together in lessons and rehearsals of great Choral and Oratorio music! Think how familiarly and how exactingly we talk of the opera singers, before whom our early admirations have entirely vanished! Think of the ovations of the LIND, and our whole nation's homage paid to Art, the moment that it came to us incarnated for once in so pure a living form!

All this requires an organ, a regular bulletin of progress; something to represent the movement, and at the same time help to guide it to the true end. Very confused, crude, heterogeneous is this sudden musical activity in a young, utilitarian people. A thousand specious fashions too successfully dispute the place of true Art in the favor of each little public. It needs a faithful, severe, friendly voice to point out steadfastly the models of the True, the ever Beautiful, the Divine.

We dare not promise to be all this; but what we promise is, at least an honest report, week by week, of what we hear and feel and in our poor way understand of this great world of Music, together with what we receive through the ears and feeling and understanding of others, whom we trust; with every side-light from the other Arts.

The tone of our criticisms will, we hope, be found impartial, independent, catholic, conciliatory; aloof from personal cliques and feuds; cordial to all good things, but not too eager to chime in with any powerful private interest of publisher, professor, concert giver, manager, &c. This paper would make itself the "Organ" of no school or class, but simply an organ of what we have called the musical movement in this country; of the growing love of deep and genuine music. It will insist much on the claims of "Classical" music, and point out its beauties and its meanings;—not with a pedantic partiality, but because the enduring needs so often to be held up in contrast with the ephemeral. But it will also aim to recognize what good there is in styles more simple, popular, or modern; will give him who is Italian in his tastes an equal hearing with him who is German; and will print the articles of those opposed to the partialities or the opinions of the editor, provided they be written briefly, in good temper and to the point.

Music in Boston.

The season past affords texts for a volume of commentary, had one the time and space. It marks a period in our musical growth. No previous winter has been rich with one-third of its amount of presentations of the highest forms of Art. Evening concerts and afternoon rehearsals (for the word "rehearsal" has become almost synonymous with concert by daylight), have been thronged, the winter through, by eager listeners to the orchestral symphonies and overtures of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Gade; to Handel's and Mendelssohn's sublime oratorios; to choice Chamber Music; to the miscellaneous feasts of virtuosos coming and going; to our own finished cantatrice, BISCACCANTI, who returned a second time from European studies, more than redeeming every promise, a refined artist now in higher senses of the word; to our young debutante, who has just sailed abroad, exciting hopes at least as high; to the classic and the modern piano-forte interpretations of musical, mercurial ALFRED JAELL, who seems at once German and Italian, of the North and of the South, a mere child of impulse and a thoughtful man. All this came ushered in most nobly, with the austere commanding beauty, and yet sparkling sunshiny humanity, of that last series of the LIND concerts, in the Melodeon, where the volume of the singer's voice and soul told as in no other hall; and where the singer, who is most queen with an orchestra, was queen enough without, giving us in each admirably chosen programme specimens from all her varied and in fact universal range of song; where too the lover, since become world-famous, then the modest young pianist, told by the fervor and the true and delicate adaptation of his accompaniments, how blissfully he lost himself, without care for the world's applause, in that o'ershadowing beauty, of womanhood and Art, in which just then his life was hidden. That made November genial. With our rough, moody March came, for a brief finale of the season, the Italian songsters, the BOSIO-BETTINI-BADIALI troupe, to give us a touch of their warm South.

Making all this hay "while the sun shone" involved rather an excessive absorption of the music-lovers in concerts for the time being, and the reaction had to follow. We have now been for two or three mortal weeks left in a refreshing and almost unbroken repose from musical excitements.

To enter into any critical or detailed review of such a wide and crowded field, is here, of course, impossible. Yet let us allude in turn, in a quite general way, to each of the principal sources of our enjoyment.

The Musical Fund Society.

We place this first, because it is the largest combination of our best resident instrumentists, united on a permanent basis, devoted mainly to the high forms of the Symphony, Concerto and classic Overture, having also in its constitution an element of charity, or rather of mutual guaranty against the often cruel fortune of musicians. The dignity and true artistic tone of the profession is naturally at heart in such a confraternity; and every one, who is interested in good music and in the interpreters thereof, must feel sincere joy in every stage of their success.

Numbering some sixty instruments, with due preponderance of the string family, this orchestra possesses the means of presenting, in their full proportions, the gigantic symphonies of Beethoven and others. A band much larger would rather fall into the modern "monster" category. The string department has been excellent; but there has been continual complaint of want of unity, of precision, of true intonation, of musical quality of tone, &c. &c., in many of the wind instruments; and this, if we are rightly informed, is partly owing to the fact that some of the members, who are skilled in the use of one instrument, are here set to playing others, with which they are less perfectly familiar; and partly to the fact, that the various instruments have not been regulated primarily and exclusively to the sphere of this orchestra, but have been drawn from various minor orchestras and bands, acquiring, as it were, their local temperaments and habits. The evil, we believe, is understood, and will no doubt ere long be remedied, when we shall have an orchestra that may be compared with the Philharmonic orchestra in New York.

The Fund Society have labored under two other disadvantages. First, to seat a paying audience, they have been driven to the very unmusical and uninviting hall of Tremont Temple. May our new hall be ready for them in the autumn!—Secondly, owing to the multifarious private occupations of the members, they have had but one rehearsal in a week, and that a public one, in the presence of 1,500 to 1,800 auditors! In fact, an afternoon concert. Now these public rehearsals are most excellent things for the public, and we would not on any account have them discontinued. They are an invaluable stimulus and education to the higher musical taste of hundreds of young men and women, of whole families. Through them, a generation is here growing up in the love and knowledge of the noblest compositions. The general cause of music cannot dispense with them. But there is an obvious restraint upon the freedom and dry, wholesome discipline of a rehearsal, in the presence of all these witnesses. We trust that by some means the Society will contrive to secure hours both for private and for public rehearsals.

Looking over the programmes of the six subscription concerts, now completed, (together with the extra, Benefit Concert, under the direction of the Lady Associates, to which we may allude hereafter,) we can feel proud of the amount of good music that has been presented. Of symphonies, we have had the Eroica, the C minor, and the number 7, in A, (decidedly the three grandest) of BEETHOVEN; the third, in A minor (Recollections of Scotland), and the fourth (posthumous, Italian,) of MENDELSSOHN; the great "Jupiter," with four-fold fugue, of MOZART; and the No. 11 of HAYDN. Of overtures: MOZART's to Zauberflöte and to Clemenza di Tito; BEETHOVEN's to Leonora; BERLIOZ's to "Waverly"; a concert overture, by GADE; and several of the lighter modern schools. One night there was a fugue of BACH upon the organ, creditable in intention, but sadly misplaced. With these the usual lighter varieties were intersprinkled, which we need not particularize. But we must allude to the piano Concerto of Mendelssohn, played by ALFRED JAEHL, and to the fine vocal contributions of BISCACCANTI and of Mrs. BOSTWICK; can we add also witching ANNA THILLON, who spoiled the fugue?

The afternoon rehearsals have afforded a still richer repertoire of symphonies and overtures. We are happy to learn that the Society contemplate giving a series of very cheap afternoon concerts, through the Spring, the music to be in about equal proportions of light and solid, so as to combine both ends of instruction and amusement.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

Dear especially and justly to the lovers of good classic music is this fraternity of five young artists. To them we owe our sphere of periodical communion with the great German masters in their most select and genial moods; for in his Chamber compositions each embodied, or at least outlined, a portion of his best, of his most characteristic. This little Club was first drawn together by the love of these fine creations, and now for several winters has interpreted them to an audience select and more and more appreciative, the appetite "still growing with what it fed upon," till now such music has come to be counted an indispensable item in the annual supplies of not a few.

No Society has ever given us such series of good programmes. The staple of all their bills has been genuine, solid Quatuors and Quintettes. Think how much of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Mendelssohn,—of the masters, who used to seem so far off, unapproachable to us novices in music—they have this winter opened to us in their eight subscription Chamber Concerts! Of HAYDN—"father Haydn"—they have given us one regular Quartette, besides the whole seven of his Quartette arrangements of the "Seven last Words on the Cross." Of MOZART, one Quartette and three Quintettes; one of them with clarinet, a work in his loveliest and sweetest vein, which was performed on two evenings. Of BEETHOVEN—"deeper and deeper still"—three Quartettes and three Quintettes, including the immortal Adagio with variations. Of MENDELSSOHN, two Quartettes and two Quintettes, one posthumous (op. 87 in B flat). To these add a brilliant, and boldly elaborated Quintette by V. LACHNER, a Trio by WEBER for piano, flute and 'cello, a Trio by MENDELSSOHN, with the pianist JAEHL to magnetize the whole into life; besides excellent songs and solos.

Besides their concerts, the Club have also given upon Monday afternoons public rehearsals in Cochrane Hall, in which the same classic pieces, and many more, have been repeatedly tried over. These for many persons have formed the most attractive hours of all the week; for here was good guaranty of an audience in earnest about the matter, really learning to know and love some of the best specimens of each great master's works.

In these Quintette concerts, we have watched the development of what is much the truest sign of musical taste in any public, albeit a small public. And that is, an increasing regard for the quality of the music; of the composition, rather than for mere skill and grace in the performance thereof. We have learned to be exacting in our programmes, and count all skill as idle, save as applied to the interpretation of works full of intrinsic interest and meaning. We thank the Club for taking this ground, and cultivating it so steadily.

In point of execution they have continually gained, not only in that unity and precision which long practice gives, but also in the higher respects of sentiment and style, showing the refining, spiritual influence upon themselves of the high music with which they have been holding conversation. And yet we must not let partiality carry us too far. These artists still fall short of the ideal of quartette and quintette playing. There is often a roughness of tone, a rudeness of attack in forte passages, making you feel that physical energy is a weak substitute for the electric fire of inspiration. Sometimes (not uniformly, we can truly say) a fine work has been too mechanically rendered, without light and shade, without any of that consentaneous ad libitum, to which true musical feeling can trust itself, and which is described as a characteristic of the piano-playing of Mozart, Beethoven and all great masters. We have thought they seemed sometimes to rely too much on simple downright attack, and upon carrying point after point of the music by sheer executive energy, instead of reproducing it from their feeling. The too ready applause of a half-cultivated audience is partly answerable for this. Our friends can and will, we doubt not, learn to surmount this fault entirely, as they have already done in special instances more than once.

One word more, since now is the time for it. We earnestly trust that the Messrs. FRIES, RZHA, RYAN and LEHMANN will not abandon the high ground they have taken, from any dismay at a momentary fluctuation in their outward success. Recent rehearsals, the programme of that last "extra" concert, together with paragraphs in newspapers congratulating us that the Club were henceforth to "play more miscellaneous music," have been ominous. There is but one ground on which such a Society can stand and outlive temporary discouragements, and that is the ground of almost strict adherence to classic chamber compositions, in their original forms. Mr. Ryan's arrangements of things like the "Invitation to the Dauce," movements of piano-forte sonatas, &c., are certainly clever and creditable to him; but such things are never as satisfactory as the originals to hear, and they crowd out of the programme too many genuine works, which it seems due to our musical culture that we should have every chance to hear. Classic music is the peculiar field of this little Club; if they enter other fields, the weakness of a mere quintette enables them but poorly to compete with popular orchestras and bands.

We could not object, however, to the introduction of that "Musical Joke" of Mozart into the last concert. It was well to hear a specimen of that facile, happy humor, which formed so large an element in the inspired boy's composition. We could thus form some conception of the fine mirth of his friends, to whom he extemporized such things continually. Besides, the piece has a historical value. It bears date Vienna, 1787, the very year in which he wrote "Don Juan;" and after the failure of the Viennese to appreciate that great work, we can imagine him with some gusto consoling himself by a burlesque on the reigning styles of composition. Perhaps more of this anon.

The Germania Musical Society.

The growing taste for pure instrumental music, at so many points in our wide country, has been greatly indebted for the last three or four years to the flying visits of this model abridgment of an orchestra. Though hardly twenty-four in number, these young artists have diffused among our people something nearer than we have before had, to a true idea of German music, both in its popular and in its classic forms. They have been to us in fact a live and genuine specimen of musical Germany, traveling about in the midst of us, and at each point again and again renewing the vibration from that vital heart and centre of the tone-sphere.

The advantages of such a band are these:

1. It is well selected in the first place. All its members are artists, men well suited to each other, men in every fibre of their being as it were acclimated and attuned to the artistic sphere of music; each endowed with a fine musical temperament, and imbued from boyhood with the spirit of the great German masters; accustomed to an orchestral atmosphere, instead of to that of mere military and dance music; several of them indeed persons of general culture, reading and society.

2. They have possessed, first in Herr LENSCHOW, and latterly in Herr BERGMANN, a conductor of the true stamp; one, who not only feels and understands the music, but who by a sort of natural eloquence of look and gesture expresses the force of each musical idea as it is coming, keeps before the music, visibly anticipating each effect, and so possessing all his orchestra with the same feeling in safe season for the attack. It helps even the musical enjoyment and understanding of the audience, to watch such a conductor's baton.

3. Having no other occupation, and pledged to one another, traveling and stopping together every where, they can keep in perfect practice, in ever fresh familiarity with their large and varied repertoire of music, trusting one another perfectly for a sympathetic ensemble in the rendering of every piece. Soon may the time come when our own local musicians may be able to do likewise!

On the other hand, their one disadvantage is, that they have not, (nor can their traveling life afford to have) the numbers and proportions of a grand symphonic orchestra. While their wind instruments are complete in number as they are choice in quality, their violins are very few. Hence we found it good policy to sit near, in order to hear them well; for to the remote auditor, the reeds and trumpets passed directly over the heads of the few violins, which in their nature could not tell so prominently; and thus in many a symphony he caught the brighter masses of coloring, while the finer outline of the musical idea, entrusted to the strings, was faintly perceptible. At the best, in forte passages, the violinists had to bear on with great energy to partly counterbalance the wind band, since even their admirably precise and pure outline was not always sufficient. Of course the disadvantage was greatest in the case of the grander class of symphonies, like the "Jupiter" of Mozart, and the C minor, the Eroica, &c., of Beethoven. Whereas, in one so light and fairy-like as Beethoven's No. 8, and in the picturesque, romantic, delicately strong overtures of Mendelssohn, they were eminently successful.

Yet it is always a pleasure and a lesson to hear this little orchestra in any kind of music. Of great symphonies, their renderings must be regarded as fine readings, or outline representations. There is no confusion, no blur, or indefiniteness about them; they show you what the composer meant; they fix each theme, each musical idea and motive clearly in the mind. We deemed it a great advantage to hear a symphony first from them, and afterwards expanded into full proportions by a larger orchestra.

In their own national waltz music (a genuine creation of the genial, rhythmic soul of Germany); in their arrangements of operatic scenes, where certain instruments take up the voice parts; and above all, in their delicately shaded accompaniments to the singer, or the concert-player, they are indeed a model, a charm unfailing.

Boston has been favored this time as the winter residence of the Germanians. A series of twenty subscription concerts, weekly afternoon rehearsals, and a multitude of occasional performances, have not at all blunted the appetite for their music, and they have made the rich voice and promise of Miss PHILLIPS, and the unrivalled piano-playing of ALFRED JAELL, as familiar as household words among us.

We have only room further to enumerate the important classical works, which they have given in their twenty concerts, to complete the sum of our rare opportunities the past winter in this line.

SYMPHONIES. Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, (Pastoral), and 8, of BEETHOVEN. The C major, with Fugue, ("Jupiter") and op. 58, in E flat, of MOZART. The No. 11, in D, of HAYDN. The fourth (posthumous) of MENDELSSOHN. The "Historica," illustrating four periods, of SPOHR; also, in the early season, his "Consecration of Tones." One by KALIOWODA, and one by GADE.

OVERTURES. BEETHOVEN's to Fidelio, to Egmont, to the Men of Prometheus, and to Coriolanus. MENDELSSOHN's to "Midsummer Night's Dream," to "Fingal's Cave" (Hebriden), to Heimkehr aus der Fremde (Return from abroad), the one called "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage" (Meeres-Stille), to Ruy Blas, to "The fair Melusina." WEBER's, to Oberon and Freyschutz.

MOZART's, to Don Juan and Zauberflöte. GADE's "Echoes from Ossian." SPOHR's, to Jessonda. A strange one by ROBT. SCHUMANN, with Scherzo and Finale. MEYERBEER's, to Robert, to the "Huguenots," and to Struensee. Several by ROSSINI, and other lighter kinds.

PIANO-FORTE CONCERTOS. One by BEETHOVEN and two by MENDELSSOHN, played by A. JAELL. To these add parts of the Symphony Cantata: "Song of Praise," by the latter composer; and finally the entire orchestral music (not the entire vocal, as was promised) of the "Midsummer Night's Dream," exquisitely accompanying the indifferent reading of Miss KIMBERLY.

Of the lighter varieties we need not speak, except to say that we thought they added rather too much lightness towards the end of the season. The music-lovers of our sister towns and cities also got their share of the "Germanians" during the winter, and we doubt not they will be warmly welcomed back another season.

Of our two Oratorio Societies, we have left ourselves no room this time to speak, nor of the Italian Opera; but read what "Hafiz" sings us thereof in New York.

Foreign Musical Intelligence.

Paris.

The gay city has kept all its musical fountains playing, in spite of the reign of terror. The four opera houses seem to have been in full activity and thronged; and numerous have been the lyric dramas, serious and comic, classical and light, which, since the new year came in, have had an airing and a hearing—some for the hundredth, some for the first time. But all sink into the shade before two: Rossini's William Tell, at the Grand Opera, and Beethoven's Fidelio at the Theatre Italien.

The former was given in superb style;—perhaps a little too superb, for, says the Gazette Musicale: "The placard announced a chorus of two hundred voices for the finale of the second act. Such things produce an immense effect . . . on a placard; but in concert-halls and theatres it has long been known by experience that all force, beyond what is just enough, is lost, and that thirty good chorists are better than two hundred," &c. The singers were M. GUEYMARD for the tenor, in the part of Arnold, who seems to have not badly filled the place of the great DUPREZ; MORELLI, who "sustained his reputation" in the part of Tell; OBIN, "a good and brave" Walter; ARMES, "a little timid in the fisherman," and Madam LABORDE, known whilome of Bostonians, in Matilda. The "Prince President assisted" at the first performance! Imagine him face to face with the real live Tell.

The France Musicale goes into rhapsodies about this opera. For instance: "Eternal poetry is this of thine, O master! Guillaume Tell will survive the tomb, survive the ages. Like the Iliad, that grand and inimitable poem of Homer, shall your inspired work serve as a model. Musicians, present and to come, will respect it and admire it. The theatrical art, the lyric drama with its emotions, melodic truth, taste, form, science without tediousness, grandeur without exaggeration, pomp without noise, charm, tenderness, the love of liberty, the passion of the heart, all are there." And again: "Open this score, musicians; read it and re-read it; each page is a melody. Turn it over and over; go from the beginning to the middle, from the middle to the end, you will discover nothing in its flowery leaves but the most lovely harmonies, no thorns nor briars. The master has set his seal on this immortal work; he has signed it ROSSINI, the most glorious name in music." (!) And this when we are even now on our way over to the ITALIAN OPERA, to hear a masterpiece of quite another stamp, Fidelio!—But first we must observe that Les Huguenots and Le Prophète have also had their turns at the Grand Opera. ROSSINI and MEYERBEER:—what two truer types of the musical taste of Frenchmen! the epicurean sparkle of the one, and the wild diable and bold effect of the other;—but both strong and genuine, and far more wholesome than the Italian music since Rossini.

There have also been representations of La Favorita, the Vivandière, the Reine de Chypre, the Violon de Diable; and Le Juif Errant was in rehearsal.

THEATRE ITALIEN. Fidelio, says the Gazette, was first produced in Paris in 1830-1, by a German troupe, including Haitzinger and Schroeder-Devrient. "The effect was first surprise, and then enthusiasm. Artists, chorus, orchestra, were animated with such a verve, and borne along by such a conviction, that all resistance was impossible. . . . One had to yield to the power of the work. . . . The singers believed in Beethoven, and burned with the desire to propagate their faith. Habeneck had long had a desire to transplant Fidelio to the French lyric stage.

"But it was not to the Opera Français, but to the Opera Italien, under the direction of Lumley, that destiny reserved this bold enterprise. Fidelio making its entrée into the midst of the Ausonian repertoire, what an event! what a complete revolution! Forty years ago, when M. Berton wanted to introduce the operas of MOZART, there was almost a revolt among the Italian artists, nourished on the honey of Paisiello, Cimarosa and Guglielmi. Barilli kept repeating, of the Nozze di Figaro, that it was 'Cossack music.' And yet Mozart was an Italian by education, if not by birth! Beethoven is German, altogether German; neither the author, nor the work could possibly deny their origin.

"Lumley has shown courage in risking Fidelio upon his stage. True, SOPHIE CRUVELLI had already obtained a brilliant success in the principal rôle, in London. She has all that is needed to succeed in the impersonation of the devoted wife, braving death and saving her husband: she is German, she possesses a magnificent voice, a physiognomy full of expression. We can only praise the manner in which she sang her first aria and married her voice with that of the three horns which accompany it with their delicious embroidery. Not less beautiful, less superior was she in the other portions; we could only ask for a little more of fire, of exaltation in the scenes of the second act. We have still present to our mind and eyes the memory of Mme. DEVRIENT, who did not sing as well as she, but who, as an actress, produced a more vivid impression. We will say as much of CALZOLARI, whose voice is so pure and sweet, but who does not render all the frémissement, all the feverish and delirious emotion, which boil in the stretta of his air in the second act. BELLETTI," [our fine baritone, of LIND memory,] "acquitted himself well in the part of Pizarro, and Mlle. CORBARI in that of Marcellina, the jailor's daughter. This last rôle was entrusted to SUSINI, whose fine bass voice always fills the ear so well. The choruses showed zeal and talent.

"The orchestra played two of the overtures, which Beethoven composed for Fidelio: first, the more familiar one in E, before the rising of the curtain; the second, so grand and vigorous, in C major" [here called Leonora] "before the last part of the second act."

The writer doubts if all the audience comprehended the beauties of Fidelio at once; but "Beethoven will plead his own case and win it." It had been played four times, the interest still increasing. But "a whole season would not be too much for the understanding of such a work, so foreign to the habits of our [the Parisian] public. The Italian artists, too, need to put themselves au diapason of a music, for which they naturally have little sympathy; and that they do with every trial."

At the same theatre have been produced recently: Donizetti's L'élisir d'amore, and Verdi's Nabucco, Ernani and I Lombardi.

OPERA COMIQUE. Four buffo pieces are in vogue at this theatre; these are: le Caid, le Toreador, Bonsoir M. Pantalon, and le Tableau parlant. Mlle. MIOLAN is delicious in the first; Mme. UGALDE ravishing in the second and fourth; Mlle. LEMERCIER very amusing in the third. So says the France Musicale.

Since then, a new opera, music by GRISAR, called Le Carillonneur de Bruges (Bellringer of Bruges) has made its appearance; BERLIOZ, says the N. Y. Tribune, "praises it gently. He says of the débütante in the opera, Mlle. WERTHEIMBER, that she has that inappreciable valuable quality in her voice, truth; and what is singular for a voice of the opera comique, it is decidedly elegiac in character."

At the Opera National they have had a new buffo opera, by EUGENE DEJAZET, called "A Marriage in the Air," and much praised of the critics. In M. Dejazet, say they, "our lyric stage counts one eminent composer more."

CLASSICAL MUSIC, too, abounds in Paris. At the "Conservatoire," we read of symphonies of Mendelssohn, Mozart and Beethoven, played by an incomparable orchestra, under the prince of conductors, M. GIRARD; an andante and finale from one of Haydn's quartettes, "played by all the violins, altos and basses," (and we are told that, except for the greater volume of sound, you could shut your eyes and think there was but one instrument upon a part); songs from Weber's Euryanthe and from an opera by Gretry, sung by Mme. Laborde; and a chorus by Gluck, &c.

The following was the programme of a concert of the "St. Cecilia Society:" 1. Overture to La Vestale, by Spontini; 2. Fragments from Rosamonde, a lyric drama by Franz Schubert; 3. Symphony in C minor, by Beethoven; 4. Chorus from Blanche de Provence, by Cherubini; 5. Air varié, by Adam, sung by Mlle. Lefebvre; 6. Overture to Ruy Blas, by Mendelssohn.

A lady pianist, Mlle. MALLEVILLE, is giving chamber concerts of the choicest programmes. Here is one of them: 1. Concerto for piano, with double quatuor, by Mozart; 2. Andante and finale of sonata in C major (Beethoven); 3. Trio for piano, violin and 'cello (Beethoven); 4. Quintette in D (Mozart); 5. The "Kreutzer Sonata" of Beethoven; 6. Allegro for piano (Scarlatti); 7. Allegro of Sonata in A minor (Mozart.)

The London Athenæum (Feb. 21) says:

The Chamber Concerts in Paris, seem just now, in number, to rival those of London; and the confraternity of critics are accordingly driven to their last columns of the encyclopædia of epithet, as may be instanced by the following untranslatable praise of Mlle. Clauss, a young pianiste:

"Elle a rendues possibles les impossibilités digitigrades de Liszt dans la fantaisie sur Don Juan; et pourtant son style est plutôt lié, onctueux, intime que spectaculaire."

Mlle. CLAUSS seems to be the "bright particular star" of a whole galaxy of young pianists, male and female, who have lately shone in Paris. (We have more about her in type.)

A MUSICAL PRODIGY. The Gazette Musicale gives an account of a prodigious musical boy, named Frederic Gernsheim, aged only ten years—who is already vigorous enough as a pianist to perform the Concertos of Weber, Moscheles and Mendelssohn in public. Further, he composes in full score, is capable of improvisation, and, in short, reproduces the marvels of finger, fancy and feeling, wrought in his boyish days by the little Mozart.

ERNST, the violinist, has been giving brilliant concerts, assisted by LEOPOLD DE MEYER, who, the Parisian critics say, has improved, comes down more mercifully upon the keys, &c.—HERZ gives concerts and continues to publish in the France Musicale his very superficial souvenirs of his concert tour in America.—LISZT has published a volume upon CHOPIN.—THALBERG was said to have his face set towards America.

And we have not yet half exhausted the musical novelties of the last two months in Paris!

Italy.

It needs not many words to show what music just now reigns in Italy, seeing that it is mostly summed up in one word—VERDI. In the foreign news department of a late French musical journal, under the head of Italy, out of twenty-three paragraphs naming the operas performed in as many Italian cities, nineteen give some opera of Verdi's. He is the model and the idol; but there are plenty of younger aspirants:

—The number of new operas performed in Italy during the year 1851, amounted to 30: the majority were at Naples, Turin and Florence. With scarcely an exception, the renown of their composers has not yet penetrated across the frontiers of their native country.

England.

CHAMBER CONCERTS. Look through any recent chronicle of a musical fortnight in London, and you are in a perfect wilderness of them. Our Eisdelt's Soirées and our Mendelssohn Club are mere drops in the bucket to

it. There is a certain "settled, calm content" in listening to Quartette playing, which seems to suit the eminently domestic turn of Englishmen.

W. STERNDALÉ BENNETT (the genial composer, but too imitative pupil of MENDELSSOHN,) Mr. HALLE, Mr. NEATE, Mr. SCIPION ROUSSELOT, Mr. LINDSAY SLOPER, Mr. KJALLMARK, Mons. BILLET, Mr. J. ELLA, Mr. AGUILAR, &c., &c., are each giving his separate series of chamber concerts, with programmes of the very highest order. Bach, Handel, Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Spohr, Schumann, Schubert, Weber, and the other great names (not to mention the artists' own,) figure more or less in all of them, as authors of sonatas, trios, quartettes, quintettes, nonettes, songs, with and without words, &c.

In Manchester, too, and Liverpool, and other provincial cities we read of like things.

"Daniel: an Oratorio," by Mr. Lake, is advertised as about to be produced at Exeter Hall "early in the ensuing season," with a band and chorus of at least six hundred performers.

ST. MARTIN'S HALL. No programmes are more interesting than those of Mr. Hullah's Monthly Concerts. That for Wednesday last included Beethoven's Mass in C,—the same composer's Choral Piano Forte Fantasia,—and the second act of Weber's 'Oberon.' The first work, for which Mr. Hullah's Chorus seems to have a peculiar affection, went excellently; the difficult modulations, of which there are not a few, being given in better tune than we are accustomed to hear them given by so large a body of voices. This is surely the king of all Masses,—so picturesque, yet so devout,—so solemn, yet so interesting,—so free in form, yet so rich in scientific resources.—Athenæum.

HECTOR BERLIOZ has been summoned to London to direct a new Philharmonic Society with an orchestra hitherto unprecedented in number, for there will be at least 300 performers. It is the design of the Society to give a series of six concerts in Easter Hall, and to play the most characteristic compositions of various masters.

LOUIS RAKEMAN, the talented pianist, says the Musical World, has arrived in London for the season. [We Bostonians owe our first taste of the best modern piano forte music to this gentleman.]

EMILE PRUDENT, one of the most difficult of the new school piano forte writers, is about to settle permanently, it is said, in London.

The rival LONDON OPERAS have unrolled their programmes for the campaign of 1852. We find the following notice of the Royal Opera at Covent Garden:

The catalogue of available works includes no less than 36 operas—3 of Mozart, 1 of Beethoven, 10 of Rossini, 3 of Meyerbeer, 1 of Weber, 1 of Auber, 1 of Cimarosa, 4 of Bellini, 7 of Donizetti, 3 of Verdi, 1 of Halévy, and 1 of Gounod—all of which have already been performed. To these are added five novelties—Spohr's Faust, Weber's Oberon, Rossini's Comte Ory, Donizetti's Les Martyrs, and Pietro il Grande, a new opera destined expressly for the theatre by M. Jullien. Faust, having been composed with dialogue, required the addition of recitatives to suit the Italian stage. These have been prepared by Dr. Spohr himself, who will superintend the production of his opera.

The engagements for the present campaign include nearly all the old favorites, with sundry re-enforcements. The principal sopranis comprise Madame Grisi, Madame Viardot, Madame Castellan, and Mademoiselle Anna Zerr, with the addition of Madame Gazzaniga. The male department, in most particulars as strong as ever, is in some instances fortified by new acquisitions. The only important omission is Signor Tamburini, whose respectable name we miss from the present list of barytones. There is still, however, the inimitable Signor Ronconi, supported by the careful M. Rommi, and Signor Bartolini (cousin, we believe, of Signor Tamberlik,) a new importation, whose laurels have been won at Palermo, and more recently, at Brussels. The army of tenors is invincible. Signor Mario and Signor Tamberlik are supported by two other celebrities—Herr Ander, from Vienna, renowned as one of the best singers of Meyerbeer's music, and M. Guymard, the first tenor, and the rival of M. Roger, at the Grand Opera in Paris. Besides these, there are Signor Galvani, a new light tenor from Milan; Herr Stigelli, who made so good an impression last season; with Signors Luigi Mei and Soldi, to complete the list. The basses are scarcely less formidable. To Herr Pormes is added Signor Marini, who will be recollected as having sustained the post of primo basso profondo in 1847, 1848, and 1849, with distinguished ability. Signors Tagliafico, Polonini, Gregorio, and Rache, make up the catalogue.

Of the other Opera, Her Majesty's, we read:

Cruvelli, whose success was the great feature last year, will be prima donna this season, together with Madame Sontag and Mademoiselle Joanna Wagner, the German "star," who is said to have taken the place of Jenny Lind at Berlin. Ferlotti, known as a singer and tragic actor, and the barytone Bassini are also important among the new engagements.

Germany.

BERLIN. A brilliant court concert took place recently, directed by MEYERBEER, who had drilled his forces into perfect execution. Among the pieces given were: A quatuor from Mozart's Idomeneo; fragments of Gluck's Orpheo, sung by Mmes. Wagner and Koester; the Salut des Fleurs, trio by Curschmann; choruses from the Prophète; finale of Rossini's Comte Ory; Turkish march and chorus of dervises, from Beethoven's Ruins of Athens; Overture to Le Jeune Henri, by Mehul; with piano fantasias, &c.

Meyerbeer's "Camp of Silesia" was performed at the Court theatre, at a coronation festival. The hall was crowded. Mme. Tuczek, who sang the part of Vielka, bore away the honors of the evening.—On MOZART's birth day, Don Juan was played to perfection, to an enthusiastic audience.—Other operas have been the Prophète, Euryanthe, Fidelio, the Deux Journées (Cherubini), &c.

The symphony and Chamber Concerts have been rich as usual.

The celebrated "Dôm" or "Cathedral Choir" has been giving concerts of a rare quality, in which the oldest productions of PALESTRINA have alternated with the modern compositions. Between the vocal pieces there were sextets, septuors, &c.

The "Sing-Akademie," founded by Zelter, Goethe's friend and correspondent, has lost its director, RUNGENHAGEN. TAUBERT and NAUMANN were candidates for the place. This society has recently performed three new pieces: a Lauda Sion, by Mendelssohn; a paraphrase of Klopstock's dominical prayer, set to music by Taubert; and a solemn mass, by Naumann.

WEIMAR. LISZT is here director. ROBERT SCHUMANN has been invited to bring out his new opera, composed to Byron's Manfred; and BERLIOZ, his Benvenuto Cellini.

MADAME SONTAG is making a triumphal musical progress through Germany. She does not go to Berlin, where it is supposed the Court would not wish that one of its most distinguished ornaments a few years since, should appear upon the stage. The railway directors all over Germany despatch extra trains from the country towns to the Capital in which the Syren chances to sing, and, like Barnum, sell tickets of admission to the opera. She is now at Hamburg, where she was to play twelve nights for 150 Louis d'or, about $682 a night. The quondam Countess travels in state. She and her retinue of men servants and maid servants, and the Italian cook, occupy two four horse carriages. In Hamburg, she will decide whether to visit the United States. If she does, there can be little doubt that her success will be glowing. Sontag is an alabaster statue, with a musical box in its month.—N. Y. Tribune.

ST. PETERSBURG. The benefit of GRISI and MARIO was a regular ovation. The opera was Lucrezia Borgia. The "incomparable pair" were called on the stage no less than twenty times. After the opera, the Emperor presented Grisi with a Cashmere shawl, worth 4,000 rubles (about £800), a tiara of pearls and diamonds, and a ring of immense value.

Beethoven and his Third Symphony.

With the approach of cold weather [autumn of 1802] Beethoven's health improved, and he turned his thoughts to a work which had long floated before his imagination, and in which the world should have witness of that mighty genius, which he was conscious of possessing. This was that famous work now known as the "Heroic Symphony."

Born and educated on the Rhine, in almost the only section of Germany at that time not cursed with hereditary despotism, within the reach of French and English ideas, an ardent admirer of the Greek and Latin historians, most of whose works he possessed in translations, Beethoven had come to Vienna a firm and staunch republican. His imagination was filled with Plato's Republic, and he fondly cherished the hope and expectation that France, having cast off its burden of tyranny and oppression, would at length make real the ideal of the great philosopher. At the time Bernadotte was in Vienna as ambassador of the French Directory, Napoleon had recently returned from his famous Italian campaign and was residing in his humble house in the Rue de la Victoire, and mingling in the society of none but men of high intellectual and scientific attainments. That great ovation to him in the Luxembourg had just taken place, and this young Corsican, one year only older than Beethoven, was the foremost man of the Eastern continent.

"Napoleon was now almost adored by the republicans all over Europe, as the great champion of popular rights. The people looked to him as their friend and advocate. The brilliancy of his intellect, the purity of his morals, the stoical firmness of his self-endurance, his untiring energy, the glowing eloquence of every sentence which fell from his lips, his youth and feminine stature and his wondrous achievements, all combined to invest him with a fascination such as no mortal man ever exerted before." — J. S. C. Abbott.

It is easy to conceive with what interest Beethoven would hear of this young hero from Bernadotte, and how naturally he would come to regard him as the one destined to regenerate the civil and political institutions of Europe. Count

Moritz Lichnowsky attributed the first suggestion of a work in honor of Napoleon from the pen of Beethoven, to the French Ambassador, and in 1823, when the composer had occasion to write to that General, then king of Sweden, in relation to his great second Mass, his thoughts recurred to the period of their acquaintance, and "he distinctly recollected, that it really was Bernadotte, who awakened in him the first idea of the Sinfonia Eroica." — Schindler.

How eagerly he would follow the career of the young conqueror, as detailed in the newspapers of the day, of which he was an insatiate reader, may easily be imagined. At the close of 1802, that man, sprung from the people, like Beethoven himself, was at the head of a government somewhat similar in form to that of the old Roman Republic; his title, that of Consul, recalled recollections of its best days, and he sat in judgment above the crowned heads of Germany, dividing and disposing according to his own will.

His character in the eyes of all republicans was still unblemished; that final act, the assumption of the Imperial sceptre, had not yet unblinded them to a perception of his inordinate ambition and his utter indifference as to the means of its gratification. At all events, Beethoven at that time cherished a boundless admiration for him and likened him to the greatest of the Roman Consuls.

These remarks have been called forth by a conviction, that the ordinary interpretation of the "Heroic Symphony" is not in accordance with the train of thought and feeling, which Beethoven in this great work intended to portray. It is not a work written to commemorate Napoleon, the Emperor, and exile of St. Helena, but one suggested by the career of the conqueror of Italy, — of him who had grasped the loose reins of power and repressed with a master's hand the destructive madness of the French Democracy. The title under which it was given to the world, was an afterthought, written after the composer's opinion of Napoleon had undergone an entire change; and that the "Marcia Funebre" was not written as a requiem for the hero, appears clearly enough from a remark dropped by Beethoven, on being told that at length the exile slept the sleep that knows no waking. Alluding to the march he said, "that for this catastrophe he had composed appropriate music seventeen years before, music which fully predicted it, though unintentionally (ohne dass es seine Absicht gewesen) on his part."

Few persons can have heard this symphony for the first time and not, under the influence of the idea that it was composed "to celebrate the death of a hero," have been startled, and offended almost, by the strange contrast between the second and the succeeding movements. A writer at the time of its first public performance in Vienna said, "Unity (of design and effect) is almost entirely lost;" and among the numerous criticisms in the English as well as German musical periodicals, there are few, which do not imply the truth of this one from the "Harmonicon," on occasion of a partial performance of the Symphony: "The Sinfonia Eroica of Beethoven most properly ended with the Funeral March, omitting the other parts, which are entirely inconsistent with the avowed design of the composition." Had Beethoven given a key to this, as he has done to the Pastoral Symphony, there is no doubt that all would be found, though singular and "Beethovenish," still satisfactory. At all events, considering the circumstances attending its production, may we not view it as Beethoven's political testament and confession of faith,—a work in which he honored the French Consul more by making him the type of heroism universally, than by any labored attempt to paint the individual, as he is generally supposed to have done?

The following Argument may perhaps convey more clearly the intention of the above remarks, and relieve the mind of the reader from the disagreeable feeling caused, on hearing the Heroic Symphony, by the "entire inconsistency" of the Scherzo and Finale with the other movements.

Allegro con brio. The Hero announced and portrayed. A very long, powerful and majestic movement, built upon themes simple and bold, yet vigorous and capable of being wrought up to an inconceivable grandeur.

Marcia Funebre, adagio assai. Inexpressibly grand and affecting, a picture of the hopeless, desponding, despairing condition of the millions groaning beneath the weight of despotism—wild rage, anarchy, bloody and unsuccessful revolution,—the requiem of order and liberty.

Scherzo and Trio. One of the most original and striking of Beethoven's compositions. Those long successions of staccato, pianissimo notes—what do they mean? They whisper the tidings—for none dares speak aloud—of the Hero's advent; the news reaches, and hope and expectation pervade, all classes; the trio of horns, so delicious, what is this but the joyful hope of deliverance, which has arisen at length? And everywhere the pulse quickens, and all is in breathless expectation; and just at the close of the movement, the joy which pervades all hearts, but which has thus far been per force hidden, dissembled, finds vent and bursts forth.

Finale. The Hero comes; a short struggle; chaos, anarchy, the rule of wild passion—all give way before him; and then the jubilant chorus, swelling and dying away, ever renewed and ever more joyous and unrestrained, rings to the praise of him whose strong hand has brought liberty and order and peace.

But whatever may have actually been the train of thought, which Beethoven followed in this grand composition, it is certain that he gave himself to it with all his strength and energy. With the exception of writing a few sonatas and quartets, which were ordered by noblemen and publishers, and the preparations for a concert, he seems to have devoted himself entirely to the Symphony through the winter and the succeeding summer, which he spent in Ober Döbling, a village near the capital. Ill health and various circumstances combined to hinder its completion, until, if Schindler is correct, the year 1804 had opened before the last touches were put to it. In

May of this year, however, it was finished, and a fair copy lying on his table, on the title page of which, at the very top, was the single word "Buonaparte;" at the very bottom, "Luigi Van Beethoven."

On the 18th of May, 1804, Napoleon assumed the crown as Emperor of the French. The news soon reached Vienna. Ferdinand Ries heard it and coming to Beethoven found him and Count Moritz Lichnowsky together. Ries related what he had heard. Beethoven flew into a violent passion, and cried out, "Is he too nothing more than a common man? Now he will also trample all human rights under foot, just to serve his own ambition. He will place himself now above all others and become a tyrant!" Then going to the table he seized the Symphony, tore the title page completely in two, and threw the whole upon the floor, from which for some time he would allow no one to take it. The first page was afterwards copied and the work received its present title. Prince Lobkowitz then purchased the use of it for a few years, and the first performances of it were in his palace.

LINES WRITTEN AT SEA.

To him, who loves all Beauty,
It is a rare delight
On the ocean—in the summer,
In the magical moonlight;

On the deck of a proud vessel
That rides triumphantly,
While the golden moonfire wrinkles
A pathway o'er the sea.

Like giant sea-shells humming
Æolian harmonies,
The white sails high above him
Are rounded in the breeze;

While down their stainless whiteness
The cordage shadows flow,
Like leafless forest branches
Shadowed upon the snow:

The regal moon before him,
The northern morn behind,
And starry Cassiopeia,
And the good ship filled with wind.

And whither—say O whither
Speeds on the moonlit ship?
Westward forever, homeward
Where the stars in ocean dip.

The night has drunk the nectar
Of the moon's o'erflowing cup,
That drowns far to the eastward
The pale stars coming up.

So drinks the soul thy Beauty,
O spirit of the sea,
Till dreaming and awaking
Seem each a mystery.

And in the spirit's dreamlight
The present disappears,
And past and future mingling
Dissolve the weight of years.

A LETTER from Mayence contains the following:—"It is known that Mozart was painted twice only from the life: once by the German painter, Tischbein,—the other time by an Italian painter, Father Martini, of Bologna. Both pictures had disappeared. In recently taking an inventory of the effects of a former violinist of the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt's Chapel, the first of these pictures was found, signed with the autograph monogram of Tischbein. The immortal author of Don Giovanni appears here in a coat of French fashion, green in color, large frill, waistcoat of yellow satin, and powdered wig. Two inhabitants of Mayence—M. Arntz, Professor of Natural Philosophy, and M. Schulze, the organist—who knew Mozart personally, affirm that the portrait presents a striking likeness;—and the former adds, that the costume given is precisely that which Mozart was accustomed to wear when he played on the piano at the Court of the Elector. This portrait differs essentially from all the engraved likenesses of Mozart. Most of these were probably taken from a medal struck, in 1784, at Munich, in honor of the great musician."

CLASSIC AND OPERATIC MUSIC,

OR

The Contrapuntists and the Melodists.

[We translate the following from the German, from an admirable summary of the early history of Music, introductory to a critical estimate of the mission and achievements of MOZART.]

Read or play through an excellent theatrical score, some opera of GLUCK's for instance; take away the text and the singers, and let it be heard by amateurs, who have no idea of its previous intention; and this music, on the stage so beautiful, so speaking, so expressive, so descriptive, will say little, and in that little there will be no order nor connection to be found. And yet the composer's thoughts remain untouched; there has been no alteration in the melody nor in the chords. "But the material effect," I shall be asked; "is this to count for nothing?" I count it much; but patience; here is a Quartet by MOZART, which shall be executed by the same instrumentists. So far as execution is concerned, the forces shall be equal. But is not everything connected here and flowing from its proper motif? Do not the thoughts blend in a stream of strictest logic and of most persuasive eloquence, together with the most exalted poetry? In this music do you miss the orchestra, the singers and the drama? Does it require an interpreter? Now then, since we are agreed in this, tell me what the Quartet means? Means! yes, I feel it certainly; but how to render it in words I know not. It is not anything that can be told.

There could not be a better proof, that music has two sorts of value and of meaning: one relative, the other absolute and purely musical. This defines the contrapuntal style in general and the Fugue in particular, and so justifies its existence, as well as its claim to the title of pure music. What then is a Fugue? It is a musical proposition, which is unfolded simply or contradictorily, according as it has one or more subjects, together with the arguments, which are deduced solely from the relations of the harmony and of the counterpoint; a music, which plays in an ingenious and (so to say) abstract manner with its elements. The end of the game is the game itself, and the Fugue signifies, above all, just what it must signify in its peculiarity as Fugue. If it is good, it will be found good; require no more; you have already the sense of the work. This sense never lies in the text of the vocal fugue. The words, attached to it, are too few to help us to this sense, nor can the fugue itself derive much profit from them. They merely serve to furnish syllables to the singers. Kyrie Eleison, or Hosanna in Excelsis,—these are all the words, which the longest and most thoroughly developed fugue requires.

It may be said that the contrapuntal style, by means of analogy, re-enacts the faculties and laws of the understanding on the domain of feeling. And indeed the arrangement and studied (motivirte) sequence of musical thoughts, the beauty of the thematic development corresponds to the deductions, proofs and conclusions, which a skilful logician knows how to draw from some fruitful proposition. The combination of two or more themes, contrasted in their melodic plan and in their rhythmical movement, gives a type of the approximation of two thoughts, which seem at first to have nothing in common with each other, but out of whose unforeseen contact a design suddenly becomes perceptible, which charms by its novelty and surprises by its clearness. In short, is not the unity of subject, strictly adhered to and wisely connected with all the incidental and episodic details, alike a merit in the rhetorician and the contrapuntist?

And yet, how strange! the more a composition through analogy approaches that kind of eloquence, which is called deliberative or demonstrative, the less does the sense of the work admit of verbal commentaries. Whence comes this? It follows from the fact, that between verbal and musical logic there always lies the difference between thinking and feeling. The better a truth of abstract feeling has been analyzed and presented in the language of feeling, the less will the language of reason, or spoken words, affect this series of corollaries in notes, which prove nothing, unless they be resolved into an emotion of the heart or an enjoyment for the ears. Just so it is in another sphere, that of the pure Mathematics, in which truths in the same way elude verbal logic, and can only be given through algebraical and numerical formulas.

When we reflect upon all these properties of music, some of which penetrate so far down into those depths of the soul, that are most inaccessible to the understanding and to words, we see before all things, how much they approach the nature of the religious sentiment, and why the contrapuntal and fugued styles have been principally employed in the service of the church; the only direct application of music, in which the two significations and the two-fold values, between which we have been laboring to point out the distinction, have met and become identical. What musician has not felt the everlasting harmony of the sublime church music with the sublime act, which it accompanies? Hear those voices, rising one after the other in slow and sustained tones; they intertwine and separate like the spiral wreaths of incense rising from the censer, while, now higher and now lower, they continually echo the same complaining words. That is not the expression of a passionate grief, one of those torturing agonies of flesh and blood; but it is the holy and poetic sorrow, which announces itself in the old cathedrals; it is the utterance of our common misery at the foot of the cross, ever repeated and evermore the same. The Allegro of a jubilant fugue follows upon the Andante. Is this the reverberation of a worldly festival, the martial sound of triumph, or the announcement through thousands of the people's voices of some happy national event? Nothing of all that. This chorus expresses the solemnity of the Lord's day; it celebrates an altogether mystical feast; it sings in unison with all Christian souls, who, weary of the bustle of the world, have come to hear the hymns of the king of prophets and the concerts of the heavenly Jerusalem.

It may have been remarked, that the stumbling blocks, commonly placed between works in the contrapuntal style and the majority of hearers, frequently seem not to exist in the church music; the ignorant appear to understand it about as well as the initiated. We have already given one of the reasons of this exception; but there is another, far more universal, since it operates without distinction upon hearers of all countries and communions. There is an acoustic reason at the bottom of it.

The remarkable resonance, in buildings devoted to public worship, swells the volume of tone, rendering a multitude of details imperceptible; it in a manner simplifies the music and lends to the material effect a force, which is enough to shake the hearer, and that entirely without any assistance of the composition, supposing it to be well executed. Scarcely has the piece begun, when you surrender yourself with a shudder to that irresistible power of the accords produced by a hundred select voices, strengthened by a crowd of symphonists, through which is heard the harmonic storm of the organ roaring, making the whole sonorous building tremble. And you will say "It is God's voice." Yes, it is the voice of God, making itself heard through one of the most adorable laws of his creation.

While the harmonic effects are thus rounded off and consolidated in great masses, the ear ceases to be much perplexed by details, which would have been quite bewildering, had they been more distinctly heard. So far is this the case, that a Mass, when reduced to the simplest possible mode of execution and heard as Quartet or Quintet in a chamber, is frequently no longer recognized by the very hearer, who had been transported by it during divine service.

These remarks explain many things in the past and in the present of Music. We now know why the fugued counterpoint, which grew always more and more offensive and was gradually excluded from all profane compositions, after BACH and HANDEL found its last place of refuge in the temples; why it pleased in the church and displeased elsewhere; and why, since its re-introduction, the mass of the dilettanti have yet been able to perceive no gusto in it in the Chamber music. If in our day we see many voluntary martyrs to the contrapuntal style, who impose upon themselves the penance of hearing a Quartet worked off, it is because the title of a dilettante has become a sort of standing in the world, a card of introduction, opening many doors to one, which but for that would have remained shut against him. We are obliged to be kind and patient hearers of musicians, who play gratis. One checks himself, when the tendency to gape comes over him too heavily, and utters ever and anon the exclamations: exquisite! wonderful! divine! like the sentinel's: Who's there! to show that he is awake.

How much easier living it is, on the contrary, in the Opera, in the land of musical freedom, where the listeners recover their full natural independence! Every one is there for his money's worth; every one is sovereign judge of the satisfaction that he buys; and if the great multitude does not find this satisfaction there, then woe to the composer or the players! We have a right to abuse those, who rob us. Here the public reigns despotic, and the taste of the many from of old has been the supreme law. In the theatre there is no appeal from the decisions of the public; the sentence is executed the moment it is passed, and the condemned always have the worst of it.

The other style hardly requires the same amount of explanations. Melody is ground for everybody's feet. Whoever loves Music loves Melody, and for the human race en masse Melody makes up the whole of music. Besides, I have already in a certain manner sought to enumerate its negative properties, in endeavoring to indicate the sphere and limits of the fugued style. All that this latter cannot do, Melody, with the aid of Harmony, reduced to mere accompaniment, can do. In this simplified form, if Melody can move freely, she lends expression to all positive emotions, even to images of visible, imitated, or poetically felt phenomena; she interprets words and lends them thereby an unwonted power; in the theatre she kindles up within us all the passions, which she knows how to portray and excite; she furnishes the executive talents with the means of their triumphs; she pours out streams of rapture through the organ of a euphonious voice, or through the vibrations of an instrument, and transports a whole public into that enthusiasm, which is openly manifested on the arrival of a virtuoso of the first rank. Is it not Melody again that conjures up the dearest shadows of the past, and with a few magic notes carries you back into the times of a bliss long vanished, or spans long distances and leads the sorrowing soul into its home? Is it not she, that sustains the courage of the warrior and inspires him in the hour of battle? She, that lends fervor to our most cheerful festivals! She that leads straightway to the fountain, whereat poor humanity most commonly drinks oblivion and consolation for its sorrows; that speaks to us so gracefully of Love and makes us more susceptible thereof? It is still always Melody. And if I cannot give myself up to Love, says some one, I at least make music; and this at least marks excellently well the correspondence of these two occupations. This is what the rhetoricians call the sublime in thought.

By the side of these attributes of the harmonic-melodic style, the delights of counterpoint seem very weak and very insignificant. But all things have their compensations in this world. If Melody is an eternal principle for the rejuvenescence of Music, so too it is an ever present cause of its corruption and its death. By the case, with which it assumes all colors and accommodates itself to all forms, by its subservieny to the most moody and transient influences, Melody makes any given system of composition to appear, so far as the hearers are concerned, as either national or foreign, antiquated or new. It founds the momentary taste and it destroys it. The instability peculiar to this element of music became still greater with a superficial and almost primitive harmony, like that in the majority of the Italian operas of the eighteenth century. At first, when it held sole sway, the power of the ruling melody was so much the greater; but it soon lost its attractive energy, since it had surrendered itself with too little reserve to the wishes of the ear. Works in this style, called homophonic or (one-voiced), that is to say purely melodic, generally soon wear out; we see them in their decline follow the opposite progression from that indicated by their growing favor; the melancholy progress from indifference to satiety, and from satiety to loathing. They were loved more and more, because they were well known; and they ceased to be loved, because they were known too well. And then the music is no more than a dried up flower, which has outlived its colors and its fragrance, a noble wine, which has lost its fine aroma.

This mournful type, and yet too true, of our enjoyments gives the true measure for both styles of music, viewed from their opposition and their equipoise, since they both have a for and an against. The enjoyments, which Melody creates, are incomparably more lively; those of Counterpoint on the contrary far more enduring. The former are had gratis, the latter must be purchased by labor and study, like the pleasures of the mind which they represent in music, so far as it is possible to represent them in that. In the analogies of the melodic style we find again all the expression and emotional power of speech, the passions with their joys and sorrows. Counterpoint occupies the opposite psychological domain; its serious expressions do not harmonize much with sensuality; they touch the Infinite on all sides; they address ineffable words to the soul; they talk with it the exalted language of Poesy, which flashes from the vaulted firmament in characters of fire; and the thought readily suggests itself, that, had the stars an audible as they have a visible voice, the mathematical laws, having become euphonious, would spread abroad the combinations of the Fugue; and that the harmony of the spheres would then be a song of innumerable themes, as many as there are separate, and yet united worlds, to sing the praise of the Father of all worlds.

A Reminiscence of Bosio.

And, first; of the "bright, particular star," Signora Bosio, or "My lady Beaux-yeux," as some New Yorker wittily and aptly hath it. For, those dark, speaking eyes, at once innocent and arch, are full of soft light and beauty as a gazelle's. The lustrous, massive, jet black hair reminds you of Milton's "smoothing the raven down of darkness till it smiled." The face, small-featured, pure-complexioned, beaming with intelligence, and chauging with the quick and subtle play of feeling; the light and slender figure, at once lady-like and fairy-like, graceful, harmonious, spirituel in every motion; combine with a rare dramatic talent, and a voice fine, pure, penetrating, flexible, and of a most vital quality in all its tones (it is a high soprano,) to make a prima donna such as we Americans have not before heard on the stage. The refinement of the woman and the versatility of the actress are equalled by the thorough vocal schooling of the artist. Her vocalization is faultless, her execution remarkable for ease and finish. Her economy of her voice is indeed consummate; in itself it seems but a fine, silvery thread of melody; yet, without overstraining, it is always ready for the most trying passages, and, as if by a spiritual reserved energy, it tells in the strongest and most impassioned bursts. Bosio is evidently a musician, and not, like many a prima donna, a clever singer by rote, with a dramatic turn. You feel entire reliance, therefore, on her artistic acquirement, as well as on her judgment and her feeling. All this completes and justifies the charm she exercises through certain of the higher and transcendent qualities of genius. She possesses the rare gift of imagination. You feel it in the versatility which enables her, like Madame Bishop, to enter into the very spirit and individuality of so great a range of characters, impersonating each to the life, be it a Zerlina, or a Lady Macbeth, or a Lucy of Lammemoor. We first saw and heard her, quite unprepared for what we were to witness, in the Macbeth of VERDI, and what was our delight and astonishment to recognize, in that slight and delicate woman, the real spiritual conception of Shakspeare's terrible heroine, as we had never done in any more masculine actress of the spoken drama! In her Luzcrezia Borgia, it was the same sort of power, — rendered the more interesting from the contrast of the demoniacally strong and wicked character with the delicately-strung instrument that represented it. It was a spiritual creation; it seemed like magnetism; where the flesh seemed weak, the will was superhuman, and the visible weakness measured the invisible energy. As mere musical art, too, nothing could have been more complete and harmonious; it would have satisfied the composer. Again, in another sphere of tragedy, — the sentimental and pathetic, — nothing on our stage has ever equalled her Lucia. Here it was not the harmony of contrast, but of identity, between the assumed and the real person. The native delicacy and slight form of the actress, were just what was wanted. The maidenly, sweet, mournful music of the character was embodied both to eye and ear. When it came to the mad scene, which had been a failure and a maudlin exhibition with most of the operatic Lucias, she rose to a pure height of art and genuine pathos. It was beautiful and real; there was method, music, in the madness; the sweet delirium was without drivelling and over action. Here again you felt the spiritual element, the true poetic imagination; it was like enchantment; it had the strange fascination of a fine thing dreamed, but vanishing at the rude touch of most attempts at representation. And now, hear her in MOZART'S dear little peasant bride, Zerlina! Here the innocent, arch eyes are set in just the right head, and their timid, wandering, gazelle-like gaze is just in place. It would have drawn tears out of MOZART'S eyes, to have seen and heard so perfect an impersonation of this little pet character of his. A nature of the utmost refinement, in peasant life and garb; — just what the music of the part indicates it to be; just that did Bosio represent and sing. And how exquisitely sweet and true and expressive was her singing of that music! It was the express ideal, the audible soul and vibration of the insinuating, pleading Batti, batti, changed to rapture with the success it felt quite sure of, and of that purest outpouring of the tranquil ecstasy of love in Vedrai Carino. Hear Bosio sing them, and you will know why these two simple melodies are immortal. And here we recognize in her another test of a true artist. Unlike Italian singers generally, she can subordinate herself entirely to the music, and find her highest artistic pride and happiness in the precise intention and spirit of the composer. MOZART, and MOZART'S work, absorbs her, and she is too deeply, conscientiously, and fondly occupied to be striving for effect with ornaments and common-place cadenzas, as if the prima donna were the main thing, and the music secondary. — Sartain's Magazine.

Materials for the Mechanical part of Piano Forte Playing. By JULIUS KNORR. pp. 59. Geo. P. Reed & Co., Boston.

This little compend of the "Materials," into which the whole mechanical art of a pianist may be resolved, is held in high estimation in Germany; and the present translation, made expressly for the American public, has been warmly welcomed by our best German teachers. We fully endorse the following from the Preface to the American edition:

"The merits of these 'Materials' are principally these: '1. They embody the results of a truly philosophical analysis of Fingering. They teach the principles of fingering. Each habit formed in the outset, paves the way for meeting new requirements. The treatment of each special point anticipates all the coming problems (mechanical) of piano forte playing. There is no element in the mechanical power of an accomplished modern pianist, which is not here reduced first to its simplest form, and then carried in an orderly and exhaustive manner through its various modifications. For every sort of Chord or Passage, a fundamental fingering is first found and given to the pupil to be mastered; and bearing this in mind, or rather in his fingers' ends, he will not lose the thread of method even amid the necessary deviations and exceptions. An instance of this philosophical spirit of teaching will be found in the description and exemplification of three different ways of fingering the Chromatic Scale. (page 25th.)

"2. Their thorough and progressive character. Beginning with the simplest, every form is carried through all its modifications; every Chord through all Scales and positions, &c. &c. It is a complete armory of all the useful finger-movements and positions, with the few exceptions properly disposed of in the last part of the Author's Preface. It may be safely said, that one who shall have been thoroughly 'carried through' these gymnastics, will find himself at home, (so far as the mechanical part is concerned,) in any music written for the instrument.

"3. They teach theory in practice. In mastering these exercises, you have practically learned most that is to be learned of the doctrine of Scales, Accords, Rhythm, &c. The elements of Thorough Bass are got by rote in practising the fingerings of intervals and chords, in all their positions, as here laid down. Of course, the verbal instructions are to be made intelligible to young pupils through the teacher. A wise teacher may so use this skeleton of practice, as, while disciplining his pupil's fingers, to convey a very full understanding of the principles of Music to his mind."

The three fingerings of the chromatic scale, above referred to, are: 1. The German, after Moscheles, leaving most of the fingers free to take in much harmony, as Germans love it; 2. the French, after Kalkbrenner, using the two strong fingers, and suited to a strong, effective, French delivery; 3. The English, after Kramer, suited to a rapid, fluent, even execution.

The Nightingale's Nest. A Cantata, by REICH-ARDT, translated from the German by A. W. THAYER. pp. 19. Geo. P. Reed & Co.

This is a very pleasant and ingenious little affair, showing, in a series of solos, duets and choruses, how young songsters have to suffer for their privilege of loving music. Yet the point of the words, we must confess, is not quite clear to us. But they are rhythmical and singable; the melodies and harmonies are simple and pleasing, only they require a principal soprano that will not shrink from roulades and cadenzas. The piano forte accompaniment is quite descriptive. The piece will be found useful in concerts, or domestic soirées, where there are four clever voices and a pianist.

Fine Arts.

Brackett's Group. — Mr. Greenough's Letters.

It must have been a genuine conception, with some artistic vitality in it, which could be wrought out with such long, unswerving, unrepenting, and indeed heroic devotion, as the artist in this case has shown. His creation has outlived more than the negative criticisms made upon it; it has passed the ordeal of public indifference; has won the cordial approval of connoisseurs and artists; and as it came to him whole and perfect as he first saw it in the mind's ideal gallery, so it has abided with him during the long and patient years that have intervened before his final disclosure of the lovely kernel, by skill and toil almost incredible, out of the rough cold block of marble. The only criticisms we have heard against the group are two.

It has been said to be against all classic rules of art to represent mere death, the end and not the progress of the struggle. But does not this in general true principle become an oppressive conventionalism, if applied too far? In Art, it is not so much the literal matter represented, as the spirit in which it is represented, that claims our interest; not so much the fact before our eyes, as the effect in our minds and feelings. True Art can make death itself eloquent of life, and of life only and forever. It can convert that grim king himself into an artist and a poet, and make him invest his victim with the halo of immortality. To be sure, we have sometimes seen death represented in such a cold, literal, physical way, that we seemed to feel and taste only the mouldering earthiness thereof; we turned away as from the death of Art itself. Even in Ary Scheffer's painting of the "Dead Christ," with all its high and holy beauty, there seems too much of this; a painfully pervading hue and atmosphere of death,—death, that has invaded even the faces and forms of the living mourners around. But it is truly said of Brackett's work that it makes the spectator feel; it quickens his best sympathies and faith in God, in beauty, in the imperishable splendor of the soul. Here is death so truly, spiritually represented, so placed in true relations with time and eternity, that it only fills one with a new sense of the beauty, the mystery, the indestructibility of life. And yet the details of the work are such as satisfy the mere seeker for anatomical truth.

Again, the want of drapery is objected to, and not by the vulgar squeamish only. Possibly it is the highest art, which can so robe and invest the human form, as to imply and suggest all its essential beauty and make it fully felt, without any absolute exposure. Grant that to be very excellent in its way, and most judicious in most cases. Nevertheless the human body is the form of forms, the harmonious blending of all the perfections of form, and therefore the highest, holiest outward type of beauty and the soul of beauty. Is there no element so pure, in which it may be seen without shock or profanation? Is not Art that very element? Is it not the very mission of Art to bridge over the gulf between the ineffable Ideal and the profane Actual? If a dress is needed, is not Art itself that very dress, at once revealing and withdrawing into that loftier, purer atmosphere, where no shame is known, because there the Actual cannot be conceived of as having ever been divorced from the Ideal?

But we designed no criticism. By the side of such authority as we quote below, it is enough for us to express our own admiration in a whispered, involuntary Amen! The two letters of Mr. Greenough have already gone the round of all the newspapers; yet we feel that our readers will be glad to have a copy preserved here in our little album, as it were. Such documents, so brief, timely and to the point, so loyal to Art and to the rights of all who have it in them to be artists, are no more to be omitted in a Journal like ours, than is the President's message in a political newspaper. A public, which professes any love of Art, should every now and then refresh its recollections of its duty to artists, by re-reading these two letters, especially the last.

MY DEAR SIR: I have several times sat for an hour in the same room where Mr. Brackett's group of the "Wrecked Mother and Child" is exhibited, and always with a new sense of the power which has made that block of stone the vehicle of so many sad and tender thoughts, expressed in the language of beauty.

I have admired the art by which he so placed the head, that a glance tells us her sufferings are passed, and so swept every limb and tress, that we see the surge has lodged her there, and there left her.

To have told all this at the first glance even to the indifferent eye is a triumph. The action of her left arm, or rather its record of her last act, is most happy—the babe has been hugged to her heart, and borne out of harm's way to the last moment of consciousness, and there is visible in the posture of her limbs the decency and dignity of womanhood.

I was a little puzzled at the eagerness of many spectators to get so near this work that it was impossible for them to see it, and I venture to suggest to those who wish to enjoy it, that they sit quietly on the several sides of the room, and even there survey it with half-closed eyes. The work is of marble—it is in vain that you will seek aught else by crowding upon it. By remaining at a proper distance, you will find that it is no longer marble, but poetry. To hope to enjoy higher illusion by scrutiny, is like going to Milton to enjoy the blue of the Blue Hills.

I was somewhat pained by the reflection that this work—wrought with all the fervor and self-sacrifice of an earnest mind—was almost overlooked in the hurry of busy life, amid the crowd of competitors for the spare time of the public; but I took comfort from the remembrance that works of this class must be before the world for a season, before they are fully seen and valued. I felt sure that others, too, must feel toward the author as I felt, and that something might be effected to secure it a permanent place in one of our public buildings.

As the work of one who has studied here at home, I must think this group worthy of an enduring position somewhere. I cannot but feel also that the artist has a claim on his fellow citizens for the means to go on in the path he has chosen, and for which he seems so well fitted.

If any one will read the gratulatory and exulting notices with which the press and the leading men of the country have from time to time cheered the efforts of American artists, he must feel that such stimuli are as the sound of a trumpet to a youth conscious of artistic power, and I think that when at the public call he starts thus full grown to the race, he should have fair play.

I can only say that if a subscription is organized to purchase this work for some public institution, I shall be happy to contribute my mite for the object.

I am, dear Sir, your obedient servant,
HORATIO GREENOUGH.

RICHARD H. DANA, Esq.

April, 1852.

DEAR SIR: I see reprinted in the Home Journal of the 3d inst., a letter of mine to Mr. Dana, in which I ventured to call the attention of the public to Mr. Brackett's group. I should be happy if what I have said should obtain a hearing in New York.

You have mentioned me as an authority. In my capacity of citizen, I am one of the jury—as an artist, I am myself on trial. We all look to the constituency for employment and for reputation; nor is there any appeal from the public of to-day, but to their children. My earlier efforts were noticed by Allston and Morse, and many distinguished men of letters, in a manner that gave me work. I felt that I owed my voice to a man like Mr. Brackett.

Work, sir, is what young artists need and the American public, thus far, has discovered the workers, and kept them employed; not indeed confirming the high-sounding claims of injudicious partisans—for these are often harmful.

We all want sunshine; but even sunshine can be drawn to a focus too hot for any living thing.

If any one will examine the reviews of the Italian exhibitions, for the last twenty years, he will see that a shower of hyperbole is as good a leveller as can be found. A man will often seek and enjoy a meritorious work, who would shrink from the most "astounding genius of the age." These large drafts at sight are always in danger of being protested. No one likes even to seem a dupe.

Let us hope, sir, that Mr. Brackett's work will win for him all that I believe he asks—a right to go on. I am, Dear Sir, faithfully yours,

H. GREENOUGH, Sculptor.

GEORGE P. MORRIS, Esq.

☞ The DUSSELDORF GALLERY is now open and already thronged, as of course it would be.

BOSTON, APRIL 17, 1852.

We shall commence next week translating for our readers LISZT's interesting Memoir of CHOPIN, the finest genius and most interesting person of all the New School pianists.

We have also an interesting letter from LOWELL MASON, Esq., from Leipsic, about the Conservatoire there. It came just too late for this week, but will be good for our next.

Otto Goldschmidt.

All the world knows "GOLDSCHMIDT, the fortunate," the husband of JENNY LIND, but very few seem to have known or had any true perception of GOLDSCHMIDT, the artist, more than if he had not played in all her second series of concerts. A Philadelphia paper chronicled the marriage of the Nightingale to G. "the indifferent pianist," and we see ignorant, ill-natured, even vulgar paragraphs regarding him still passed about from newspaper to newspaper. Every idle, meddling fellow would fain be thought to have some private matter for an "item."

Nevertheless Otto Goldschmidt is an artist,—one of the pure and genuine stamp, one animated by the very soul of music, which expresses itself not only through the exquisite play of his fingers; but through his intimate familiarity with all the most inspired works of the masters of his instrument; through a decided talent for original composition, influenced a good deal, no doubt, by the peculiar veins of Mendelssohn and Chopin; and above all by a rare spiritual beauty of character, which may not be discerned by the mass across a crowded concert room, but which looks out of the soft, clear eyes, and speaks in a thousand simple and instinctive courtesies of manner to those who meet him with any power of appreciation.

It has been our privilege to hear him play much in private; and never have we heard the very spirit and characteristic of the styles of Beethoven and Mendelssohn and Chopin so feelingly and truly reproduced as under his hands. You could hardly mention a Sonata of the first, a Capriccio of the second, or a Notturmo or Mazourka of the third, which was not living in his memory and did not flow readily to his fingers. He has not all the strength and unfailing energy of JAEGL; he is perhaps more subject to the intermittent spells of inspiration; but his power grows and swells with the tide of the music, and his fine, clean, intimate tracing of all the delicate intricacies and foriture of the composition we never knew surpassed.

It is perhaps not known to many here, that young Goldschmidt enjoyed the tuition and most flattering approbation of such masters as only pupils of genius ever can command. He has studied with Mendelssohn, with Chopin, with Clara Wieck (now Madam Schumann), and with Ferdinand Hiller—possibly we do not remember rightly about this last name. His Trio concerts in his native Hamburg were of the choicest classic character, and sought by people of the finest taste and culture. In some of these his present lady sang for him,—a distinction, which scarcely another young pianist, giving concerts on his own account, could have aspired to.

Modest, small in stature, overshadowed in the Lind concerts by the greater light, he did not pass for what he was, among the semi-musical and would-be critics. But the great Swede knew well where her heart went, and all real friends of Art must feel a certain thrill of pleasure in an event so rare and so refreshing, in this calculating world, as a real life-union between two artists.

Handel and Haydn Society.

The Season closed with a miscellaneous programme of Sacred music, which was presented at the Melodeon on two successive Sunday evenings. The first part consisted of selections from "The Creation," which we could not be present to hear. But the second part displayed much laudable and not ineffectual ambition on the part of a number of our native amateurs and choristers. Miss BOTHAMLY is a new germ of rare promise for our vocal entertainments. To a voice of liquid purity, large, penetrating, and of good soprano compass, she unites unmistakable assurances of soul and real talent. Her sister, Mrs. EMMONS, too, possesses a large and generous contralto, which she blended with the more trained voice of the other, with true musical feeling and perception, in Rossini's Quis est homo. Only by the best Italians have we heard their rendering of that Duett surpassed.

"The Chapel," by Kreutzer, was a very precise and delicately balanced piece of quartet singing, by male voices, save that the tones of the leading tenor leaped out too far in advance of their partners. The audience insisted on a repetition. — The organist and pianist, throughout this concert, ran rather rough-shod through his accompaniments.

Mendelssohn Quintet Club.

The Complimentary Concert on Saturday evening proved not an empty compliment. For once these worthy artists, after tasking themselves all winter, more for the benefit of the few determined seekers of good chamber music, than for their own, had the Masonic Temple fairly filled. They played with more than usual inspiration, carrying their audience entirely with them. They came to it fresh; they had had rest, — one of the prime conditions of musical as of all other efficiency; but one, which they had scarcely allowed themselves during the thick of the concert season, when they were compelled to play almost every night, in different towns, after much journeying and fatigue, so that their most artistic business could not but be drudgery to themselves sometimes. But this one was a genuine feast, and "flow of soul."

It opened with the first two movements of MENDELSSOHN'S posthumous Quintet, op. 87, in B flat, which were played con amore and with great effect. There is a bold and headlong energy in the Allegro movement, which sweeps along with it a rich freight of exquisite detail. But the Adagio is profoundly, grandly beautiful, and its lively impression lasted to the end of the concert, when a repetition was requested and it was heard again with redoubled satisfaction. We were sorry not to have the whole Quintet, though as a whole (always excepting the Adagio) we have scarcely found it equal to the composer's earlier Quintet.

in its lower tones than we have before heard it, and more evenly modulated in its upper. There was more crisp and distinct articulation, too, in her Italian, than was her wont in English oratorio. In point of style, too, and expression, there were serious signs of progress. Miss S. gave also with true and simple finish the little Serenade: "Soft Evening Air," by Mr. RYAN, an unpretending melody of no little beauty, with a well adapted quartet accompaniment.

The Quintet of HUMMEL, op. 87, with piano-forte and double-bass, played by Messrs. PERABEAU and H. FRIES, was a most masterly and graceful specimen of that great composer. The audience drank in every movement with delight. Mr. Perabeau is in his element with Hummel, thoroughly master of his remarkable mechanical difficulties, as well as true to the composer's thought. Not so, exactly, in the Lieder ohne Worte of Mendelssohn; a too spasmodic rhythm marred their delicate beauty.

Of the selections from the Quartet of MOZART, in C, No. 6, and from the Quintet of BEETHOVEN, in C, op. 29, (the Adagio and Finale in both instances), we can only say that their music fully met and surpassed pleasant old remembrances.

Beethoven's Last Quartets.

These productions of the giant's saddest days of almost total deafness, which have borne a sort of reputation of inscrutable profundity or of outright madness, according to men's various degrees of faith in genius, have lately had a fair trial in Paris, in the Cercle musical et litteraire, directed by M. Malibran, and composed of artists unwilling to waste their virtuosity upon music without virtue. With what result, so far as one genial critic was concerned, may be seen by the following, which we translate from the Gazette Musicale:

"The six last quatuors of Beethoven have remained, since the disappearance of that great man from this musical world in 1827, in a state of incomprehensible mystery. Some said, and they still say: 'When the author of the Pastoral Symphony, so limpid in its melody and so clear in its harmony, composed his last quatuors, Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17, he was deaf and almost crazy with the grief of having lost the sense most precious to every musician.' Certain it is, that on comparing the style of these last quatuors with those earlier ones, so full of well turned melody, so clear, so logical by unity of thought, one finds himself quite lost and puzzled by this continual adjournment of the final cadence; by this seemingly unnecessary variety of measure; this spasmodic rhythm, which seems the result of a brain, a thought sick with the fever of innovation.

"M. Maurin, a young violinist of talent, the like of whom one meets not twice, M. Maurin, seconded by three other artists, young, devoted to Art in all its manifestations, even though they be fantastic or capricious, has dreamed of the restoration of these exceptional works; and his dream has become a reality; and before a select and numerous company he has, by a careful and fervent execution, caused all the singularities, the eccentric melodies and harmonies of these strange combinations of the art of sounds, to be appreciated. We did not wish to judge of this altogether novel music by a mere hearing of the ear, and cry miracle, like the Beethovenist who plays the aesthetic snob even in Paris; we wished to hear with our eyes as well as our ears; and with a very correct miniature edition of the score of these quatuors before us, we followed the author's thought, his melodic designs, his ingenious and bold harmonies, his style constantly fugued, bristling with obstinate imitations and canons; and we have convinced ourselves that the man fell not when he wrote these audacious works, unprecedented in the art of music."

Would it be too much for our "Mendelssohn" friends to attempt one of these knotty problems some day at their semi-public rehearsal? It might at least pique the musical curiosity of their little audience, and possibly reveal new spheres of musical delight.

Mlle. Clauss.

Private letters from the best sources confirm all that the Parisian critics and feuilletonists say in admiration of this young pianiste. One would think the true spark of genius animated her. The Gazette and the France Musicale have repeated eulogies on her performance. Take this for a specimen, from the former paper.

"Arrived from Germany last year, without protection, save that of her talent, — a genuine, conscientious, even brilliant talent, — she let herself be heard but once at a concert of the Société Philharmonique directed by Berlioz. This début was brilliant and promised her success in the musical societies of our capital, when suddenly the poor girl lost her mother, who had accompanied her into France. She has been to weep this irreparable loss at the house of a friend, in the South of France; and here she is again in Paris, an orphan, isolated, more a stranger than she was before, but possessing a talent, that has matured in solitude, and acquired new sensibility, so to speak, by one of the profoundest sorrows of life.

"Mlle. CLAUSS, like all the pianists of the actual generation, combines in her execution the styles of the past and of the present day. And first, like all the present virtuosos, she unites the most supple and rich mechanism to a memory not less rich, less large and well-furnished both with retrospective works and with those so complicated of the modern music. Among other pieces of this kind, she played the fantasia of Thalberg on La Sonnambula, like a pianist, who does not content herself with striking, with brusque-ly hitting the key, but who interrogates it, like an artist, who comprehends, knows the whole power of sound and melody upon the ear and the heart, and consequently upon the sympathy and attention of her audience. To sing with one's ten fingers, or even with one, upon the piano, must be in the future of this instrument its last word.

"What made us believe that our young virtuoso is a pianist of the future, was that she delivered a Notturmo of CHOPIN, op. 9, in a delicious manner, with a delicacy of touch and a poesy of melody to ravish the thoughts, and lap them in the memory of the fine and limpid manner of the composer himself. She rendered possible the impossibilities digitigrades of LISZT, &c." [We gave the untranslatable sentence under "Foreign Intelligence" in our last number.] "There is no mannerism, no affectation in her way of carrying her hand; she does not fling it to show her ease: her fingers are almost always inherent on the keys, thus practising the art of never losing time; although, (we must tell her so) the art of making oneself heard is also that of knowing how to take time: it is the secret of actors, virtuosos and orators.

"In the Prelude and Fugue in C sharp minor by Sebastian BACH, Mlle. Clauss showed herself a musicienne and true classical pianist; and what was no mean praise, both for the beneficiary and her audience, they made her repeat this piece in form and execution so free, so crisp and so pure."

The France Musicale says: "She played compositions of Thalberg, Chopin, Droyschock, Bach, Beethoven, Liszt, and to each one the young pianist gave its fitting and peculiar stamp. We fancied we remarked in her execution a tendency to exaggeration of force, which is too apt to exclude that grace and simplicity, which are the poetry of woman. It was in the classic species, in the Andante and Finale of Beethoven, in the prelude and fugue of Bach, that we always admired the playing of Mlle. Clauss. There she is irreproachable; and there too has been her grand success."

BORN ON A LUCKY DAY. A good omen for our little paper! Opening the other day the New York Tribune, in its bran new suit of type, we commenced reading the editor's remarks appropriate to the occasion: "Eleven years ago this day we issued the first No. of the Daily Tribune." That is to say, on Saturday April 10th, — the very date on which our own little bantling began to peep! Mr. Greeley continues: "Some five hundred persons had previously agreed to take the paper." Precisely our case too! Now if we can have a tithe of the prosperity of the Tribune, to say nothing of living eleven years, what more could we ask for a little journal of Music and the Arts like this?

The Tribune has kindly heralded, and again chronicled with praise our advent (as have many other "principalities and powers" in the great world of the press.) We prize the paternal welcome from that quarter, as a quarter not only of much humanity, but one from which many wise and sincere words have proceeded with respect to our own more peculiar world of Art.

The "Harvard Musical Association" have lately added to their library a superb edition of MOZART's piano forte works, published in London by Novello, and edited by CIPRIANI POTTER. It is very complete, in nine volumes, which comprise not only the Sonatas, variations &c., for the piano alone, but all of the master's concerted pieces in which the piano plays a part; as duets with violin, trios, quartets, quintets with string or wind instruments, &c. Each piano forte volume is so bound, as to hold snugly and safely the brochures containing the accompanying parts.

Lovers and collectors of fine classic music will covet such a set of volumes, as surely as they shall set eyes on them. We doubt not that Mr. Reed, the worthy agent of Novello, will be happy to gratify them in this respect for a reasonable enough consideration.

DAVIDSON'S ILLUSTRATED OPERA LIBRETTO. Mr. Geo W. Peck, a gentleman well known in our musical world, is agent for the sale of these. The series includes the words (Italian and English, so translated that it can be sung), with the music to the principal airs, of 28 different operas. The opera season is over, and we seem destined to no renewal of it this Spring; but the habitués will do well to refresh their tuneful memories, as well as to get booked up for future opportunities, by furnishing themselves with these cheap and convenient little books. The cost of the whole set is $7.62; and Mr. Peck may be found at No. 101 State St.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

TREMONT TEMPLE is to be rebuilt, on a somewhat larger scale than before, for a grand concert and lecture hall. That is as it should be, for the site is a noble one and should be held sacred to Art. Meanwhile the BOSTON MUSIC HALL is fast progressing, the foundations laid, and contracts for the other work all made, and there is every reason to hope that it will be finished near the beginning of the next musical season, and be a model of a music hall. Thus Boston seems likely to be doubly well provided.

MR. WOŁOWSKI'S CONCERT is postponed to this evening, when he has the aid of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTEY CLUB. He promises to play on two pianos at once: perhaps a very skillful feat, at all events a very foolish one. The announcement reminds us of the showman setting forth the virtues of his lion, which "came over the Atlantic in two ships." Mr. W. will also play some 400 notes in a single measure: — he is safe, for his audience could not count them. Nevertheless, we are told by some, who should be judges, that M. Wolowski is a skillful, tasteful pianist, and it may be, that, like some modest artists before him, he has been the victim of bad advisers in this instance. His programme includes besides, some genuine pieces, as a set of Chopin's Mazurkas.

MR. ARTHURSON announces himself for a benefit concert at the Melodeon a week hence, with the aid of the MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY, of Mr. and Miss LEACH, who have been highly praised as vocalists in New York, and whom Mr. A. is not the man to engage, if there be not some true stamp of art about them. He is also to have the new orchestra, just formed here, of which anon. The music will be mainly from the Oratorios, in which Mr. A. has given us so chaste a model of tenor recitative and sacred song.

NEW ORCHESTRA. A number of the best artists in the Mus. Fund Society, especially Germans, have organized a separate, smaller orchestra, with a view to giving frequent concerts somewhat after the manner of the "Germanians." The design, as we understand, is not to withdraw themselves from, nor in any way interfere with the Fund Society, but rather to demonstrate, by a new selection and distribution of instruments, that the elements exist in Boston for a very superior band. Mr. F. SUCK is to be the leader, — a man in every way competent to the post. Mr. WERNER takes his own proper instrument, the first flute, instead of the viola as at the Fund, and his is just the right flute for an orchestra, without the saucy, pert tone which that little member is too apt to have. These two gentlemen are as sterling, intelligent, modest musicians as we have among us. Mr. SCHNAPP, too, lays down the viola for the trombone, of which he is a master. Mr. HAMANN, who played the fine horn solo at a late Quintet Soirée, is to be first horn. The whole number of instruments thus far, we are told, is twenty-six.

General.

BISCACCIANTI, by last accounts, had arrived safely out at California. May its genial air and sympathies inspire her, and its gold reward her! — MARETZKE's troupe, with STEFFANONE, were to close a brilliant season at New Orleans on the 7th inst. — MARINI has gone to join the opera at London, and it is said that BOSIO will follow. — PARODI was to have followed upon BISCACCIANTI's heels, but now report says Lumley has her.

JENNY and OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT are to give three farewell concerts in New York, on the 18th, 21st and 24th of May. Two at Metropolitan Hall, and the last in the scene of her first grand welcome, Castle Garden. May we be there to hear! For Castle Garden is a sacred place to us.

The only recent musical event of much note in New York was EISELDT's last Classical Soirée.

The PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY — a glorious orchestra that — but with only about one-third the number of our Mrs. Fund audiences — gives the last of its four annual symphony concerts at Niblo's hall this evening.

THE "GERMANIANS," with JAEEL, have raised a furor in Philadelphia, which seems likely to keep them there beyond their first intention. JAEEL is the watch-word of a general enthusiasm. At a late concert he drew gold coins and breast-pins, as well as smiles and plaudits. The orchestra feasted their leader, Herr BERGMANN, on his birth-day, surprising him with gifts; and doubtless it was a time of outpouring of real natural German artists' sentiment and wit. Their programmes there have been rather lighter than they gave here; at least we see no symphonies set down.

OLE BULL has been fascinating the M. C.'s at Washington with two literally solo concerts.

MUSICAL WORKS
RECENTLY PUBLISHED BY
MASON & LAW,
23 Park Row, Opposite Astor House, N. York.

THE ACADEMY VOCALIST. A Collection of Vocal Music, arranged for the use of Seminaries, High Schools, Singing Classes, &c. By GEORGE F. ROOR, Professor of Music in Rutgers and Spingler Institutes, the New York Institution for the Blind, &c. With a complete course of Elementary Instruction, Vocal Exercises, and Solfeiggios, by LOWELL MASON.

This work is intended to supply a want long felt in our Higher Schools and Institutions. The music is arranged for three parts, and in such a manner that it may be sung exclusively by female voices or by a mixed choir. Whenever solos occur, a simple accompaniment for the Piano Forte or Melodeon has been added. The work is printed from new English type and on beautiful paper. Retail price, 62 1-2 cents.

ZUNDEL'S ORGAN BOOK. By JOHN ZUNDEL. Two Hundred and Fifty Easy Voluntaries and Introduces for the Organ, Melodeon, Seraphine, &c. With Introductory Remarks, Description of Stops, Directions for the Purchase of Organs, &c., adapting the work especially to the wants of young organists, and those who have made sufficient progress to accompany plain Psalmody on the Organ, Melodeon, or Seraphine. Retail price, $1.50

THE GLEE HIVE. BOSTON ACADEMY OF MUSIC. A Collection of Glee and Part Songs, selected and arranged for the Musical Conventions and Teachers' Institutes of the Boston Academy of Music. By LOWELL MASON and GEORGE JAMES WEBB.

Here are Thirty-three choice, tasteful, and sprightly Glee and Part Songs, mostly new, from the best Authors, sold at an exceedingly low price. It is just the book wanted by Singing Clubs, Societies, Classes, and the Social Circle. Retail price, 38 cents.

WILDER'S SCHOOL MUSIC. A Collection of Thirty-six New and Beautiful Songs, arranged for Schools and Juvenile Classes. By L. WILDER, Teacher of Music in the Brooklyn Music Schools, &c.

This work has already been adopted in the Schools of Brooklyn, New York, &c. Retail price, 18 3-4 cents.

CANTICA LAUDIS: OR, THE AMERICAN BOOK OF CHURCH MUSIC. By LOWELL MASON, Professor in the Boston Academy of Music, Editor of the Boston Handel and Haydn Society's Collection, Carmina Sacra, and other of the most popular Music Books in the country; and GEORGE JAMES WEBB, Professor in the Boston Academy of Music, and Editor of many valuable Musical Works.

The increased satisfaction with which it was received, and the unprecedented success of this book, MASON AND WEBB'S LATEST WORK, as well as the warm commendations it has received from the Musical Profession generally, establish it as the best and most attractive collection of Church Music which even these celebrated authors have ever produced. It contains a greater amount, as well as variety, of truly beautiful new tunes, anthems, chants, and other pieces, than any similar work; besides a copious collection of the standard old tunes. The Elements of Vocal Music have been newly and most carefully prepared, and to adapt it more particularly to CHOIRS and SINGING SCHOOLS, about Two Hundred Solfeiggio Exercises and Progressive Lessons have been added. In addition to numerous testimonials from the press, it having been pronounced the "MOST VALUABLE BOOK OF CHURCH MUSIC EVER ISSUED," it has received from every section of the country the unqualified approbation of more than ONE HUNDRED PROFESSORS AND TEACHERS OF MUSIC. Retail price, 88 cents.

JUST PUBLISHED,

MARX'S MUSICAL COMPOSITION. The Theory and Practice of Musical Composition. By ADOLPH BERNARD MARX, Doctor of Music, &c. Translated from the third German Edition, and edited by HERMANN S. SARONI.

A. B. MARX holds such high rank in Germany as a writer upon the subject of Musical Composition, that any recommendation of his great work to those who are at all acquainted with the musical literature of the land, which is emphatically the home of music, would be superfluous. It is without a rival as a treatise upon this subject, thoroughly scientific and yet adapted to popular comprehension.

The present translation is beautifully printed in 406 octavo pages, and bound in English cloth. Retail price, $2.50.

NEW HYMN AND TUNE BOOK.

TEMPLE MELODIES. A Collection of nearly all the Standard and Popular Tunes, in connection with Five Hundred Favorite Hymns; arranged as a Hymn and Tune Book for Vestries, Social Meetings, Congregational and Family Worship, &c. By DARIUS E. JONES.

This work has already been introduced, and is used with great satisfaction and profit in the vestries of many Churches and in the Congregations of some, while the publishers have received numerous recommendations from Clergymen and others. Those who love the old tunes, and who deem it a desirable object that as many as possible should unite in the singing, especially at social meetings, will find this exactly the book wanted.

FREDERIC CHOPIN.

BY FRANZ LISZT.

I.

Painfully as his loss will be lamented by all artists and by all, who knew him, still perhaps it may be permitted to doubt whether the moment has yet arrived, when CHOPIN can be estimated at his real worth and take the high place, which in all probability the Future will assign him.

If it has many times been proved, that "a prophet has no honor in his own country," does not the experience also hold good, that the prophets, that is, the men of the Future, the men, who have a presentiment of coming time and bring it nearer to us in their works, will not be recognized as prophets by their own age? And scarcely dare we maintain, that it could be otherwise. The younger generations of artists may fortify themselves as they will against the slowly appreciating ones, whose uniform custom it is to bury the living with the dead: in Music and in all other Art it is frequently reserved to time alone, to bring the full beauty and merit of their works to light.

The various forms of Art are properly but magic spells, for calling out emotions, feelings, passions; and Genius shows itself in the creation of new forms, which often chime with only such emotions as never yet have been awakened in the sphere of those spell-bound. Can we then indulge the hope, in Arts where the feeling is connected with the exciting cause without any mediation of thoughts or reflection, that the mere introduction of new and unwonted forms and measures shall be no hindrance to the immediate understanding of a work? The surprise, nay even the fatigue, accompanying strange impressions makes them sound to the great multitude like a language, which it does not understand and which for that reason at first seems to it somewhat barbarous. Many shrink in terror from the mere pains it will cost to accustom the ear to it, and then they doggedly refuse it all more serious study. Commonly it is the most lively and most youthful organizations, those least entangled in the web of custom, (which, even where it is invincible, is worthy of respect), that take to the new idiom, first out of curiosity and then with passion. Through these it penetrates even into the most intractable regions of the public; through these, at last, the public seizes the sense, the signification, the structure of the music, and does justice to its peculiarities or to its richness. Accordingly, those composers, who are not tied to traditional methods, need more than other artists the aid of time. They cannot hope that death will enhance the value of their works for the time being, as is sometimes the case with pictures; and no one of them can in behalf of his scores revive the artifice of that Dutch painter, who told his wife to spread a report of his death, to raise the price on what had been accumulating in his studio.

Great as is the popularity acquired by a portion of the compositions of the man, whose vital energy corporeal sufferings had broken down a long time before his death, there is still reason to suspect, that posterity will measure his labors by a more serious standard than the present. Future historians of music will give full credit to one, who has distinguished himself by so strange a genius for melody, by such felicitous and remarkable enlargements of the web of harmony; and they will justly prize his conquests above many a work laid out upon a vaster scale, and played again and again by an entire orchestra, or sung again and again by whole troupes of prime donne.

By confining himself exclusively to the Piano Forte, CHOPIN has proved himself, in our opinion, to possess one of the most essential properties of a writer or a composer: namely, a correct appreciation of the form, in which his mission was to be achieved, and his designs executed. And yet this fact, which we impute to him as a high merit, has harmed his reputation. Another person, in possession of such fine melodic and harmonic creative power, would hardly have withstood the temptations offered by the song of strings beneath the bow, by the languishing of the flute, by the crackle of the trumpet, which we still persist in regarding as the peculiar messenger of the old heathen goddess, for whose passing favor we are suitors. What a mature conviction it required in him, thus to limit himself to a seemingly barren domain, and out of its soil entice flowers, which seemed as if they must renounce all hope of thriving there! What a depth of insight is revealed in this exclusive choice of the means of plucking the various effects of instruments out of their usual sphere, where the resounding yeasty waves break on the shore, and confining them within a narrower, but more ideal circle! What a confident presentiment of the future power of his instrument in this self-sacrificing rejection of an empiricism so all-pervading, that another would probably have esteemed it contrary to nature, to withdraw such great thoughts from their usual interpreters! How admirable this well-considered feeling of the Beautiful for its own sake! On the one hand, he restrains his talent from the common tendency to distribute every shred of melody over a hundred music-desks; and on the other, he enriches the auxiliary sources of the Art, in teaching us how to concentrate them upon a given space.

Far from seeking his renown in the noise of the orchestra, CHOPIN contented himself with seeing his thoughts fully quickened into life upon the key-board of the piano. He always reached his end, which was no other than to secure to the musical essence of his idea the full expression of its power; but he despised the mere effect of masses and the coarse pencil of the scene-painter. As yet the value of the sketches from his fine pen has not been considered with sufficient seriousness or due attention; for people are accustomed, even in this day, to think those composers only worthy of a great name, who have left behind them at least half a dozen operas, as many oratorios and several symphonies; of each musician they demand all, and if possible, a little more. Whether justly, is quite problematical. Far be it from us to call in question the more dearly earned fame and the actual superiority of those epic bards, who have unfolded their resplendent creations upon the broadest field; we could only wish, that in musical works the same standard of material proportions might prevail as in the other Fine Arts; for instance, in Painting, where a canvass of twenty square ells, as the Vision of Ezekiel, or the Churchyard by Ruysdael, is reckoned among masterpieces of as high a rank, or higher, than many a picture of far greater compass, even were it by a Rubens or a Tintoretto. Is Beranger any the less a poet, because he has confined his thoughts within the narrow limits of the People's Song? Does not Petrarca owe his triumph to his Sonnets, while what one of his admirers knows his poem upon Africa? We do not doubt the gradual disappearance of the prejudices, which dispute the rank of an artist, who should write nothing but Sonatas, like those of FRANZ SCHUBERT, compared with many another, who has scored the common-place melodies of many operas, which we care not to mention. Even in Music we shall gradually learn, in the various kinds of composition, to take account first of all of the eloquence and talent, with which the ideas and feelings are expressed, without regard to the space and means, by which it is accomplished.

Now it is impossible to subject Chopin's labors to an intelligent analysis, without finding in them beauties of the first magnitude, an expression perfectly new, and a harmonic texture as original as it is complete. With him the boldness always justifies itself; the richness, even to exuberance, does not exclude clearness; the strangeness does not degenerate into baroque affectation. The embellishment begets no blur; the luxury of ornaments does not smother the beauty of the main lines. His best works are rich in combinations, which may be said to make epochs in the treatment of musical style. Audacious, shining, seductive, they clothe their profundity with so much grace, their art with so much charm, that one has difficulty to disentwine himself from their transporting, magic clasp, so as to judge them in cold blood from the stand-point of their theoretic worth. This worth has been already felt; but it will be more and more appreciated, when the time shall come for an exact examination of the services, that have been rendered to the art of Music in the period in which CHOPIN lived.

To him we owe that expansion of the Chord, both when struck full, and when broken into arpeggio and through several octaves; those chromatic and enharmonic windings, of which his Etudes contain such astonishing examples; those minute groups of interpolated notes, which fall down like a colored dew upon the melodic figure, and for which, until he came, only the fioriture of the older Italian song school had been taken for a model. While he enlarged the boundaries, within which they had hitherto kept, he lent to this kind of ornament that unexpectedness and that multifariousness, which lay beyond the compass of the human voice, heretofore always slavishly copied in the so-called embellishments for the piano, that had become so stereotyped and monotonous. He invented those wonderful harmonic progressions, which lent a serious character even to those pages, which with their light material could scarcely lay claim to such meaning. But what of the material (the subject matter)? The Idea, which he charms out of it, the inspiration which he breathes into it, exalts, ennobles, magnifies it. What melancholy there is, what subtlety, what fine perception, and above all, what ART in those masterpieces of Lafontaine, whose matter is so common-place, and whose title so modest! Etudes and Preludes are titles quite as modest; nevertheless the musical pieces of CHOPIN, which bear them, remain forever perfect types of a species, which he has created, and which, like all his works, sprang from the character of his poetic genius.

Almost the earliest of his works, they bear the stamp of a young creative power, which in some of his following productions, that are more labored, more filed, more learnedly written, gradually disappears, to become lost entirely in his latest; for these are the offspring of a morbid sentimentality, which might be called the painful fruit of an exhausted vital energy.

BUGLE SONG.

BY ALFRED TENNYSON.

The splendor falls on castle walls
And snowy summits old in story;
The long light shakes across the lakes,
And the wild cataract leaps in glory:
Blow! bugle, blow! set the wild echoes flying—
Blow, bugle! answer, echoes! dying, dying, dying!

Oh hark! oh hear! how thin and clear,
And thinner, clearer, farther going!
Oh! sweet and far, from cliff and scar,
The horns of Elfland faintly blowing!
Blow! let us hear the purple glens replying—
Blow, bugle! answer, echoes! dying, dying, dying!

Oh love, they die in yon rich sky!
They faint on hill, on field, on river;
Our echoes roll from soul to soul,
And grow for ever, and for ever!
Blow, bugle, blow! set the wild echoes flying,
And answer, echoes, answer! dying, dying, dying!

CLASSIC AND OPERATIC MUSIC, OR The Contrapuntists and the Melodists.

The assertion: Every age has its joys, applies also to music. In it we recognize a somewhat melancholy truth, which however but few friends of music willingly admit, who all their days keep sounding the praises of their beloved art. But the passion for music, if it be carried to an extreme degree, wears out the sense and the heart, as well as any other passion; it has, like every other, its excesses and its dangers. The liveliness of musical impressions degenerates, with certain temperaments, into an undue vehemence, and the habit of yielding thereto can in the long run induce nothing but a disturbance of the moral balance and a loss of the capacity of enjoyment. This is especially the case with dramatic and concert music, which is more passionate and sensuous than any other. But when one finally has had this sad experience in himself; when Melody, with the whole train of its allurements no longer says to us what it once said, then it often happens, that the taste changes with age; an age, however, which cannot always be measured by the number of years. Fortunately, music contains also in itself the antidote against the evil it has caused. Without loving it any the less, one can love it differently; the pleasure can regain in interest what it has lost in voluptuous fire; and other works invite us then to more tranquil emotions, since they attach the music to the pleasures of the mind, and at least keep alive in it always the warmth, which the language of feeling must have and the heart must enjoy, without unnerving it. These pleasures in their nature are the most enduring; and the works, to which we owe them, are not subject to the mournful changes of fashion, which to-day despises what it yesterday adored. The Dilettante has become a Connoisseur.

The long life ascribed to fugues lies not, as Forkel assures us, in the æsthetic superiority of that species. There can, I repeat it, be no question of absolute pre-eminence between the two parts of musical art, each of which contains but half of its resources in itself, and has not the power to make itself complete. This long duration probably lies in the structure and the technical laws of the Fugue. The changeable and perishable element, Melody, in it is reduced to its lowest value. It is nothing but a subject, a theme, a musical proposition, commonly limited to three or four bars. Moreover the invention of a subject is no arbitrary process, for you must find one suited to the contrapuntal analysis, to which it is to be subjected. It is never clothed according to the old or the new fashion, precisely for the reason, that makes it impossible for it to follow either. Fashion crumbles before it, as a whim gives way before necessity. And if mannerism cannot insinuate itself into the melodic design of the subject, how much more impotent it must be against the whole work! The combinations, the imitations, the canonical plays, the many crossing outlines, of which the fugue consists, gives a rounded and compact mass, which resists the strokes of Time, as in a beleaguered city the churches built of hewn stones resist the bombs, which shatter the less solid edifices.

find the guaranties of a long existence in the natural strength of their putting together; for another reason they escape a misfortune, which is perhaps the greatest next to that of being executed in the judicial sense of the word. These works are never disgraced by coming into fashion; they are not abused and worn out by having to be heard continually and without any mercy in theatre and concert and saloons, where there happens to be a piano, in promenades and grand parades. Who has not a thousand times cursed such fashionable arias, which he has met day and night under all possible forms, even where he was expecting a more serious music?

At the time when counterpoint and melody were in a state of separation, the musicians, that is to say the contrapuntists and the melodists, must have discerned very different and yet perfectly compensatory fates in the type of the two respective styles. The melodists won glory in their nation and in all Europe, the applause of the multitude, the flatteries of fashion, of which they were at once the priests, the idols and the victims; the laurel wreath, that withered as soon as it was placed upon the head of the victor; gold, that went as rapidly as it was easily earned; popularity with all its advantages and burdens. The contrapuntists reaped the quiet marks of honor, by which the toils of scholars are remunerated, and which are limited to their own circle. A place as chapel-master in a church, or organist, if fortune was particularly well disposed to one; moderate income, assiduous labors, a few scholars for interested admirers, colleagues difficult to satisfy for judges, and a silent church public for their incitement. The world scarcely knew them. But these men could write freely, as God and their own hearts prompted, as MOZART always had so longed to do; they had the consciousness of their merit and the presentiment of a remote but an enduring glory, and they envied not their fortunate and renowned rivals, the melodists. They were free! This explains all, as well their faith in the future, as the stoicism which they opposed to the indifference of their contemporaries. The best part of their fortune consisted of a draft upon posterity, payable when they themselves should no more need it. So lived, both inwardly and outwardly, those philosophical musicians, of whom JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH will be the prototype for all times.

The Hungarian Orchestra.

The last accounts from London speak of a band under the above name, which is now successfully giving concerts in that city. As they will probably visit our country before a great while—such at least we understood to be their intention, a year since—and as they are really well worth hearing, it strikes us that a paragraph or two on them will not be misplaced.

The company is small, consisting of but fifteen performers, and the members are mostly, if not entirely, Gipsies, though called Hungarians. The leader's name is Kalozdy, and the company is sometimes called by his name, and sometimes the Locz Orchestra, from the place whence it came. Most of them know nothing of music, farther than to play on their instruments the music taught them by the leader—the violoncellist and one of the clarinetists cannot read a note.

Most of the music they play is national, such as the Rakoczy March, overture to a Hungarian Opera, pieces by Kalozdy, the leader, &c.; though in Berlin they played, in addition to these, Rossini's "Tell" overture, Von Flotow's overture to "Martha," and extracts from Ernani and Nebuchadonzer by Verdi, and from Ilka by Doppler. Their true sphere is their own music, which is elegiac and plaintive, constantly changing from major to minor, from piano to forte, &c., and full of such characteristic effects, as much belonging to Hungarian music, as the omission of the Seventh does to the real old Scotch songs.

The Orchestra is a perfect model of discipline; and in their accelerandos, retardandos, &c., and in all dynamic changes, every man accelerates, retards, increases or diminishes, so perfectly with all the rest, that it seems really as if they all felt the thoughts and emotions of Kalozdy. This is owing of course partly to their seven years practice together, and partly we think to the fact that so many of them are taught their parts note by note by their leader, who of course will give to each man the same expression. The composition of the Orchestra, or rather the selection of the instruments, is curious.

Five violins play the leading parts and melodies; one viola, one violoncello, and one contra bass furnish the middle parts and bass. These are all the stringed instruments. Two clarinet players comprise the whole band of wood instruments. They use clarinets in A, B, D, and C, and for piccolo parts one in E b. This is not so good as the piccolo would be, as the clarinet can only be played forte, and has a somewhat screechy effect. The other instruments are all metallic, consisting of two keyed bugles (!) with very wide bells. The first bugle is in C, the second in F, and both have a range of three octaves. In Berlin, one of the feats of the bugler was to play a most difficult cadence with all sorts of ornaments in vocal style,—and this he did most perfectly. Two horns in F and a bombardon (?) fill up the quintet of brass instruments. Their playing won the highest admiration in Germany, and a letter from Liszt praises them almost extravagantly. Their long practice enables them to learn a piece of some length in one hour! and a year ago they had already "in the head," as the Germans express it, seventy different pieces! They are truly masters of their instruments, and should they come over here, they would afford a new opportunity for us to cultivate our tastes, at least in execution, and for the study of national music. They dress in a rich national costume, which adds not a little to the effect of their appearance on the stage or in the concert room. A. W. T.

A BEAUTIFUL COMPLIMENT. One of the most beautiful compliments we ever read came before our eyes this week. It may be old to many, but it will bear repetition: Reynolds, the celebrated artist, painted a portrait of Mrs. Billington, the vocalist, representing her as St. Cecilia—the eyes turned towards heaven, listening to a choir of angels, faintly introduced on the upper part of the painting. Haydn, the composer, was present just as Sir Joshua was giving it the finishing touch, and his opinion of its merits was asked by Mrs. Billington. "It resembles you," said Haydn, "but it has one great fault." "And what is it?" asked Mrs. Billington with inquietude, fearful that the artist might take offence. "The painter," continued Haydn, "has represented you listening to the songs of the angels; he should have painted the angels listening to your enchanting notes." Flattered by such compliment, the beautiful Billington threw her arms round Haydn's neck and kissed him.

An interesting display of Tableaux vivants recently took place at Stuttgart, under the auspices of the Musicians and Painters. Loewe composed a prelude, and between the pictures, music of Mozart, Beethoven and Weber was performed under the direction of the veteran Lindpaintner. The series proceeded historically, representing some of the most famous pictures of the great artists.

Correspondence.

[Letter from Germany.]

The Conservatory of Music.

LEIPSTIG, March 22, 1852.

Music has made so much progress within the last few years, that the importance of a more extensive and thorough course of education is beginning to be felt; and this is especially the case with those who have made the greatest advancement. It has not been generally known in our country, that there is enough in music to occupy years of close application. The older singing books, published some fifty or eighty years ago, contained a few pages of "Rules," giving some directions as to finding the "mi," and describing the different kinds of time; and a man who could so explain these that no one could possibly understand him, was thought to be musically learned. Many a time have I heard the exclamation: "What, devote his whole time to music!" as if it was quite impossible that one could find anything to study in it for more than an evening or two in a week, for two or three months. Even now there are but very few who have any just conception of the previous preparation, time and labor necessary to thorough knowledge in the science, or skill in the art. The subject is better understood this side the Atlantic, and especially in Germany, where for many years music schools similar to our law, medical and theological schools, have been established. It is exceedingly difficult, nay, quite impossible, to obtain a thorough musical education at present in America; for, although we have good musicians, they are scattered about through the different cities, and one cannot avail himself of their instructions but at great inconvenience and expense; and it is found to be a quicker and a cheaper way to come to Europe, if one is determined to make himself in good earnest a musical student.

The inquiry has often been made: What are the musical conservatories of Europe? what are their advantages? and how may one avail himself of their privileges? With the design of answering, in part, these questions, the following account of the Conservatory here has been prepared. It has been written by a young gentleman, a Bostonian, a graduate of Harvard University, now a musical student and member of the Conservatory—Mr. J. P. When young Americans, having good natural talent, favorable early musical associations, and a sufficient preparatory education, shall devote themselves like Mr. P. to the thorough study of musical science and art, we may look for the rapid progress and success of music in our land, and may hope to realize some of the advantages for which it was designed.

"THIS INSTITUTION was founded in 1843, under the patronage of the King of Saxony, and with the valuable co-operation of the Capelmeister, Dr. FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY. Its reputation spread so rapidly, both in and around Germany, that at the close of the first half-year it numbered forty-four pupils, thirty-three male and eleven female. At the commencement of the second term, the number had increased to sixty. These pupils are attracted thither not only from all parts of Germany, but from Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Russia, England and America.

to every good musician, and to enable him to perfect himself theoretically as well as practically, has this advantage over private instruction — that by the participation of several scholars in the same immediate object of study, it awakens and keeps alive in them a true musical feeling, stimulates them to emulation and hence to industry, and preserves them from partiality or one-sidedness in the formation of their tastes, a fault against which every artist should be particularly cautious, during the progress of his studies. It has also the advantage of cheapness. Each student pays about $60 a year, for which he receives instruction in all branches. This moderate sum, as one can readily see, must bear a very small proportion to the expense of private instruction.

"The theoretical part of the education consists of a complete course of three years. The pupils are divided into six classes, and a new term commences every half-year; though if one is sufficiently prepared, he can enter any of the advanced classes at the time of his admission into the Conservatory. The first year is devoted to simple Harmony; the second to Harmony and Simple Counterpoint; and the third to Harmony, Double Counterpoint and Fugue. The study of Composition and Musical Form constitutes a separate branch, being under the charge of a different instructor. It comprises all the different forms of vocal and instrumental composition, with the analysis of classical works. There are also exercises in playing from score and the art of conducting an Orchestra. The Italian language is also taught to those who devote themselves principally to singing. Lectures are given twice a week by an eminent Professor on the History and Aesthetics of Music, and the science of Acoustics with experiments. So much for the theoretical course.

"In the practical branch also, instruction is given in classes. No limited course can be prescribed, however, as everything here depends on the talent and industry of the scholar. The vocal department is patronized mainly by females, and for those who pursue the study, exercises in Declamation are given, to improve their pronunciation, and fit them for the stage. The instruments that are made the principal objects of study are of course Piano and Violin, and each student is obliged unconditionally to devote himself to one or the other of these two. The violinists are exercised in Solo, Quartet and Orchestra playing. The organ is unfortunately not much attended to. Those, who desire to learn the common wind instruments, can do so by paying an extra fee, though it does not form part of the regular course. An opportunity is afforded to those who particularly excel on any instrument to appear at some public performance, either in orchestra, chorus, or solo.

"Besides the regular exercises, the pupils meet together one evening in the week, and those who have studied any work to the satisfaction of the teacher during the past week, perform it for the benefit of the whole assembly. These soirées are attended by the friends and families of the Professors, and frequently by distinguished artists who are visiting the city. As for instance, the past fortnight the students have been inspired by the presence of the first of living German composers, Dr. ROBERT SCHUMANN. He has twice honored these assemblies with his presence, and several of his compositions were performed in his hearing, at which he evinced great satisfaction. His wife also accompanied him, and played several pieces. This lady (formerly CLARA WIECK) ranks among the first pianists of the day, and certainly stands at the head of those of her sex.

"Two examinations are held every year, one a private one, at which the pupils are classified according to the progress they have made, — and one, a public exhibition or concert, at which the more advanced only are allowed to appear, either as composers or performers. The privilege of attending the rehearsals of the series of concerts that is given every winter in the 'Gewandhaus,' as well as of most others, is also afforded to the pupils.

"The Government of the institution is entrusted to five gentlemen, who are professed admirers of the art, and who discharge their office without compensation. The discipline is by no means more strict than every scholar who zealously engages in the study of music, would willingly submit to. The regulations are very simple, viz., that the scholars shall attend regularly the exercises, appear at no public performance without special leave, and in general conduct themselves orderly and submit to the direction of the Government of the Institution. Each pupil on leaving the Conservatory, receives a testimonial or degree, stating his time of study and his comparative proficiency in the art.

"As was said above, the expense is comparatively trifling, and within the means of almost every aspirant for musical knowledge. A fund has been given by the King of Saxony, by which a limited number, whose means will not otherwise allow it, can be educated free of expense.

"The professors of the Institution are such as enjoy a universal reputation, and are many of them of Mendelssohn's own selection and appointment. Among them are MOSCHELES, Instructor of the Piano, DAVID of the Violin, and HAUPTMANN of Harmony.

"Such are the main features and advantages of this system of musical instruction. It were to be wished most heartily by all lovers of music, that such an Institution could be founded in every large city of our own country. The rapidly growing taste of our good people seems to demand some such effort, and from present appearances we may certainly encourage the hope. Objections have been made to the system of instruction in classes, but these are equally applicable to other studies as well as music. To be sure, where a pupil in a private lesson receives the undivided attention of his instructor for the space of an hour, in the class he receives individually only a fraction of the same. But this comparatively trifling evil is more than counterbalanced by the advantages, as we have above hinted. The pupil becomes acquainted with many different styles, sees the beauties and the faults of each, and is imperceptibly led in this way to the formation of his own. Again, by being constantly compelled to perform before others, he cannot fail to acquire a degree of confidence, which is beneficial and necessary to every public performer. How often do we see an instance of a private pupil, when summoned unexpectedly to an exhibition of himself, completely thrown off his guard by the presence of an assembled company, and so far from doing himself justice, making a total failure. If time admitted, we might enumerate many other advantages, to the truth of which we can testify from personal experience. As it is, for the present, our word must be taken for it, and we can only conclude with the hope, that the little insight we may have given into the system and zeal with which exertions are made in Europe in the cause of this absorbing study, may be of some slight assistance in stimulating our musical countrymen to similar endeavors."

The foregoing will be read with interest, especially by such young men as are thinking of fitting themselves for the musical profession. The time is past when one can expect to succeed well, who takes up music and pursues it professionally without a suitable previous preparation. It is not necessary, indeed, that all teachers should be learned musicians; many excellent teachers in different musical departments there may be, who have made but little progress in musical science; but still we need such as shall be able to pursue musical investigations, and give tone to the general character of American music. Such we shall have when men like Willis, Parker, and others whom we might mention, devote themselves to the work.

In addition to what Mr. P. has said, we will remark in relation to expense, that it will cost a man about as much to live in Leipsic a year as it will to live in Boston or New York a year. One may, perhaps, live somewhat cheaper here, but this is not realized often. And the young men who come here generally find the expenses considerably more than they had been led to expect. Some live on four hundred dollars, more expend six hundred, and it is not safe for one, who has been accustomed to city life in the United States and who intends to attend the concerts, (which is quite necessary), to make his calculations to get along with less than about eight hundred dollars per annum; and then he must not be disappointed if he finds himself minus say two hundred dollars at the end of the year. But if a man has tried it and finds that he can live on five hundred dollars per annum in New York; then he may safely conclude that the same sum will answer his purposes in Leipsic, or other German cities.

In addition to the names of Professors given by Mr. P. we will add the following, all of which are to a greater or less extent connected with the Conservatory; RICHTER, RIETZ, PAPPERITZ, PLAIDY, WENZEL, BECKER, DREYSCHOCK, (violinist,) HERRMANN, and KLENGEL.

Success to the young men of America, who, having the necessary talent, shall devote themselves to the study and advancement of musical science and art in the land! By-and-by, when we shall have some MARY LYON to devote herself to the work, we shall have a Conservatory, with the buildings all erected and paid for, like the Mount Holyoke School in Massachusetts. Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 24, 1852.

The Old Church Modes or "Tones."

There has been manifested of late more or less of a tendency, in the sphere of Sacred Music, to go back for models even to times earlier than Art itself. The severity, solemnity and grand simplicity of the old ecclesiastical chants has won many to the belief, that here was the only sacred music; that in those old traditional tunes, plain, yet inimitable, the prayers and pious aspirations of Christendom once for all were inspired with a form of utterance, to be forevermore repeated in all public worship. It is the same sort of sentiment, which led Cornelius, and other painters of his school, to try to shut out the daylight of the present, and paint by the dim, consecrated halo of a Past, when faith was more in earnest than it now seems; and Schlegel to do the same thing in literature. Elegant treatises and collections are multiplied in England, setting forth the beauties of the Church Modes in Music; and it is even intimated by the zealous ones in this direction, that the richer modern music, the Masses of Haydn and Mozart and Cherubini, the Oratorios of Handel, &c., are a degenerate, worldly music, compared with these inspired, and as it were, ordained forms of solemn song.

How reasonable this is, may appear from a few considerations, which we only briefly hint.

Music has passed through three states: the state of nature; the state of prescription, or ordinance; and the state of Free Art. Which is the highest? Which should afford most full and perfect utterance to man's highest, holiest aspirations, — in a word to the Unitary, the Religious sentiment?

All histories of Music open with quotations from the bibles and traditions of the nations, showing its earliest public uses to have been religious. The simplest language which the private or the social heart knew for its joys and griefs, was naturally the best that could suggest itself to the fresh instincts of the early races for their temple service and communion with the common Parent. Slight must have been the difference then between secular and sacred music. It was all sacred, for it was of the heart; it was all secular, for it sprang spontaneously from child-like intimacy with nature, when the sense of the supernatural was not divorced from any natural experience.

And what sort of melodies were those thus born in common life and consecrated at the altar? Mere stammerings and ignorant gropings after Melody; simple, rude and grave (they would now seem), even although mirth-inspired — for there was no Scale of tones established, and of course no Harmony; nor was there through all the glowing period of Grecian art, in which we hear such marvellous effects ascribed to Music, nor even until far down into the Christian centuries. — Talking began before grammar; and Music began before Scales, Thorough Bass, or Counterpoint.

It is not to be wondered, that these primitive rude germs of Melody, adopted into the keeping of the first ministers of religion, Pagan, Hebrew, or Christian, should have become traditional and stationary models, consecrated as the sole legitimate forms of music, so that they really checked the free and natural unfolding of the Art. In the history of Music, as in our own lives, it may be true that the ghosts of our past habits, if we respect them too much, paralyze present endeavor. As every religion, every cultus, however true and fresh out of the heart and heaven once, almost immediately entered its slow phase of superstition, dogmatism, and exclusivism; so these first tuneful aspirations of an age before Art, being adopted by the church, became dull psalms and ordinances, which the creative genius did not dare to overstep. As the priests took the conscience and the thinking of men into their own keeping, so they became the keepers of the infancy of Music; and closely was the child kept to its cradle, as if it had no destiny beyond, — rocked by certain rules and theories out of the brains of bookish monks and pedants, who allowed it only that expansion and no airing in the secular and growing world of nature and of genius. Those rules and theories, (the slowly creeping so-called Science of Music), as well as the plain old stock of tunes and chants out of whose substance it was all derived, were a Greek legacy, — an outright adoption of the Greek Modes or Scales, which were no scales at all, — at least not Nature's Scale, — inasmuch as they had not the means of Harmony, but were to a great extent mere barren sequences of notes in unison. Yet to their conventional and scarcely melodious series, to their consecrated poverty of tones, was all the science of the priestly guardians of Music limited. The Music of the first five or six ages of the Christian Church consisted of the simple Canto Fermo or "Plain-Chant," called after Ambrose and Pope Gregory, which was sung in unison or octaves. No harmony, no parts appear in the old Missals, Rituals, and Antiphonaria. Indeed, says Dr. Burney, "the chants of the first ages have no other constituent part of good music than that of moving in some of the intervals belonging to the Diatonic scale; nor do any stronger marks of selection and design appear in them, than might be expected in a melody formed by a fortuitous concurrence of musical sounds." (Vol. II, 41.)

Nor is it to be wondered, again, that out of this very self-denial and limitation there should have been a certain positive gain of masculine vigor and sublimity. The superior richness and variety which some enthusiasts about the "only genuine" old sacred music find in the Ecclesiastical or Gregorian Tones, so called, is not to be set down altogether to imagination and to the peculiar ears of "Pusey-ism." We may smile at their assertion of the degeneracy of all modern music, as if every deviation from the twelve church Modes or Tones or Scales, were a corruption and approach to worldliness. We may point also to the fallacy of supposing that the old works were richer in their twelve scales, borrowed from the Greek, than we are in our two, which we call Major and Minor. We may easily show that their twelve authentics and plagals were simply our one scale in a sheathed state of half-development, (as Goethe says that snakes and fishes are sheathed men). The seven notes of our natural Diatonic Scale were the fixed elements of each and all of them; the semi-tones had not yet got their arms out; and at this point the serial unfolding was arrested. Yet we may well admit that each Mode had a genius, or character peculiar to itself. Only it was the character acquired by various modes of limiting oneself in Melody. They were so many arbitrary species of self-denial, such as the limiting of thoughts and words to lines of certain length and rhyme, which Byron thought not altogether uninspiring when he buckled to it. Let this serve for the present. We shall resume the subject more particularly.

Franz Schubert.

It is not generally known that this rare genius manifested itself in other fields of the musical art, besides that of the immortal Song-composer. But since his early death, day after day has been disclosing manuscript upon manuscript of his, in which his creative activity and rich imagination had been embodying themselves in all the greater and lesser forms of composition. With a true Shakspearian carelessness about present fame, he published little or nothing of these; but, writing because his soul was full, because he could not help it, he left the beauteous offspring of his brain to find their own way in the world, as chance or the concern of admiring friends might rescue this or that opera, symphony or quartet from the fate of mere waste paper. In the hands of his heirs in Vienna, these piles of MSS. became as good as bank bills, or stock-certificates in the ever growing, never depreciating fund of his artistic fame.

Our friend, Mr. H. Perabeau, has kindly furnished us the following statement with regard to the compositions Schubert left behind him. Brief as it is, it includes truly an astonishing catalogue!

"FRANZ SCHUBERT was born on the 31st of January, 1797, and died the 19th of November, 1828, in Vienna. This talented composer lived and died almost unnoticed by the world at large. Devoted exclusively to the art and not seeking fame, he wrote in his short career about 145 musical works. A great admirer of BEETHOVEN, he may be said to have been the only one approaching this immortal master in the conception of elevated and grand ideas in his symphonies, and unsurpassed in his celebrated Songs. Having studied music without any master, his instrumental compositions sometimes overleap the general plan and unity of the whole, bringing in quite foreign parts, which sometimes would have been better omitted. As to the difficulty of execution, he never took any notice of it, but wrote whatever his genius dictated at the moment, thus making his works very difficult. Among his works we notice:

"His first Quartet for strings, op. 29, in A min.; two Quartets, op. 125, in E flat and E; grand Quartet op. posth. in F; grand Quintet for piano and strings, op. 114, in A maj.; first grand Trio for piano, violin and 'cello, op. 99; second grand Trio for piano, etc. op. 100, in E flat, a famous work; Serenade for piano, violin and 'cello, op. 124; Rondo brillant for piano and violin, op. 70; three Sonatinas op. 137; many compositions, as Sonatas, Marches, Variations, etc. for piano with four hands; two grand Sonatas for piano alone, op. 42 in A min. and op. 53 in D; three grand Sonatas (op. posth.). Many compositions for piano alone. Mass for four voices and orchestra, op. 48; another, op. 141; Tantum ergo, four voices and orchestra, op. 45; two Offertoires for soprano or tenor, with orchestra and organ, op. 46 and 47; Antienne for Palm Sunday, four voices, op. 113; the 23d Psalm, for two sopranos and two contraltos with organ, op. 132. Songs for four male voices, op. 11, 14, 16, 17, 28, 61. About three hundred Songs, to words by Goethe, Schlegel, Ruckert, Heine, etc.

"Most of his works were left in MSS., as: six Masses; twelve Symphonies, of which MENDELSSOHN had one (in C maj.) published; ten Operas: viz., the Spiegelritter, Teufels Lustschloss, Claudine de Villa Bella, Rosamunde, Les Conjurés, Die Minnesaenger, Les Amis de Salamanque, Fernando, Fier-a-bras, Le mauvais Ménage, and two unfinished ones: Adraste and Sacrotale.

"Among his Songs published after his death is 'Die Waldesnacht,' by Schlegel, undoubtedly the greatest of all his Songs. The figures in the accompaniment carry you on like the storm-wind through the old pine-woods, which fall cracking before this mighty element; the lightning flames in the dark night, etc. 'Gruppe aus dem Tartarus' ('Groups from Tartarus') by Schiller, is another very characteristic Song. Very many of his fine compositions are still unknown.

His too powerful and active spirit destroyed his body in the bloom of life, (31 years old,) as was the case with MENDELSSOHN, WEBER, MOZART, etc. His last request was, to be buried next to BEETHOVEN.

"THE THREE MUSICAL JOURNALS." — Such is the title of a very friendly editorial in the last number of Mr. WILLIS's "Musical Times," welcoming our advent. Kind words, indeed, have saluted us from almost all quarters of the Press; and they are the more encouraging, that we have not in any instance sought them, and that we fancy we detect in their tone a certain genuine cordiality, distinguishing them from mere puffs in the way of business. We really think of appointing some one steward and secretary to our vanity, who shall take pride in editing a Leporello catalogue of our conquests in this line. But we especially value the aforesaid generous notice from an older contemporary in musical journalism, since it at once establishes a true relation between our several enterprises (all to one good end, however, let us hope,) instead of that foolish and unnecessary notion of rivalry. We cannot forbear copying the piece, which is as follows:

We have received from our friend, Mr. Dwight, of Boston, the first number of his very attractive Journal of Music. It looks trim, tidy and Boston-y, very handsome type being put upon very handsome paper. A peculiarity of the journal is, that no music is given, the columns containing exclusively letter-press matter. The contents bear more or less the impress of Mr. Dwight's own mind, the quality of which is admirably known to ourselves, and to a large circle of readers.—There are now three journals in operation, devoted to the general interests of the art of music: Dwight's, the Musical World, and our own.—Well—this is not too many, (considering the large public they appeal to.) There is room enough for us all. Particularly so, because the three papers will differ essentially in their distinctive characters. Time, we doubt not, will fully develop what we will not, here, nearer define. The Musical Times will be essentially professional, useful, and educational. Perhaps we have a right to claim this character for our journal, from the peculiar advantages which we accidentally possess over others. Mr. Dwight, we observe, disclaims in his editorial article any "ex cathedra" character for his paper, (though we half suspect the entire justice of his disclaimer) his language being "Without being in any sense a thoroughly bred musician, either in theory or practice, we have found ourselves, as long as we could remember, full of the appeal which this most mystical and yet most human Art, (so perfectly intelligible to feeling, if not to the understanding,) has never ceased to make to us, &c." A plan has been projected, to stamp the Musical Times with a character peculiar to itself, which will distinguish it from every other paper.

This is as it should be, and as we would have it. There is room enough for all of us. The field is vast, and cannot be covered by one journal, unless that one be endowed like a great University of Art, with editors, professors, libraries and treasury unlimited. We by no means dreamed of instituting the musical journal, but only of contributing, in journal form, and in our own way, (which of course cannot be just that of any body else) our mite to the cause of true and worthy views of Art in our community;—perhaps even something approaching a philosophy of Art and of the Beautiful. We hope to make an æsthetic paper; looking at music and the other arts mainly from the æsthetic point of view, as so many expressive languages and utterances of what is best and deepest in the human soul; and only secondarily and incidentally from the scientific point.

Mr. Willis marks out for himself a most important and interesting field of labor. We need his "professional" expositions of the science and productions of the divine art; and we doubt not his entire competency to the task. He proposes to "teach by mail," that is, to give "a complete course of musical instruction through his weekly columns." The course will comprise: 1. Elementary instruction; 2. Harmony and Counterpoint; 3. Musical Form—or the Architecture of music (showing the musical structure of compositions, such as Sonatas, Symphonies, &c.); 4. Instrumentation." This feature of the "Times" we can commend to all who wish to know more about music; and we may add that the contents of the last number altogether are full of interest and instruction.

From our other most enterprising, business-like, news-crammed musical neighbor in Gotham, the Musical World, we must also acknowledge a flattering welcome, although it assigns us a province too much like the German town of Weiss-nicht-wo, in saying that our articles will be read with pleasure "especially by the transcendental lovers of music."

Still our plans for News are balked! This time the evil spirit of the East wind is answerable in part. A budget of interesting New York matters, "Philharmonic," "Eisfeldt," &c., has come to hand just as we go to press. But it will do next week.

We only find room to say that THALBERG positively comes over late in the summer.

Local.

MRS. DE RIBAS. Miss Garcia has in years past contributed not a little to our higher musical occasions. In the Oratorios of the "Handel and Haydn," her sweet and flexible voice, and modest, sincere style were always agreeable. The Complimentary Concert announced for her in another column, to take place next Saturday, should prove that Bostonians appreciate their obligations both to herself and to her husband. Sig. DE RIBAS is one of our most useful musicians; in our principal orchestra, from the Academy time to this, his oboe has been remarked as one of the good points; and this inclement winter, in spite of very poor health, he has been always at his post.—By the way, looking over an old volume of the London Musical World, (for 1837), some days since, we chanced upon the following notice of his brother and himself:

MR. RIBAS'S CONCERT took place on Wednesday evening at the Hanover Square rooms, to a large and fashionable audience. The scheme was both various and excellent, but too long. Mr. Ribas performed an adagio polonaise, and a fantasia on the flute, both his own writing, with exquisite purity of tone and polished execution. His brother too—quite a lad,—distinguished himself in a solo, by Vogt, on the oboe. He will become a very fine player, for his tone is beautiful, and his execution already surprising for his years.

Our friends of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, during the storm last week, made a little professional excursion to the valley of the Connecticut. After performing, to great acceptance, at an Academic Exhibition at Amherst College, and giving a concert in Northampton, they passed the next morning, socially and musically, with the GOLDSCHMIDTS on Round Hill, where they were most cordially received. Quintets, &c. were tried over, Mr. Goldschmidt at the piano. And we happen to know, (what perhaps our friends will like to know was said not merely to themselves,) that their style of playing classic music was warmly commended by their hosts.

The Club are to give a series at Lawrence.

There is absolutely no chance of a concert in Boston from Mrs. GOLDSCHMIDT. She considers the three announced as due to the New Yorkers, as they were disappointed in the last serving round, owing to the death of her mother. They break up the Round Hill nest in a fortnight, and make the rest of their brief stay in America at New York.

For the farewell concerts an orchestra of eighty is engaged, of the very best artists in that city, to be led by BURKE. Also M. APPY, the violinist, and BADIALI, the noble baritone, with whom Mrs. G. is to sing a duet from the "Huguenots." Mr. GOLDSCHMIDT has composed a concerto for piano with orchestra for one of these occasions. For the rest, as far as we can learn, the repertoire is to be mainly the old one; in spite of excellent appeals in the Courier and Inquirer and the Tribune for one classical programme.

We heard Mr. WOLOWSKI on Saturday. It was a thin house and therefore perhaps uninspiring to him. In spite of the skill displayed, the breadth of harmony, &c., we still could not see the use of playing on two pianos with one pair of hands. But Mr. W. is full of conviction that there is something in it, something suited to a genuine want or impulse of certain musical natures, like his own; he wishes it understood that he was embarrassed that night by the fact that one of the instruments was new, and therefore to the fingers like new boots to the feet, we suppose. He is not daunted, but seems very much in earnest about giving a fair sample of his talent by another concert in Boston, for which he is now in New York to engage the assistance of a pair of prime donne. These may more attract the multitude, but the delightful Quintet of Beethoven that night by the MENDELSSOHN CLUB was one of the sweetest possible crumbs of comfort, amid what did seem to us rather an indefinite waste of skilful,—we can hardly say clear, or expressive,—execution of quite poor music. Did LISZT really write such a farrago as that "Fantaisie on the Revolution of '48," with the 380 notes in one bar? If so, it was unworthy of him.

The set of Mazurkas by CHOPIN was of course good; but how strange the style, how headlong the time, how perplexing the expression, of that rendering of them!

We do not condemn, since Mr. Wolowski seems to feel it in him to convert us to his manner—two pianos and all—by repeated trials. He is an exiled Pole, of high birth and feelings, who has suffered, had trying and romantic experiences, and should feel music, like a soul that truly needs to love it. In all this he has our sympathy; but after Goldschmidt, Jaell, Rackemann, Lange, &c. &c., we must in honesty say we missed much in his playing, though the Dailies said that everybody was delighted. Whose fault is it, if Mr. W. expects too much of Boston?

New York.

MADAM THILLON is still singing, and still more acting, Auber's operettes at Niblo's.—Mrs. BOSTWICK has given a concert at Brooklyn.—We were hoping the good genius would inspire our "Hafiz" to write us something about those EISELDT'S QUARTET SOIREEs; but how can an Eastern poet sing through such East winds as ours?—so we must even borrow from his friend and ours, "Howadji" of the Tribune, who says:

MR. EISELDT'S Concert of Saturday evening April 3, is not less fair, as it recedes in memory. A programme with no lesser name than Spohr, and the others, Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Haydn, may well "give us pause" awhile, and we be still the gainers. We liked best the performance of Beethoven's Quartet. The instruments went as one; they sang like a dreaming organ—if organs do dream, or if in dreaming they sing. A musical friend near us preferred the Haydn Quartet, and we could not quarrel. In fact, like certain other artists, the gentlemen of these Quartets are always good. Their degrees are upward from that. Sometimes they may be better, often best, but never less than good. President TIMM, of the Philharmonic, assisted them. We had not heard him in public for a long time. But custom cannot stale the pleasure of his smooth, neat, clear and graceful performance. The notes do not sparkle from his touch, but they drip translucent from his fingers. His style has a transparent character, like the watery richness of musical glasses. It is fine, not forcible,—sweet, not magnificent. His Excellency's fingers are almost dandies, so point-de-vie they are, with such white-kid-daintiness they trip along the keys. For President TIMM, among musicians, amateurs and the public, there is but one party, and its name is legion—the party of his friends.

LECTURES ON MUSIC. WM. HENRY FRY, Esq., proposes a course of lectures upon the Science and Art of Music, and upon the most colossal scale. Yet imposing as is his programme, it does not seem to us impossible, and of the very great benefit and actual necessity of such an undertaking there is no doubt. Mr. Fry's proposition is nothing less than to give a general, and, to a fair extent, adequate comprehension of the whole subject of musical composition, including its scientific relations, its history, its ethics and its æsthetics.

To accomplish this design, which implies extensive illustration, the following essentials are named: A corps of principal Italian vocalists; a grand chorus of one hundred singers; an orchestra of eighty performers; a military band of fifty performers.

Lectures of this scope are clearly not matters to be lightly undertaken and executed, and ample time is allowed for preparation, because negotiations must be commenced with artists. Ten lectures are proposed, at five dollars for the course, and ten thousand dollars is the estimated whole expense. The proposal has a lordly air, and it promises such real advantages to the many who love music and yet know nothing about it, that we shall hope for its entire success.—N. Y. Tribune.

England.

LONDON seems to be the point to which just now the nervous fluids in the European body musical are setting the most strongly. In the great world, the musical centre shifts about from season to season; though most of the said shifting is but a pouring back and forth out of one glass into the other, between London and Paris. But go to the lesser world of many a German city, if you would find the tuneful humor moderate and constant, as the daily air we breathe, with the supply of means and skill unailing. And first:

THE TWO OPERAS. The first-class prime donne, tenori, bassi profondi, &c. are now all in London, or have their faces set that way. The Royal Opera was to commence on Saturday, March 27th, and Lumley's on the Tuesday following. The Evening Gazette sums up as follows:

Both the Italian Opera Houses selected "Maria di Rohan" for their opening night. At Lumley's Fiorentini, Ida Bertrand and Ferlotti, appear in this singular opera. At Covent Garden, Castellan, Mdle. Seguin, Tamberlik and Ronconi, take the principal rôles. This selection forebodes a severe competition for the season of 1852, and proves Lumley boldly defiant as he challenges Ronconi in his greatest rôle, and makes play for the prize from the very start. Both managers by their programmes and lengthy notices from journals friendly to them, promise largely for the amusement of their patrons. Lumley offers two operas new to London, one by Prince Albert's brother, and the other by Flotow, a composer of some distinction in Germany. In "Martha" Madame Sontag has achieved great success. "The Martyrs," brought out here by the Handel and Haydn Society as an oratorio a few years since, is promised at the Royal Opera, to introduce Tamberlik in the hero. "William Tell" is also set forth as the great opportunity for Ronconi, Fornes and Marini. To meet this, Don Giovanni is to have Sontag, Cruvelli and Wagner, as Zerlina, Donna Anna, and Elvira. "Carl Benson" declares Sontag has fallen off and now sings in the French tinny style. He also considers Grisi decidedly passé, but admits Tamberlik and Fornes to be first rate.

BALFE'S new opera, "The Sicilian Bride," produced at Drury Lane, seems to have been an entire failure.

THE TWO GRAND ORCHESTRAS. The Old and the New "Philharmonic" have each given their first concert. The old society has long stood among the first orchestras in Europe and exercised a sort of prescriptive right of acting as interpreters in chief of the great symphonies of Mozart, Beethoven, &c. To this they grew by yearly study upon these great works, after being at first staggered by the "uncouth singularities" of this latter giant, in whose "Pastoral Symphony" they were wont to curtail the lovely Andante! They have been charged with too exclusive a regard for the old masters, too narrow a definition (practically) of the word "classical," with black-balling men of the first merit, like Moscheles and Costa. But COSTA now is their conductor, and the Society is said to be more liberal towards new composers, as well as more truly than ever up to the classic standard in performance. The sound of the new Berlioz trumpet seems only to have aroused new energy and courage in the old camp. The concert was on the 15th ult. and the room filled with subscribers. See what a programme!

PART I.

SYMPHONY—No. 12, Haydn.
ARIA—"Land of My Sires," Mr. Sims
Reeves, (Joseph) Mehl.
CONCERTO—No. 2, Piano Forte, M. Hallé, Mendelssohn.
ARIA—"Ho spavento," Madame Castellan, (Atalia) Weber.
OVERTURE—"Zauberflöte," Mozart.

PART II.

SINFONIA EROICA, Beethoven.
ARIA—"Ah ritorna," Madame Castellan, Mendelssohn.
VIOLIN FANTASIA—"Lucia di Lammermoor," Signor Sivori, Sivori.
DUETTO—Madame Castellan and Mr. Sims Reeves, "Don Giovanni," Mozart.
OVERTURE—"Preciosa," Weber.
Conductor, Mr. COSTA.

The "new Philharmonic" opened in Exeter Hall, before an audience of two thousand. The orchestra numbered one hundred and thirty instruments, and we can judge something of its composition when we are told that Sivori and Bottesini, whom we know, headed respectively the violins and double-basses. Its stringed band numbers sixty-eight. What could the other sixty-two have been? we read however of twelve harps employed for certain occasional effects. With HECTOR BERLIOZ for conductor, and such forces waiting on his baton, and the "Jupiter" symphony to begin with, the orchestral art was surely glorified on that occasion! The programme, though the society found the ground of its existence in the desire to cultivate acquaintance with the noteworthy of modern, as well as the old standard kinds of music, is this time mainly very sound and orthodox, except in the selection of the first part of the "Dramatic Symphony" of "Romeo and Juliet" by BERLIOZ. We give the whole:

PART I.

SYMPHONY in C—"Jupiter," Mozart.
SELECTION from Iphigenie in Tauride, Gluck.
TRIUMPH CONCERTO—Piano Forte, Violin, and Violoncello, M. Silas, Sivori and Piatti, Beethoven.
OVERTURE—Oberon, Weber.

PART II.

The first part of ROMEO AND JULIET, a dramatic Symphony, with Solos and Chorus, by Hector Berlioz.
FANTASIE—Contra Basso, Signor Bottesini, Bottesini.
OVERTURE—"Guillaume Tell," Rossini.
Conductor, HECTOR BERLIOZ.

Most of the critics seem to have given in to Berlioz, and express wonder and delight at the bold and singular effects of instrumentation in this dramatic symphony.

The CLASSIC CHAMBER MUSIC on all its dozen social social hearths was still glowing bright, diffusing genial warmth. HALLE still stands at the head in this kind, as pianist.—Mr. AGUILAR gave three soirées devoted exclusively to the Piano Forte works of Beethoven.—Mr. DANDO's fifth Quartet Concert comprised Haydn's Quartet, No. 26; Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor, with Miss Loder for pianist; Mozart's Quartet, No. 7; and Spohr's Double Quartet, op. 87, together with five German songs.

Of our old friend LOUIS RACKEMANN, the London Musical World says: "He has announced a soirée musicale, when he purposes playing, in conjunction with M. Molique, sonatas by Mozart and Beethoven, and several of the piano forte works by Mendelssohn, Chopin and Stephen Heller. The lovers of these authors will have a treat of a high order."

ORATORIO. The Sacred Harmonic Society and its rival the London Harmonic, were fully engaged upon oratorio, with seven to eight hundred performers and the best solo talent. "The Creation" had been performed by each; Costa's society having Reeves and Clara Novello; and Sarman's, Miss Birch, Lockey, and H. Phillips. "Israel and Egypt" had been given by Costa's society. The chief singers were Miss Birch, Miss A. Loder, Miss Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Lawler, and Mr. Phillips. "Samson" had been found so attractive with Sims Reeves in the hero, and Mrs. Endershon as Dalila, that another repeat was required. Beside those distinguished vocalists, Miss Dolby, Weiss, and H. Phillips took parts.—Evening Gazette.

ORGANS. The musical World of London is not content with all imaginable concerts, but luxuriates in large gatherings to hear new organs discoursed upon with the best skill and fancy in combination of stops by some very celebrated player.

Willis's great organ, left almost solitary and alone in the Crystal Palace, attracted thousands of church-organ amateurs to hear it well played.—Id.

KALOZDY'S HUNGARIAN BAND had been playing at the St. James's Theatre. Berlioz heard them with high satisfaction, and observed, "they played with irreproachable precision."—See an article on an earlier page.

LATER ITEMS.

Both the Italian opera houses commenced their season to fair, though not large audiences. The second opera presented at Covent Garden was William Tell, in which Marini appeared and Herr Ander, a new tenor from Germany, who failed to make a great sensation. Ferlotti, the new baritone, was successful at the other house, and Calzolari is said to have gained volume and flexibility of voice. Guasco and Negrin had not yet appeared—both have great reputé among tenors. The second Philharmonic Concert was honored by the Queen and Prince Albert's attendance. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony was superbly rendered, and the old Society again claimed the highest orchestral honors. Sims Reeves, Ronconi and Castellan were the vocalists, but produced no marked effect on the audience.—Eve. Gazette.

A CONCERT AUDIENCE of 40,000!—The interior of the Crystal Palace, whose fate now hangs in suspense, was recently made the arena of a grand Musical Promenade, designed to aid the project of perpetuation.

The time fixed for the promenade was from two to five. At two only a very few persons entered the building, and the appearance in the vicinity at that time almost prognosticated a failure of the scheme. The accessions proceeded very slowly for some time, but they became at length so rapid that before 4 o'clock there were not less than 40,000 persons present, of which number upward of 32,000 paid a shilling for admission, while the remainder had been admitted by ticket. From 3-12 till after 5 the entire length of the building was occupied with promenaders, the sides only being left vacant. From the moment when the doors were opened, the centre of the transept became again the chief point of attraction, though the favorite fountain had vanished. Here were the bands of seven of our choicest regiments, whose services had been handsomely granted for the occasion by the respective commanders; and a few minutes after, five of these opened the promenade by marching successively, playing as they proceeded to the stations which had been assigned to them; and they continued to play there during the whole period of the promenade, the intervals of rest being so arranged as to prevent any inconvenient jarring or contest of sounds. The building reverberated for three hours with a performance of standard pieces, as judiciously selected as they were admirably executed.

FREDERIC CHOPIN.

BY FRANZ LISZT.

II.

Had we here to talk the language of the School about the development of piano forte music, we should proceed to analyze the contents of those noble pages, which present so rich a harvest of observations. We should in the first line examine those Nottornos, Ballads, Impromptus, Scherzos, which are all full of unexpected and unheard of subtleties of harmony. We should then seek these same refinements in his Polonaises, Mazourkas, Waltzes and Boleros. But here is neither time nor place for that; such a work would only be of interest to those initiated into Counterpoint and Thorough Bass.

Through the feeling that flows forth in all of them, these works have spread and become much loved in large circles; and this feeling is in the highest degree romantic, individual, peculiar, and yet related not only to that people, which has to thank him for one more celebrity, but also to all hearts, that were ever touched by the misery of exile and by the sentiment of love.

Meanwhile CHOPIN was not always contented with those frames, within which he sketched his happily chosen figures; he would also bring his thoughts into the limits of the classic form. He has written fine Concertos, and fine Sonatas; but it is not difficult to discern in these productions rather the will, the purpose, than the inspiration. This last with him was capricious, arbitrary, fantastical, bound to no reflection; he had to give it free play, and he did violence to his genius, as we think, as often as he thought to chain it to traditional rule, to classification, to a command, which did not harmonize with the inmost peculiarity of his spiritual nature; for this belonged to the class of those which unfold in the most amiable and graceful way, precisely when they let the tide float them where it will. Therefore we consider these attempts as less successful. CHOPIN could not imprison the wavering, never sharply defined outlines, which lend his thoughts their highest charm, within the stiff, angular framework of a precise pattern. It would not allow itself to be arrested so, that undetermined, evanescent element, which, airy and impalpable, disguises the Kantian skeleton of Form, and robes it in long folds, woven, as it were, of autumn clouds, like the misty garments of the shapes of Ossian, when, borne upon a passing cloud, they show a gentle countenance to mortals.

Nevertheless these efforts are decidedly distinguished by a rare nobility of style, and contain passages of high interest and movements of surprising grandeur of thought. We may mention, for example, the Adagio of the Second Concerto, to which he was particularly partial and which he was very fond of playing. The embellishments in this belong to the finest manner of the composer, and the leading thought is kept up with a wonderful breadth. The entire movement is ideally perfect, and the expression of the feeling now bright and gleaming, now touching and penetrating. It wakes the image of a noble landscape, swimming in a sea of light, some blissful Tempe, which one has chosen for the spot, in which to tell a mournful story. It is like the thought of an irreparable loss, which falls upon the human heart in the midst of the splendor of beautiful nature; a contrast, kept up by a melting away of tones and an incomparable gradation of tints preventing anything abrupt or hard from mingling a dissonance in the impression, which lends to joy the color of melancholy, and to pain the light of cheerfulness.

How can we omit to mention the "Funeral March" in his first Sonata, which, for the first time arranged for orchestra, was played at his own burial! No other tones could have expressed, in a language, which so goes through the soul, the anguish and the tears, which must have accompanied that man to his last resting place, who had so sublimely conceived the manner in which a great loss should be wept! One of his young countrymen said once to me: "Only a Pole could have written this!" And in fact, all that there is solemn and heart-rending in the funeral procession of a whole nation, weeping its own death, resounds in this funeral strain. You feel it, here is not wept the death of a hero, whom other heroes live to avenge, but the death of a whole race, of whom only women, children and priests survive, to bear witness to the tale. Whatever pure and holy feeling, whatever renunciation, faith and hope these bear within their hearts, it is all sounding, quivering, trembling in the vibrations of these tones.

But not in all his works does grief wear only this color. On the contrary, you find many passages, in which a smothered scorn, a stifled fury are portrayed; several of his Etudes, indeed his Scherzos, depict a suppressed chagrin, which breaks out now in ironical, and now in proud despair. These dark outpourings of his muse have passed more unmarked and have been less understood, than his poems of tenderer coloring. Perhaps CHOPIN's personal character has contributed to this. Kindly disposed, friendly, accessible, always in equally cheerful humor, he suffered his exterior to betray but little of the malady, that inwardly consumed him.

This character of his was not one easily comprehended. It was composed of a thousand sorts of nuances, crossing and veiling one another, and indeed in ways impossible, a prima vista, to decipher. One could be very easily deceived about what he thought in the bottom of his soul, as is generally the case with the Slavonic race. The noble freedom, the graciousness, and even the unconstraint and captivating desinvolture of their manners, by no means includes confidence and frank communication. What they think and feel, veils and conceals itself like the rings of a snake, that coils up upon itself; to find its links, you must observe it very accurately and sharply. It would be very naïve to take their courteous complaisance, their assumed modesty literally. The forms of this smooth politeness and seeming absence of pretence are in accordance with their manners, which have acquired something strikingly Oriental from their earlier frequent intercourse with the East. Without being quite infected by the Turkish silence, yet this has taught them a mistrustful reserve in all those things, that touch the tender or secret chords; and if they speak about themselves, you may feel assured, that under a subtle, inquiring, and ironical smile, which you cannot come at, they screen all the deeper realities of their soul, which are hard to divine and to interpret.

CHOPIN's feeble organization moreover denied him the energetic expression of his passions, and so he revealed only the soft and amiable side thereof to his friends. In the thronged and bustling world of the great cities, where every one has enough to do with himself and no time to guess the riddle of another's life, and where accordingly every one is judged simply by his outward activity, few naturally ever think to take the pains to cast a searching glance through the surface into the interior of a character. But whoever was brought into confidential and frequent contact with CHOPIN, could in many instances remark, how impatient and annoyed he was at being so readily taken at his word! And the artist could not avenge the man. CHOPIN was too feeble to betray this feeling by the stormy energy of his playing; he sought to compensate himself by writing those pages, on which floats the passionate humor of a man, whose heart is more deeply wounded than he is willing to confess—just as about a frigate proudly decked with pendants, although on the point of sinking, the planks swim on the surface, which the waves have torn from its ribs. How he loved to listen, when this angry depth of the sea in his own soul, which murmurs in those tone-poems, roared out under the hands of another player with the power, which nature had denied himself!

The consequences of such impressions are of the more importance to the life of CHOPIN, the more they manifested themselves afterwards in his works. They gradually begot a sort of sickly sensibility, which grew to a feverish delirium and occasioned that violent distortion of his thoughts, which we remark in his last compositions. Since he was almost stifled under the stricture of his powerfully suppressed passion, his Art became to him at length only the means by which he wrote out his own tragedy.

THE PALM TREE OF CAPRI.

BY C. P. CRANCH.

In the garden waves the Palm-tree,
Far beyond the Ocean lies,
Over me bends all the softness
Of the deep Italian skies.

In the garden waves the Palm-tree,
And the wind is flowing cool,
Rustling in the feathery branches
Tipped with moonlight deep and full.

Far in Indian wildernesses
Float away my fancy's wings
To the desert and the gardens
Watered by Elysian springs.

Where the dread simoom is blowing,
Where the groves of Araby,
Islanded in green oases,
Lie beyond the sandy sea.

By the fount the camels kneeling
Stoop to drink the blessed waters,
While with orient vases coming
Gather round the Syrian daughters.

Where old Nile is overflowing,
And the Sphinx with heavy lids
Sits by ruins grim and sombre—
Onward to the Pyramids.

Onward through Judea's mountains,
Still o'er deserts parched and white,
Till the banks of mighty Ganges
Yield their odors to the night.

Gentle Palm of rocky Capri
Waving in the silvery light,
Thou hast stirred a thousand fancies,
Led me far this summer night.

Far in Morning Land I wandered
Where the summers never cease,
And Romance's golden waters
Ever run and murmur peace.

CAPRI, July, 1848.

The Academy of Design in New York.

We received a card of invitation to attend a private exhibition of the new collection of pictures at the Academy, on Monday evening last. "Evening dress" was announced upon the cards, and it proved to be a very brilliant reception occasion. The artists were there in full force, and their guests were composed of as much beauty and fashion as we have ever seen collected together from a similar motive. Broadway was densely thronged with carriages, for although the weather was exceedingly unpropitious, the extensive suite of the Academy's apartments was crowded with visitors. Among these were to be found, distinguished poets, divines, authors, editors, judges, lawyers, et id genus omne of the men of mark, in our city. Tables were placed in the centre of several of the rooms, and kept well supplied with ices and other refectations. Every body unexpectedly met all his most agreeable acquaintances and friends, and the social charm was so great as to interfere somewhat with the enjoyment of the many new works of art with which the walls were covered. But no one who was there on Monday evening will fail to go again and take a quiet and composed look, at what constantly caught his eye as he chatted, and strolled along.

One feature of the occasion was considered an unfortunate one for the exhibition—there was so large a number of beautiful living portraits walking the rooms, that the contrast was a trying one for the portrait part of the collection. The young artists—who by the way, are the most foreign-looking, and withal handsome young men one often finds—were in their element. They philandered about, each with a pretty companion under his arm, and gave one a pleasing idea of what artist-life is in its social phase.

We thought it an admirable thing too for the artists, to be brought thus in contact with the public, and to become personally known to those in the community, who have a sympathy for them and their pursuits. How much more encouragement and incitement to effort is there in this, than dealing with a vague public, at arms-length—so to speak—as is usually the case with all classes of artists. And then we thought of the art which we represent—of music, and musicians. Why cannot something of this kind be effected for them too? Why is not a semi-social and semi-professional congress of musicians as practicable as that of painters? The subject of the "Musical Institute," which we discussed in a former number, again recurs to us, and it seems as though—if not that—some musical fraternity of the kind, must spring into existence in this city ere long. We have so many highly educated, accomplished and gentlemanlike members of the profession already in the city, and their number is so fast increasing that such a result seems inevitable. It strikes us, that the new enterprise of the Normal School, which was to have been entered upon this spring, but (owing to the absence of Mr. Lowell Mason) is now deferred until next spring, and which already shows such encouraging signs of prosperity and vitality—that this enterprize, will result, in some way, in accomplishing—among other desirable ends,—a kind of social fraternity of musicians; and that musical artists will, in some manner, be brought into direct and personal contact with the public, and themselves and their art be thus better understood and better appreciated. Our whole sympathy—we need hardly say—would be enlisted in the accomplishment of such an object.—Willis's Musical Times.

[Translated by A. W. T.]

A Sketch from the Diary of a Composer.

BY MADAME KINKEL, OF BONN ON THE RHINE.

When I was in H. studying counterpoint, I lived in very quiet lodgings near the conservatory, which I had only found after long search, and of which I had taken a good deal of pains to satisfy myself that there were no musicians in the immediate neighborhood. Everything went to my wishes; the people in the house knew and cared nothing about music, and the rooms over mine were occupied by an aged widow, who never stirred in her chamber with anything heavier than felt slippers on her feet.

The first month or two I was completely occupied with chords and intervals. I figured and dis-figured basses—and in fact had too much to do at my writing desk, to play as much as usual. The widow above me was charmed by the quiet of her fellow lodger, and praised me to the landlord as the very beau ideal of a tenant. Towards April, after the windows on the sunny garden side of the house began to be opened, I discovered in the rear of a contiguous building, which ran back from another street to the opposite side of the garden, a violin player, who had just moved in, and who cut all sorts of capers on his instrument. True enough, when we both had our windows closed, I could only now and then hear a few of his loudest notes, but these were bad enough in conscience for my delicate ears. I never can listen to a badly played violin, without imagining that I hear in its tones, the ghost of that particular cat, who gave her howls for the manufacture of the E

I considered that if I was disposed to submit to the inconvenience of keeping my garden windows closed all summer, my vis-a-vis could hardly be expected to do the same. So the matter came finally to this — to see which could fairly kill the other off with bad music. Here I had clearly the advantage; I rolled my grand piano up close to the window, and the moment the violinist put bow to string, I set up the cover of my instrument, raised the dampers, and played with all my strength in another key. Against my full harmony his single melody of course could do just nothing at all, however hard he exerted himself to vex me.

He finally wrote me a polite note and inquired whether we might not make a truce, and agree upon certain hours, during which the one should bind himself not to disturb the other while practising. I saw that I had to do with a man of understanding, and therefore called upon him, and showed that, in my present studies, when in search of some particular tone which I needed but which was not forthcoming, his music, though so distant, was a far greater cause of disturbance to me than when I was playing myself, for then I could drown his tones by my own. I depicted my misery to him, when I had put my pen to the paper ten times already in vain, and had hardly got my thoughts collected again after the last interruption, his violin how continually, like the shears of the Fates, cut off the thread of my thoughts.

The violinist had no difficulty in comprehending that two musicians, if they did not play the same piece, were one too many in the same place, and having taken his lodgings for a month only, to my great satisfaction withdrew to other quarters.

Unfortunately for me however, in the meantime, my unceasing, really mad piano forte playing, my weapon in the war which I had waged against the violinist, had so increased the violence of the nervous headache to which the widow was a martyr, that she gave the landlord notice, and at the end of the quarter also quitted. Various persons, who came to see the rooms, happening to come at moments when I was playing with all force, declared to the landlord, that the rooms pleased them highly, but they did not like living in the house with a musician; for even if one was fond of music, it was tiresome to listen to exercises and studies all day long, and this in the end would give one a disgust at the very idea of music.

At last came a young lieutenant. He found the rooms magnifique, the view from the windows superbe, the chambermaid charmante; and then he measured the wall to see if there was room for his grand pianoforte. The landlady was honorable enough to ask, whether it was an objection to the place that a person played the pianoforte in the rooms underneath, and it sounded about as loud in one room as in the other. The lieutenant answered laughing, he cared nothing for that; on the contrary, such mad music as the two instruments would make, all in confusion, would be an endless source of fun to him and his comrades.

When this was reported to me my heart sank; for against such ears my weapons were of no avail. But what could I do? My finances did not allow me to change my rooms, since I had paid in advance for the whole period of my stay, and in every new lodging I might meet again the same misfortune. Nor had I the same means at command as Spontini, who, as is well known, obtained free lodgings at the theatre for his female fellow lodgers, on condition that they should never touch the piano when he was at home. I labored hard to acquire the power of complete mental abstraction. I would not hear anything else than the tones within me, and sought to convince myself that the lieutenant's playing was but noise, and bore no relation whatever to music. But such attempts to educate my ears and nerves not only miscarried in spite of my best will, but the strain upon my nervous system almost destroyed my whole organization.

I now devised a different plan of study. Early in the morning, while the lieutenant was sleeping away the effects of his heroic deeds at the previous evening's tea-table, I undertook to perform the exercises set me in my thorough bass lessons. But, alas, it was not possible to finish before the lieutenant was up and drumming away at "Vor Romeo's Raecherarme" or "Erzittre Byzanz!" He spent all his leisure time at the pianoforte, and in those days a lieutenant had an endless amount of such time, God knows! He played gallopades, polkas, quicksteps and such trash by the hour together; all with pedals raised, chromatic runs and scales in the bass not excepted — horribile dictu!

I determined upon battle for life and death!

The moment he touched his piano I sat down to mine; and as mine was twice as powerful as his, I had no difficulty in annoying him to my heart's content. I would make four-part chords with both hands, with tremolandos in the deepest bass. Against this he could only pay on twice as hard, and the tuner had to be called in twice a week to put on new strings. After all I suffered more than he did. I could only drown him by playing such music as his own, and the listening to such stuff, gallopades, polkas, &c., was to me perfect martyrdom. In my favorite pieces, the "Songs without words," Fugues and Sonatas, there is too much of the pianissimo to pierce through the noise of his polkas.

In the course of a few weeks, I had gained so much on my musical antagonist, that even to him the mingled harmonies of D and C major were no longer entirely agreeable. The servant girl said to me, that, the Herr Lieutenant had inquired whether his playing over my head might not disturb me somewhat? I answered with affected indifference, that when I was playing my piano forte, I paid not the slightest attention to the weak-toned affair overhead.

In the meantime I had finished the decima quinta in my contrapuntal studies, and was set to studying out themes for fugues. Now indeed must I take advantage of every moment of peace; but when I had set me down in the very best humor for my difficult task, no sooner did I hear the lieutenant's spurs clattering on the stairs, or the moving of a chair overhead, than it would come over me like a fever, "Oh woe! now he is going to play!" and ere he had struck a note all capacity for study was gone. I grew as it were crazy with rage, and when I had heard, perhaps but a note or two of a hand organ in the street, the idea of the lieutenant's piano forte would make me almost beside myself. When not engaged in writing, perhaps merely reading the newspaper, my wrath and indignation were boiling within me — in fact, I was no longer master of my thoughts. At last I actually hated my tormentor as my worst enemy — as the disturber of my whole existence.

My continual efforts — all in vain — to set myself down to my composition, the constant interruptions, and my own anti-polka tremolando-fortissimos — all together so overwrought my nerves, that when for once in a while he was invited out to tea, and left me in peace, I could effect nothing, for headache. He spent most of his time at home, however, and was frequently visited by five or six friends, who howled airs from Bellini and Donizetti at the piano, either unisons, or what was still worse, with bass and air in octaves. Sometimes too they exercised themselves, with a view to their future vocation, by breaking the furniture and crockery and letting the battle cry resound from the window in the stillness of night.

To play anything which should make itself heard above such choruses, was an undertaking in which I did not dare venture the pure tones of my splendid instrument. In time however, I learned to revenge myself after such an evening, by inviting the children of the free school to my room mornings from six to seven, to practise psalm tunes for the school examination, and thus disturbing the lieutenant's sleep.

At length he remarked that I never began to play, until immediately after he had placed himself at his instrument, and that I purposely played the loudest. That made him malicious, and he called in the regiment trumpeter to assist him. Now, thought I, I am done for! and threw myself in despair upon the sofa, stopping up both ears. But the battle had now become a contest of honor. I took courage and conjured up one final resource.

I knew a Frenchman, who was passionately fond of blowing the serpent. Of this instrument, Hector Berlioz, in his work on the art of instrumenting, says among other things the following:

"Its essentially savage tones fitted it far better for use during the bloody sacrificial ceremonies of the Druids, than for the Catholic church service in which it is continually employed. An abominable relic of that want of understanding, feeling and taste, which, time out of mind, has regulated the employment of music in our churches. The single exception that can be made is when, in the Requiem, the serpent is used to strengthen the awful choral of the Dies Irae. Its howlings, which make one shudder, are there doubtless in their right place; indeed, this instrument, when used in the accompaniment to these words, which breathe all the horrors of death and the vengeance of a jealous God, seems actually to possess a sort of mournful poetry."

The instrument thus described seemed to me just the thing to use in carrying out my plan. In respect to music, I called to mind a Flemish monk, by the name of Huebaldus, who lived in the time of Henry the Fowler, and in his treatises left behind him the oldest compositions in parts. These move in pure fifths and octaves, up and down in direct motion! The venerable master says of this style, by no means bad at that time, "Videbis nasci suavem ex hac sonorum commixtione concentum!" Still, they effect a musician of the nineteenth century quite in the opposite manner. I have sometimes proved this when my visitors have stayed too long. I no sooner commence on a so-called "Organum" of Huebaldus, than away they go screaming from my doors.

Now whenever the lieutenant had a visit from the Trumpeter, I would carefully steal out of the house by the back door and wait in a neighboring confectioner's until he was gone. Then I came home perfectly unconcerned, greeted the lieutenant, who would be leaning out of the window, in the most friendly manner, and who, deluded by seeing me return home, would be confounded by the thought that he had given the trumpeter his drink money in vain.

But not in vain did I promise a capital breakfast to my serpent blower and two Ross trumpeters from the orchestra, whom I regularly had come to me, on a morning when I knew the Lieutenant had been out dancing all night, at five o'clock, A. M. for rehearsal. We rehearsed the above-named "Organum" of Huebaldus, whose long extended notes seemed to have been written expressly for the serpent; but our concert never wanted for foreign assistance; for all the cats and dogs in the neighborhood, even the poultry and the jackasses of the milk-women, joined jubilant in these primitive tones.

Three times we performed our morning serenade, when the lieutenant left.

[From our New York Correspondent.]

Music in New York.

MADAME ANNA THILLON is still singing, but has only produced three operas—the Diamonds of the Crown, the Black Domino and the Child of the Regiment. She continues to be a great favorite—because she is a pretty woman. Yet her prettiness is Frenchy. I saw it long ago in the rosy-faced wax dolls with flaxen ringlets. We all agree to that. Everybody consents that it is sadly artificial,—but she has crowded Niblo's on her three evenings in the week for two months, with only three operas, and her audience is enchanted. One great reason of her success is the same as that of the modern French vaudeville. The operas of Auber represent the daily life of modern men and women. Everybody likes to see his own life and his own companions projected into the perspective, and made a picture. With what profound interest I have seen a man contemplate his own daguerreotype. Conceive the Fornarina, "who loved her love more than her lover," as Xavier de Maistre says, standing before the Madonna del Sisto, of which she was the probable model, and beholding herself transfigured by genius into an immortal and sacred image.

It is impossible to get back again to the Opera Comique, and I will pass on to something more sympathetic, which is the Philharmonic Concert of Saturday evening, the 17th of April. The great saloon of Niblo's was crowded by a capital audience, largely German, of course, but with that abundant sprinkling of "the old familiar faces," which puts you in such good humor—the best of preludes—because you are sure of sympathy in enjoyment. The great feature of the evening was Spohr's Weihnachtstöne, Consecration of Sound. It is the musical illustration or interpretation of a poem descriptive of the characteristic influence and power of sound, which the Composer desires may be always read by the auditor, before the performance. It is an unhappy and fatal desire. A "song without words" is the song that genius writes, in music. Let me explain a little: Art is simply a language. Its aim is to convey ideas—which is the end of all expressions. Its varieties are only modifications and differences of form. There is nothing final or fatal in them. A picture does not essentially differ from a statue or a song. Picture, statue, and song are the flexible speech of the artist, to manifest, according to his gift, the emotions of beauty, grandeur, pathos, or of whatever thought inspires him. Each of these forms, in strict science, must therefore be sufficient to itself. If you are compelled for intelligibility to write under a pictured tree—"this is a tree"—it is no proper picture. If you must say of a song, this is meant to express these and these emotions, what use is there of the song?

Now no student of the pictures of a master requires any hand book to indicate their meaning, because a fine picture is just that which the observer sees in it. And in the degree that a man is musical, or capable of receiving delight from music, in that degree he rejects all words or explanations, and derives the meaning of the music from its own perfection as an expression. Recall Mendelssohn's Gondola-lied, one of the most exquisite, airy and, in the highest sense, dramatic pieces, in music. It is the musical incarnation of Venetian moonlight. You see how my words struggle after a description of it, and are therein an illustration of what I say. Now no words could possibly be written to that music, because, if they were good enough, they would be too good, and by their perfection in another way would distract the hearer. On the other hand, you published last week Tennyson's wonderful Bugle-song,—which implies all its own music so entirely, that the thought of making a melody for it is amusing and hopeless. I do not forget the great exceptions to this rule in Haydn's Canzonets from Shakspeare, and Beethoven's melodies to Goethe. But neither the "Mignon" nor "She never told her love" are the more beautiful, because of the beautiful music. The music is still delightful, but it does not reveal any new value or thought or emotion in the poetry.

There is the case, and there is the fatality of Spohr's desire that the poem shall be read before the symphony is performed. Why? Certainly only to explain the music. But if it does not explain itself to the musical mind, and for such only is music composed, then it is irretrievably defective as a work of art. If it is good, there is no need of explanation. In the Pastorale of Beethoven how offensively superfluous is the elaborate sketch of pastoral life so often prepared for the programme. It is a kind of insult to the Composer.

Spohr's great symphony is very majestic. The first movement, especially, is masterly. But fancy opening your bill of fare, as the conductor's baton imperially rose, and reading, "Gloomy silence of Nature before the creation of Sound, Busy life afterward, Sounds of Nature, The Elements." The misery of the thing is that your mind falls into the rut, and away it runs on the sharp look out for the point when the "gloomy silence" merges in the "busy life afterward." Music, I trust, and a great symphony of a distinguished master, is no such intolerable trickery as this.

The heaving, rocking under-tone of the whole introduction, imparting the idea of vast and mysterious restlessness, with the shimmering play of themes shooting along the surface, like the sun-sparkles upon the sea, is impressive in the highest manner. Don't accuse me of falling into my own trap. I am merely describing an individual impression in the same way as I should describe my feeling upon seeing a picture or a statue, or upon reading a poem. If I were the composer of a symphony, I should certainly not apprise you in a schedule of general heads what I meant to express in it. If you heard it and then told me what impression you derived, I should know if I were successful or not.

The Philharmonic orchestra is admirably drilled. The members are all inspired by the same sympathies,—mostly Germans, they believe in the German Composers, who would not regret to sit among the audience and hear their own immortality so assured. Mr. TIMM, the most elegant of our Pianists, is President; Mr. SCHARFENBERG, whose delicate and polished style evinces the student of the best classics only, is Vice President. They assist in the orchestra, taking very humble parts. Scharfenberg, I think, played the cymbals. The Symphony, which can never be very popular, despite the song, serenade and battle-march, gave great satisfaction. Individually, I confess too distinct a sense of science in Spohr's music, excepting some of his fragmentary songs. There are great volume and splendor of sound and movement in this Symphony, but little of that irresistible elan, which bears you out of the consciousness of means into the Elysium of delight. If I were an angel and conscious of my wings, as I floated in the June sunshine, I should feel something was yet imperfect.

Mr. SCHARFENBERG played a Concerto of Mendelssohn's with the orchestra. I wish he were more impassioned. Yet his reverence for the master is very beautiful, and the quiet, uncompromising purity of his style is sure to secure your most judicious approval. Later in the evening he and Mr. TIMM played a Grand Duo of Mendelssohn's upon the Bohemian march from "Preciosa." It was effective, but not striking. In fact neither of the piano performances were strictly interesting. They were learned and skilful rather than inspired. But the audience made it a point of honor to listen silently, and recognized by their applause the admirable performance, although there was no enthusiasm for the works.

I was glad to hear something of W. STERNDALE BENNETT's, whose name is so familiar in the English musical notices, as a "classical" musician. He was a scholar of Mendelssohn's, I believe, and to too much purpose; for his overture is only a very admirable study in that master's style. It has a masterly air, but you feel it is all derived from the admirable science of the Composer. The pervasive inspiration, which is always individual and in which there can be no study, is utterly wanting. I recognized whole phrases, doubtlessly written with the utmost sincerity. But they were not Bennett's music, they were only the music he loved.

Mrs. BOSTWICK sang. I was much disappointed. Her voice has a certain domestic sweetness, but that seems to me all the true pleasure derivable from her singing. She is well cultivated enough, but the total want of freshness and the constant sense of effort, although careful and successful, make the whole impression rather mournful, like the sweetness of faded flowers. Mr. HAASE blew a trumpet better than I have ever heard a trumpet blown before. It was really a fine performance, and I could not but regret all the while that so much skill and trouble had been lost upon the instrument. There is a manly and heroic strain in its peal, and it kindles chivalric feeling and recalls Sir Philip Sidney's saying of the ballad of Chevy Chase, that it "stirred him like a trumpet;" but it is still a pity that a man should expend his lungs and labor to such a necessarily unsatisfactory result. The concert was much too long, by the by, and on the whole, not so interesting as it should have been. Why should Mrs. Bostwick sing the Happy birdling, when Jenny Lind sang the Bird Song? Why, above all, should the Philharmonic Society assume the responsibility of such a proceeding? HAFIZ.

A correspondent of one of our friends writes from Rome that among the artists there orders have been abundant this past winter; and that the Americans particularly have been purchasing works by modern artists.

Our friend, Frank Boott, who has been pursuing his musical studies diligently in Italy, has produced a composition of which the writer speaks thus. "We had a grand musical soirée in our rooms the other day, with Paggi's oboe, Ramacciotti's violin, Wiehmen on the pianoforte, and Rheintaler's songs; and among other things we had a stringed quartette of Boott's, admirably performed. It was certainly a triumph for him, and I am delighted to say to you that it was full of science and freshness of fancy. The themes were original and naive, and the condotta clear and unconfused. It quite surprised me by its merit, and its piquancy and spirit gained for it an unanimous applause. Just where young composers fail, he succeeded, in the management of its partition and the development of his theme."

The same letter contains an account of some very successful private theatricals among the Americans and English, in which our friend the writer assisted. The Midsummer Nights' Dream, and Merchant of Venice were performed with great effect. But we must not entrench any further upon the privacy of a letter not intended for publication.

Theory and Practice of Musical Composition.
By ADOLPH BERNHARD MARX. Translated from the third German edition and edited by HERMANN S. SARONI. 8vo. pp. 406. New York. F. J. Huntington, and Mason & Law.

A work of this importance cannot receive justice in a hasty notice. We have reserved it with the hope of finding time and room for that; but lest the matter should grow old in the mean time, we make here simply a first note of our impressions, meaning to return to it again.

We have here, then, something upon which to congratulate our musical public: namely, a clear and intelligent translation of the first, or rather of the substance of the first, of the four volumes of MARX's famous Compositionslehre. We trust it paves the way to a translation of the entire work, which covers the whole field of musical composition, with a copious supply of illustrations throughout. So far as our own acquaintance goes, as well as the report of all our best informed German musicians, the subject has never before been developed with anything like the unity, the naturalness, the clearness, the completeness, and the charm (unwonted in dry scientific text-books,) which we find in these noble labors of the Berlin professor.

The beauty of it is, that he unfolds the whole thing from a little germ; that is to say, from the simplest conceivable little phrase of melody, such as one might hum to himself without a reason, or such as might have been the very beginning of music in the rudest ages of mankind. This little phrase is examined, its elements noted, then its possible variations, consequences and enlargements sought, till finally we discover the whole scale of tones, as well as the nature of a musical period, sentence or proposition, with all its rhythmical and melodic conditions. First however, melodies for two voices are introduced, or as the translator renders it, duophonic melodies; this leads to some discoveries about chords and natural harmonies and the origin of the notes of the scale in their fundamental tones or roots, and so we learn our first lesson in Harmony or Thorough Bass, in the heat of our first efforts at melodic invention. For invention, from the first, is made the exercise of the student, and Marx's system herein is quite kindred with the method pursued in our modern "Schools of Design."

MARX is a believer in musical Science, in the possibility of referring all the elements of the art back to a unitary, central principle, and not a mere empiric like GODFREY WEBER. Thus he notes the importance to the key-note (say C) of the Fourth and Fifth (say F and G), and the indispensableness of these three roots to the generation of the full diatonic Scale; and he does not hesitate to renew (perhaps as a second independent discoverer) the proposition of an obscure but very suggestive and philosophical French author, MOMIGNY, who published in 1806 a Cours d'Harmonie, in three volumes, that the Scale be written in a way more expressive of the true relations of its parts; namely, by placing the key-note (C) in the centre, with the Fourth and Fifth at the two extremes, thus:

To invention of melodies for one and two parts or voices, follows that of melodies for three and four and even more voices; including by the way all that is essential about Chords and Modulation, and exercising both the analytic and inventive power of the student at each step.—This concludes the First Book, or "Elements of Composition."

The translated volume includes also the Second Book, which treats of the "Accompaniment of given Melodies." These melodies or themes it takes from two sources, namely, the old sacred Chorals, and the secular National Songs, and shows how they are to be harmonized, with plain and with figural bass, giving noble examples of SEBASTIAN BACH's arrangements of some of the old Chorals. Here too are amply treated the peculiarities of the "Ecclesiastical Keys," or Modes. The description of the various expressions of the Ionic, Dorian, &c., we notice to be essentially adopted from SCHILLING's Aesthetik der Tonkunst, though we cannot vouch for the fact that MARX was not the older of the two.

Here the present translation ends. The original goes on in the next volume to unfold the mysteries of composition in the various musical forms, from simple Songs, to Canons, Fugues and Double Counterpoint.

Of Mr. Saroni's translation we have already said that it is intelligently made. He fully understands his author, and the force of language. We only wish, that in his endeavor to give the sense as concisely as possible, and also to adapt the whole thing to the wants of pupils, and make an American text-book of it, he had not seen fit to abridge as much as he sometimes does. We notice paragraphs omitted, pages and whole chapters as it were re-cast into the form of his own mind, illustrations curtailed, &c. &c. And in this, while we give his translation credit for great clearness, it has seemed to us in some portions which we have compared, that he has rather sacrificed a certain verdure and picturesqueness of style, which in the original redeem the book from the dry category of most treatises. For the author's very general and long Preface, the translator has, wisely as we think, substituted an admirably clear statement of the "Elements of Musical Notation," by himself.

In the rendering of technical terms it could hardly be expected that all tastes, or all the essential desiderata of the subject should be satisfied. We do not like those Greek terms monophonic, duophonic, &c., in place of the simple German "one-voiced," "two-voiced," &c. In one other instance it strikes us that the term selected will be apt to perplex and mislead the scholar; we mean his translating the term motiv by design. The design of a musical, as of a pictorial composition, or a poem, covers the idea of the whole work; whereas what the French and Germans term the motiv in a piece of music, is the mere melodic germ, or little elementary thought or figure, which is perpetually reproduced in ever new forms and keys throughout the whole structure, and like the first seed-leaf or cotyledon, types the whole conformation of the tree:—those first four notes, for instance, in Beethoven's C minor Symphony. We have no English word for it; then why not borrow the European, and say motive?

But we have already paused longer in this first reconnoitring of the field, than we intended, and we must conclude with simply recommending the work to students. Other publications must still bide their time for review.

The Old Church Modes or "Tones."

[Second Article.]

Under this head, in our last number, we alluded to a certain retrospective, Middle Age taste in music, manifested of late in certain quarters, more especially in England; to a certain peculiar reverence for the old Ecclesiastical Modes, as if no music since them could be half so rich or sacred. To test the reasonableness of this, we appealed to the history of the musical Scale, the basis of all musical Art, and showed that these grand and severe old melodies, originally without harmony, were properly older than Music itself as an Art; and that their peculiarities of expression are owing to the fact of the imperfect, half-developed Scale in which they were written:—a Scale without semi-tones, and hence without the means of modulation through a variety of keys. We stated, what is commonly known among musical students, that their nominally twelve modes or scales are in fact only our one diatonic scale, with some of its most important elements or organs latent, unpronounced, or rudimental. While, as for their peculiar sacredness, it would appear that they were all borrowed from the Greek, from uses which we know not to have been other than secular.

If the tone-series ranged from C to c, as the initial and closing note, the tune or melody or chant was called IONIC, and had, of course, the firm, serene, composed and solid character of our major key of C, confined to the few simplest modulations of the diatonic scale. If G was made the starting-point, it was called MYXO-LYDIAN, and such tunes had the singular expression of aspiring to rise or modulate into the tone-sphere a fifth above, and never getting fairly up there for want of the sharp F, but having to gravitate constantly back to C; hence it is not an independent, self-subsistent key; it depends on the Ionic, and is in fact that; it commences not firmly grounded like the Ionic, but as it were hovering and floating upward; and in its termination there is no repose, but rather excitement, since it reverses the two poles of Tonic and Dominant, making what is called the "Plagal" or "Church Close," which sound so bold and startling. The DORIAN took the same sounds from D to d, and had a very earnest, solemn character, most used in high church festivals. And so on through the twelve Modes. (The musical student may find them fully described in the work of Marx, noticed on an earlier page.)

But it must be remembered that these Gregorian chants or "tones" at first were sung in unison, depending on great masses of voices for their effect. It was very slowly that any Harmony was added to their rough melodic progressions. Some occasional chords must have been now and then improvised and have grown into unwritten habits, especially at the closing cadences of tunes. By degrees it became common to add a voice part above the canto fermo, which was called Discant. But it was not before the enthusiastic studies of the monk Guido Aretinus in the 10th century, that anything like regular Counterpoint appeared. And for centuries after that, indeed even till after the Reformation and the dawning of mental freedom in Europe, when Music had got well secularized upon the stage, what harmony there was, was mostly limited to the hard, barren intervals of fourths and fifths, with an extremely timid and shy use of the expressive thirds and sixths; while (as we have said) the semi-tones had not all got emancipated and recognized in the Church, which made law in musical as in other matters. The secular and vagabond music of the streets and fields, we may fancy, had semi-tones and thirds enough, without knowing it, any more than Moliere's M. Jourdain knew that he had been speaking prose. Because the natural instincts are more suggestive, more prone to accept all the elements of any truth, than a cramped science, made the subject of ordinances and prescription. Music is so true and genial to the whole of human nature, so allied to the heart and therefore of course to freedom, that only in the free and secular air of untrusting, generous, joyous, although checkered life, can she fully be herself, and fulfil her beautiful and perfect mission among sister Arts. The very idea of prescription is alien to the very soul of Music, who must be allowed freely to unfold all the types of order and unity and beauty and divine wisdom out of herself. And is it not her divine mission to elevate the whole of life and make it holy? But to return to our historical sketch.

So much, in passing, of the "Church Modes" and the Gregorian Chants. We must further notice how elaborate a music the restless, curious ingenuity of old composers, working within the aforesaid superstitious, theoretic limitations, had gradually evolved out of these plain materials, by the time of the establishment of our full modern Scale and of the true beginning of modern musical ART. The grave Discant which was sung above the Canto fermo soon took on refined and florid airs, so that some one compared it to "the curls and folds and flounces in a female dress." From the antiphonal or responsive singing, choir answering choir with the same melody commenced a little later and pitched a fifth or fourth higher or lower, that is in the plagal mode, arose the trick of Imitation, Canon and Fugue, which kindled up the emulous inventive and refining faculties to many a long heat. This accounts for florid and elaborate melody, for separate and long-spun parts, and melodies pursuing and entwining one another in one intricate and involved composition; while by the same process, together with the inviting facilities of the first church organs, arose such timid and scant use of chords and harmony as we have just seen. The result was, theoretically, a whole system of counterpoint; and practically, an abundance of very elaborate, though cramped specimens of Art, especially the Catholic Mass and Passion, and all the wondrous difficulties of Fugues and Canons, carried mostly to a pitch of barren artificiality, until this science culminated and became inspired in great SEBASTIAN BACH and HANDEL.

We must regard then all this musical development before the 17th century, all from the Ambrosian plain chant to Sebastian Bach (though PALESTRINA stands out solitary and sublime, above the shining constellation of grand old English church composers, in the 16th) as mere preparation for the modern Art of Music proper. It mainly amounted to just this: The treasured inspiration of the same old stock of plain church chants and chorals, wrought over and over, and refined and twisted by a scientific ingenuity, until it became necessary that the fountains of melody should be replenished, or rather, that new fountains should be opened.

This came, in due time, with the progress of letters, arts and commerce, which were closely followed by the art of counterpoint, beginning in Rome, thence passing to the Hanse towns, and so on; and with the expansion given to the moral life of Europe by the Reformation. The secular, neglected vagrant, Melody, was picked up out of the streets. The popular airs, the free and native music of the human heart, were recognized. Music burst her fetters and got upon the stage. And then the progress of the art was rapid and inspiring, and all its secular gains and its rejuvenescence told upon its uses in the Church.

After reviewing these facts, is it wise or proper to carry our partiality for the old and simple and church-consecrated so far, as to ignore what modern times have gained in the power of expressing all the highest and holiest aspirations of the human soul through tones, as Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Cherubini and the rest have done!

AN ELL FOR AN INCH. In our translation from LISTZ's memoir of CHOPIN, in the last number, we spoke of a certain painting, instanced as a small one, as covering "a canvass of twenty square ells"—it should have been inches.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

SENORA DE RIBAS offers a very attractive programme for her complimentary concert this evening. She is to sing herself a Cavatina by that liquid melodist, Cimarosa, and the Fatal Goffredo by Donizetti. Also in the Trio of maskers from Don Juan, with her sister and Mr. Arthurson, and a duett with Mr. A.

Miss EMMA GARCIA sings a ballad by Wallace, and Miss Julia Garcia the "Captive Greek Girl," by Hobbs; and the two sisters the duett by Wallace: "Sainted Mother, guide his footsteps."

Mr. ARTHURSON will sing "Thou Soft flowing Avon," composed in 1740, by Dr. Arne.

SIG. DE RIBAS will play upon his oboe the Adagio Religioso of Ernst, with organ accompaniment by Mr. HAYTER, senior, and a solo of his own, with orchestra.

Mr. HAMANN, the fine French-hornist, is down for a solo: and Mr. GARCIA for a piano-forte solo, with orchestra. Three good overtures, and Meyerbeer's Marche du Sacre, make up the balance.

We trust there will be an overflowing house. The programme looks long, but the pieces are short and will be all through, we are assured, by 10 o'clock.

A NEW THEATRE AND OPERA HOUSE. We rejoice to learn that the prospect brightens for a fine theatre and place for lyric music, besides the two great concert halls in progress, in our city. A full and spirited meeting of merchants and others was held at the Revere House on Wednesday evening, when the wants of Boston in this respect were strongly set forth by the Mayor, by P. P. F. Degrand, Esq., and the chairman of the meeting, Edw. C. Bates, Esq. A committee consisting of Messrs. John D. Bates, John E. Thayer, William Amory and Gardner Brewer, were chosen, "to apply to the Legislature for an act of incorporation, for erecting a building for theatrical representations, to select and obtain the refusal of one or more suitable sites; and to take measures for obtaining subscribers for the necessary amount."

NEWTON MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. A pleasant "Public Rehearsal" of this new choral and orchestral society, numbering some eighty members, took place last week. The first part of the programme consisted of glees, duets, and trios by Calcott, Kreuzer, Bishop, &c.; the second part, of sacred quartets and choruses. Besides the names of MENDELSSOHN and SPOHR, those of our friends, S. JENNISON JR., the conductor, and EDWARD HAMILTON, appeared as composers. We are happy to learn that Mr. Jennison is about to publish a series of six sacred choruses.—May this example of Newton soon be followed by the other thriving and intelligent communities, all over Massachusetts and New England!

New York.

EISFELD'S LAST CLASSICAL SOIREE will probably come off on the 8th at the Apollo Rooms, when, we understand, the following pieces will be given:

BEETHOVEN'S Septet, in the original form, for clarinet, bassoon, horn, violin, viola, 'cello and contrabasso; HAYDN'S celebrated Quartet in G; and either MENDELSSOHN'S second Trio, in C minor, or SCHUMANN'S Quintet, with Mr. Scharfenberg for pianist.

The Annual Meeting of the AMERICAN MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY took place on the 17th ult., when Ole Bull was elected an honorary member, and the following officers chosen for the ensuing year:

President, H. A. Coit. 1st Vice President, W. Scharfenberg; 2d Vice President, H. C. Watson; Treasurer, Anthony Reiff; Secretary, F. Scherpf.

Trustees, Ogden Haggerty, F. H. Austen, Julius Metz. Directors, Th. Eisfeld, H. B. Dodworth, C. Pazzaglia, G. Schneider, U. J. Hill, Jas. Shelton, F. A. Stohr, Wm. Thos. Roberts, G. F. Bristow, Louis Ernst, John A. Kyle, D. L. Downing.

The German LIEDER-KREISE, or popular chorus societies, which for the last three years have held their anniversaries in Baltimore and Philadelphia, will this Spring gather en masse in New York. It will be a time of real German enthusiasm, at once rhythmical and free.—A similar festival will take place on the 7th of June at Cincinnati.

The newspapers chronicle the marriage of Signor BETTINI, the popular tenore, with Mlle. SOPHIE MARETZEK, a sister of the indomitable impresario.

The "GERMANIANS," leaving Philadelphia in triumph, have been welcomed back to one of their special homes, which is Baltimore. We see that they have meanwhile paid a flying visit to Washington.

BISCACCANTI had given five concerts, amid much enthusiasm, at San Francisco.

Germany.

VIENNA. The German Opera finished on the 14th of March with the Prophète. On the 15th the Italian Opera began, with Mmes. Medori and Demeric, and MM. Fraschini and De Bassini in Lucia. On the 17th Mme. Maray and M. Scialese made their debut in Don Pasquale. To these succeeded Lucrezia Borgia and Verdi's Macbeth, in which last Medori and the baritone De Bassini had a wonderful triumph.

SCHULHOFF, the pianist, had returned and was giving successful concerts.

On the 1st of May was to be celebrated in the chapel of the royal palace a jubilee commemorative of its foundation four hundred years ago. Among the works to be performed, were Masses by Mozart, Assmayer, Mayseder, Eybler, Preyer and Beethoven; Graduals and Offertories by Haydn &c.; finally a grand Litany by Mozart and the abbé Vogler's Choral Vespers.

The concert for the Charitable Fund for musicians was composed of all the music to Meyerbeer's Struensee, Mendelssohn's posthumous Symphony and "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, a Symphony by Beethoven, and the Oratorio of "Noah," by Preyer.

BERLIN. The musicians of the royal chapel were to present a bâton of honor to their director, Taubert, (author of Jenny Lind's "Bird Song,") as a reward for ten years labor; the same honor had been paid to Spontini and Meyerbeer. — Much was said of a new Oratorio, "Daniel and Nebuchadnezzar," by the organist Kuntze.

Madame WAGNER took her leave in the part of Fidelio. Don Juan, with Mme. Koster for Donna Anna, the Grossfurstin, by Flotow, the Doppelflucht by H. Schmidt, Fille du Regiment and the "Doll of Nuremberg" are named among the operas old and new. As singers for the Summer season, were announced Roger of Paris and Mme. Meyer, Liephart from Vienna, and Formes the baritone.

Meyerbeer has written a Cantata for the 28th anniversary of the marriage of Prince Charles of Prussia.

At the college Frederic-William, the pupils of the first class have performed the tragedy of Antigone in Greek, with the choruses by Mendelssohn.

BRESLAU. The Academy of Song gave on the 3d of March a concert, composed of chorals by John Eckart and S. Bach; a motet by Mich. Bach; the Requiem by Hasse; a cantata by S. Bach. On the 26th they sang Haydn's "Seasons."

At OKLAU, Dr. Karl Loewe's Oratorio of "John Huss" was performed. [The music of this is in that author's romantic, German ballad vein, full of pleasing variety and contrast, and may be produced some day ere long in Boston, as we once found some amusement in translating its quite clever poem for one of our most active professors of sacred music.]

LEIPSIC. Cimarosa's Il Matrimonio Segreto has been represented with unanimous applause.

AMSTERDAM. The inauguration of the statue of Rembrandt, who died in this city in 1674, was to be accompanied by a grand musical festival, in which all the philharmonic societies of Holland were to partake. It was supposed that there would be over 2,500 executants.

Paris.

At the GRAND OPERA, Tedesco and the tenor, Roger, have been singing in the Prophète, Laborde in the Huguenots, Gueymard again in "William Tell," and Mlle. Courtot, a pupil of Duprez, in La Faworita. — There is great expectation of the new opera, "The Wandering Jew," which was to be brought out early in April. — A danseuse there too, Mlle. Priora, is spoken of as one destined to renew the triumphs of Taglioni, Elsler and Cerito.

ITALIAN OPERA. Mlle. Cruvelli sang Rosina in the "Barber." Lablache, as always, was irresistible in the rôle of Bartolo; Calzolari sang that of Lindoro admirably, and Belletti distinguished himself in Figaro.

Cinderella was given for the benefit of the contralto, Angri, in which Lablache had another triumph. In L'Italiana in Algieri, Ferranti was very amusing as Taddeo. In Don Pasquale, Cruvelli again, with the quartet above named.

The season closed on the 1st of April with a concert, said to have been rather triste, as Sophie Cruvelli and her sister, who were announced in the programme, had already left for London.

At the OPERA COMIQUE the appetite for graceful fun holds out and there has been great activity in feeding it. In one week, the habitués had passed in review before them, as in a sort of magic lantern on a grand scale, the Domino Noir, the Fille du Regiment, La Dame Blanche, the CariDonneur de Bruges, le Maçon, le Tableau parlant, la Fête du village voisin, and the Château de Mme. Barbe-Bleue, — eight merry operettes!

Then they have had a new one-act opera by Adam, called le Farfadet (the Hobboblin), in which he has a caricature of the statue scene in Don Giovanni. — Also Madelon, and the Trompette de M. le Prince, great favorites, by F. Bazin. The caste of the former piece was MM. Sainte-Foy, Andran, Hermann Leon, Lemaire, Mlle. Lefebvre and Mme. Mayer. — The debutante, whom Berlioz praised, Mlle. Wertheimer, had been ill, but was to reappear in male costume. — Galathée, a new comic opera by M. V. Massé, was announced, the part of Galatée by Mme. Ugalde, that of Pygmalion by Mlle. Wertheimer.

OPERA NATIONAL. Duprez's opera, Joanita, has drawn crowds, and shed a glory over a multitude of smaller things, romances, canzonets, &c., which the great tenor composed before he wrote for the theatre, and the beauty of which the Parisians have just begun to recollect. Caroline Duprez, the daughter of the composer, sang in Joanita, and she is styled an adorable singer by the French critics.

The "Prison of Edinburgh," by Caraffa, and la Pie voleuse, have since been played.

VIEUXTEMPS was to arrive in Paris and give a concert about this time. — M. TELLEFSEN, a young pianist and composer, whose style and sentiment are said to be analogous to those of his master, Chopin, was to give a concert.

A LEARNED FEMALE ORGANIST. Mlle. Juliette Dillon, organist of the cathedral of Meaux, has been giving Soirées of MUSICAL IMPROVISATIONS. On the first evening, she improvised five times: 1. Preludes in a given key and measure; 2. improvisation on a theme proposed on the spot; 3. on a poetic subject; 4. on several themes of different style and character; 5. on a scene containing several contrasted subjects.

SOCIÉTÉ ST. CECILE. The programme of the sixth concert was as follows: Overture, Meeres-Stille, by Mendelssohn; Trio from Les Songes de Dardanus, by Rameau; Chorus from Les Elus, by M. Wekerlin; Pastoral Symphony, Beethoven; Air de Limnander, sung by Mlle. Miolan; Pavane, dance air of the sixteenth century; Overture, Le Roi Etienne, Beethoven. Orchestra directed by M. Seghers; choruses by M. Wekerlin.

LEOPOLD DE MEYER was to give his last concert in Paris on the 19th of April in the Salle Herz. He was to play two new compositions; viz., a fantasia on le Prophète, and his Souvenir d'Italie.

Mlle. CLAUS is still extolled to the skies, especially in her performance of Beethoven's Sonata in C sharp minor (the "Moonlight"). She was to leave for London.

MUSICAL WORKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED BY MASON & LAW, 23 Park Row, Opposite Astor House, N. York.

THE ACADEMY VOCALIST. A Collection of Vocal Music, arranged for the use of Seminaries, High Schools, Singing Classes, &c. By GEORGE F. ROOT, Professor of Music in Rutgers and Spingler Institutes, the New York Institution for the Blind, &c. With a complete course of Elementary Instruction, Vocal Exercises, and Solfegeios, by LOWELL MASON.

This work is intended to supply a want long felt in our Higher Schools and Institutions. The music is arranged for three parts, and in such a manner that it may be sung exclusively by female voices or by a mixed choir. Whenever solos occur, a simple accompaniment for the Piano Forte or Melodeon has been added. The work is printed from new English type and on beautiful paper. Retail price, 62 1-2 cents.

ZUNDEL'S ORGAN BOOK. By JOHN ZUNDEL. Two Hundred and Fifty Easy Voluntaries and Interludes for the Organ, Melodeon, Seraphine, &c. With Introductory Remarks, Description of Stops, Directions for the Purchase of Organs, &c., adapting the work especially to the wants of young organists, and those who have made sufficient progress to accompany plain Psalmody on the Organ, Melodeon, or Seraphine. Retail price, $1.50.

THE GLEE HIVE. BOSTON ACADEMY OF MUSIC. A Collection of Glee and Part Songs, selected and arranged for the Musical Conventions and Teachers' Institutes of the Boston Academy of Music. By LOWELL MASON and GEORGE JAMES WEBB.

WILDER'S SCHOOL MUSIC. A Collection of Thirty-six New and Beautiful Songs, arranged for Schools and Juvenile Classes. By L. WILDER, Teacher of Music in the Brooklyn Music Schools, &c.

This work has already been adopted in the Schools of Brooklyn, New York, &c. Retail price, 18 3-4 cents.

CANTICA LAUDIS: OR, THE AMERICAN BOOK OF CHURCH MUSIC. By LOWELL MASON, Professor in the Boston Academy of Music, Editor of the Boston Handel and Haydn Society's Collection, Carmina Sacra, and other of the most popular Music Books in the country; and GEORGE JAMES WEBB, Professor in the Boston Academy of Music, and Editor of many valuable Musical Works.

The increased satisfaction with which it was received, and the unprecedented success of this book, MASON AND WEBB'S LATEST WORK, as well as the warm commendations it has received from the Musical Profession generally, establish it as the best and most attractive collection of Church Music which even these celebrated authors have ever produced. It contains a greater amount, as well as variety, of truly beautiful new tunes, anthems, chants, and other pieces, than any similar work; besides a copious collection of the standard old tunes. The Elements of Vocal Music have been newly and most carefully prepared, and to adapt it more particularly to CHORUS AND SINGING SCHOOLS, about Two Hundred Solfege Exercises and Progressive Lessons have been added. In addition to numerous testimonials from the press, it having been pronounced the "MOST VALUABLE BOOK OF CHURCH MUSIC EVER ISSUED," it has received from every section of the country the unqualified approbation of more than ONE HUNDRED PROFESSORS AND TEACHERS OF MUSIC. Retail price, 88 cents.

JUST PUBLISHED,

MARX'S MUSICAL COMPOSITION. The Theory and Practice of Musical Composition. By ADOLPH BERNARD MARX, Doctor of Music, &c. Translated from the third German Edition, and edited by HERMANN S. SARONI.

A. B. MARX holds such high rank in Germany as a writer upon the subject of Musical Composition, that any recommendation of his great work to those who are at all acquainted with the musical literature of the land which is emphatically the home of music, would be superfluous. It is without a rival as a treatise upon this subject, thoroughly scientific and yet adapted to popular comprehension.

The present translation is beautifully printed in 406 octavo pages, and bound in English cloth. Retail price, $2.50.

NEW HYMN AND TUNE BOOK.

TEMPLE MELODIES. A Collection of nearly all the Standard and Popular Tunes, in connection with Five Hundred Favorite Hymns; arranged as a Hymn and Tune Book for Vestries, Social Meetings, Congregational and Family Worship, &c. By DARIUS E. JONES.

This work has already been introduced, and is used with great satisfaction and profit in the vestries of many Churches and in the Congregations of some, while the publishers have received numerous recommendations from Clergymen and others. Those who love the old tunes, and who deem it a desirable object that as many as possible should unite in the singing, especially at social meetings, will find this exactly the book wanted.

ARY SCHEFFER'S

PAINTING OF

THE DEAD CHRIST,

IS NOW OFFERED FOR SALE at about one-third of the cost of importation; namely, the low price of Fifteen Hundred Dollars.

This is an opportunity of obtaining, at an unprecedented low price, a celebrated work of SCHEFFER, who is universally conceded to be one of the greatest of modern painters. Severe, spiritual, grand, simple — he possesses the most wonderful power over the heart, and the pathos and force of his ideas enchain the attention and excite the soul with holy passion. His world-renowned painting of "Christus Consolator" finds an equal in this late production of his pencil.

This picture is on exhibition and sale, at Apr. 10. tf N. D. COTTON'S, 13 Tremont Row.

MY SONGS.

FROM THE GERMAN.

All my little songs and fancies
Are the moment's birth alone.
As the fleeting hour advances
Vanishes each winged tone.

Fate poetic souls must sever,
And no tongue must breathe their name.
Ah! how vain to hope that ever
I shall win a lasting fame.

Tones upon my harp-strings burning,
When my heart is touched and thrilled,
Only when to hearts returning
Find their destiny fulfilled.

May their ringing echoes cheer me
When my lyre is hushed and dead,
And the Angel Death is near me
Beckoning to my lonely bed.

MOZART'S DON GIOVANNI.

[The relation of this immortal music to the story and libretto is happily shown in the following imaginary conversation between the musician and the poet, each speaking from his own point of view. It is from a remarkable work (written by a Russian) upon the Life and Genius of MOZART, of which we are preparing a translation for the press.]

If we examine the scenes of the libretto singly, we find at first a want of connection and a strange medley, as if the most heterogeneous elements of dramatic poetry had been thrown into a bag and shaken up, and then drawn out like the numbers in a lottery. In fact what do we see? A merry marriage, and on the way to it a bloody corpse; love breaking its first vow, and life expiring with its last gasp; an orgy in the house of the living, and in the churchyard a ræonassent that speaks; trivial fun and drollery, mingled with attempted deeds of violence, with murder, cries of despair, oaths of revenge and apparitions from the tomb; a banquet with champagne and spiced with music, and Death in person as a guest; Melpomene and Harlequin, men and demons, dancing at the same feast! Then, when all this crowd has whirled round to dizziness within this phantasmagoric circle, when all the contrasts of human nature have exhausted themselves in these Saturnalia of the imagination, every one withdraws, scarce knowing whither, with the exception of the hero of the piece, who goes to hell.

Can you imagine how DA PONTE, the successor of METASTASIO, the court poet at Vienna, nourished on the milk of the most sound and classic doctrines, could, in the year of grace 1787, have soared in this singular work to the highest pitch of romance, which reminds one of the "Mysteries" of the middle ages, and which, forsaking all the traditions of dramatic art in the eighteenth century, could not seem good enough for anything but a puppet show! Many years had flown since "Don Juan" was first put upon the stage, when the critics cried out about the absurdity of the poem, though they admitted that it had afforded to the composer the matter for a music, the like of which was never heard before. They did not explain this accident, for accident admits no explanation; besides, they were in the right. The libretto without the music is as absurd as possible; and yet this absurd text and this sublime music form together but one body and one soul; and yet, for all that, there is no one who will not recognize how far the images of the composer exceed the contour of their poetic outlines, and how little they are like them too. No one will fail to see in the story of Don Juan, as it is moulded by the music, an order of things entirely foreign to the contents of the libretto.

We wish to point the attention of the reader, with the finger, so to speak, to the difference in the points of view from which the musician and the poet proceeded. If you consider them singly, their intention is divided, indeed sometimes even opposed; yet there is throughout an understanding and a harmony between them, as soon as you take them together. To this end we imagine a sort of historical romance, but without any outlay of fancy,—a dialogue, in which the authors of "Don Juan" talk over their design, one proceeding from the letter of his poem, the other from the spirit of his score. Both seem to us to be so clear, that we run no risk, if we translate their thoughts.

MOZART. My dear Abbé, I want a text for an opera, but do not give me, I beg you, another French comedy. This time I have to do neither with the court, nor with Vienna. I am to work for the Prague public, who understand every syllable from me, and for the orchestra in Prague, who play me at sight. The troupe is excellent, and the singers can do everything I ask of them. It is precisely as if MOZART were working for MOZART. It must do me honor. I should like to have something out of the common run. Help me to it.

DA PONTE. You could not come more opportunely. I am just now engaged upon a text. It is taken from an old comedy by TIRSO DE MOLINA, and is called: "The Marble Guest, or the Scape-grace of Seville." MOLIERE and GOLDONI have made comedies out of it; I have an idea of working it up into an opera. It is the most remarkable tale of diablerie. Nothing like it was ever offered to the dilettanti; only I feared that no composer would be pleased with it.

MOZART. Let me see what there is in this devil story.

DA PONTE. In the first place there is an equestrian statue, who, being invited to a supper, gets off his horse, because it would not be quite the thing to enter a saloon borne upon four feet. The statue refuses to eat anything; on the contrary, he holds forth to the master of the house, a precious scamp, in a very edifying discourse, and thereupon takes him down with himself to hell. That will be very fine, I assure you. A player with chalked face, a delft helmet, white glazed gloves, and a complete Roman suit of armor manufactured of old linen. (Laughs.) Moreover there will be lightning out of all the trap-doors, and devils of every line. About one thing only I am in despair, you see. And that is the speech of the spectre; for, although I flatter myself that I understand my trade as well as any one, I am not SHAKESPEARE, that I can make ghosts speak.

MOZART. No matter what he says. Death will speak in my orchestra, and in a way to be understood. I know too well how he speaks. Excellent! The statue is a settled matter. What else is there?

DA PONTE. Next there is a beautiful lady; the statue is her father, who was killed in single combat by the reprobate, the hero of the piece. The Signorina weeps, is naturally quite inconsolable, and indeed the more so, since the traitor has nearly played her a very base trick, her, the daughter of a Commendatore, and what is more, the betrothed of the handsomest young man in Andalusia. She swears to be revenged. So far it all goes well for you, maestro; but now comes the bad part. The young man, who expects to marry her, and who is charged with the duty of avenging her father, makes many promises, in fact he draws his sword; but before the knave, who is as resolute and brave as four, he loses his presence of mind, and the sword improves this opportunity to slip quietly back into the scabbard. Our lover is, I confess, a poor knight. You see him always following the footsteps of his beloved, like a prolongation of the train of her black robe. There was no means of representing him otherwise; so that the lamentations of the Signorina and her schemes of revenge bring nothing to pass.

MOZART. You would bring the impossible to pass! You would hasten the justice of heaven! You would wake up the dead from their graves! You ought to comprehend that it is the imperious cry, the superhuman cry for vengeance, which brings in the statue. Between these things there is an obvious connection. Abbé, I am in raptures with our prima donna; I would have chosen her among thousands. As for the bridegroom, he deserves not your reproaches. How can you desire the poverino to do battle with this incarnate devil, who offers a glass of wine to the ghost of the old man whom he has murdered? The daughter's husband would have gone after his father-in-law, and then, as in "Figaro," we should have had no tenore. A fine advantage! Caro amico, you know not what such a man is; I understand your scape-grace; but patience! when you shall see him on the stage, facing the statue, his eyes flashing with desperation, irony and blasphemy upon his lips, while the hairs of the audience stand on end (I will look out for that!); when he shall say: parla! che chiedi? che vuoi? (speak! what do you ask? what do you want?); then you will recognize him. No, no, a reprobate of this stamp can not be punished by the hand of a living mortal. It would make the devil jealous. Body and soul, the devil alone must have all; have compassion therefore on the young man. He promises, he would, he even tries: is not that all a prima donna could require of a loyal tenor in such a case! You see, the life of our lover is altogether an internal life; it is all spent in his love; it will be great and beautiful, my word for it. (Looking over the manu- script.) You make him swear by the eyes of his beloved, by the blood of the murdered old man. What a duett!

DA PONTE. Truly, maestro, you are right. What a blockhead I was not to see how much wit I had; that seldom happens with my peers! But will you be as well contented with the rest, which I have yet to lay before you? This villain is a terrible devourer of women. In Spain alone he has already swallowed one thousand and three, and the devil of a man has travelled much. You will see that I could not bring all these ladies on the stage; but I needed at least one as the representative of this host of victims. I have taken her from Burgos, where our man stole her heart, and then, what know I how or where, deserted her. This Didone abbandonata, wife, widow, or young lady, (for that is a point which I leave undecided), cannot digest her shame. She pursues him over hill and vale, and inquires of every one she meets about the faithless fellow. At length she finds him deeply occupied with another. Instead of offering her excuses, the briccone laughs in her face and leaves her with his servant. The lady never loses courage. She is persuaded to wander through the streets by night with this very servant, disguised in the cap and gold-laced mantle of his master. She perseveres in loving the traitor, and after all hope is lost, seeks at least to convert him, though compelled to renounce his possession. Between ourselves, maestro, I believe that she is mad. You see, we can make nothing else out of her.

MOZART. O, the noble, the adorable person! Mad, say you? yes, for you poets, who regard nothing but the actions of persons and the words, which you put into their mouths at random. But to what different interpretations are not the words, nay even the actions liable! It is necessary to look into the heart, and, next to God, it is the musician only who can look in. Mad! At all events she is good enough to excite coarse merriment! Make her say what you will, but when my music like a mirror shall reflect the image of this high-minded and devoted soul, I trust my friends will see something very different from a mad woman in her. (Looking through the manuscript.) She comes to his last supper. That is altogether admirable; the unheeded voice of the guardian angel, letting itself be heard before the voice of judgment. (After musing a while.) Besides, this passionate and energetic person is the necessary link between the other persons, the two most prominent of whom, as I already perceive, are destined to a passive part. Didone abbandonata shall be the angel of the drama, and, so far as the music is concerned, the nucleus of the concerted pieces. She will afford us trios, quartets, perhaps even a sextet, should there be occasion. I have found a relish in the sextet, since we tried it in "Figaro," although the lyric stuff was very poor. Is it not strange, my dear friend; the better you do your part, the less are you aware of it!

DA PONTE. I am satisfied, if you take it so. As to the sextet, there is an opportunity for one; we are not yet at the end of our list of persons; there is one who certainly will please you: a young rustic bride, who is open-hearted, full of feeling, a little coquettish, to be sure, and even somewhat imprudent, but only from necessity, as you shall see. A morsel worthy of you, my gallant maestro!

MOZART. And of thee too, thou holy man of an Abbé.* We know you.

DA PONTE. The scape-grace meets her with her wedding procession. He is a connoisseur, this scape-grace, we do him the justice to acknowledge that, and he has always a plenty of intrigues on hand. A moment suffices for him to lead the wedding guests aside as well as the bridegroom, who is a blockhead, a regular simpleton. The peasant bride is on the point of falling into the snare, like a lured bird, when some one grasps her arm and holds her back. This is our Didone abbandonata, who carries off the prize from the briccone in the very nick of time. This master in the art of seduction however is not put down; he tries to to use force, which happily does not succeed. The bridegroom, blockhead as he is, is nevertheless enraged and means to have his rights; but it turns out, I do not know exactly why, that he, instead of administering blows, gets them himself, and well laid on. He howls like one possessed. The little lady comes running in at his cry, and examines the bumps and bruises they have left upon the dear man with the butt of his own musket. A trifle! the little lady knows a specific, that will heal him in a moment. You must not forget, maestro, that the night just commencing is that of her wedding day. I have done the best I could, caro maestro, and have written a sort of Cavatina.

MOZART. Let us see the Cavatina. (Reads.) Vedrai carino, &c. Hem! a very poorly disguised —! Well, you could not have made it anything else; but my plan, do you understand it? is to describe in music the sweetest moment of life, the heart's supreme bliss and ecstasy! Another poet would have tried to express this in his way, and would have just spoiled it all for me; but you, whom I love as the apple of my eye, you, my devoted comrade, my faithful Pylades, you, the true poet of the composer, you take my hand, lay it upon a heart beating with rapture, and say to me: sentilo battere (feel it beat). Now indeed, it is for me to feel and to make others feel. All the ecstasy of love shall express itself in this Cavatina; glowing and chaste shall it be, in spite of the text. The text gives the language of a peasant girl; it becomes her; the music shall be its soul, the soul of MOZART, as he led his Constance to the nuptial bed. You see, I am already madly in love with our country maiden.

DA PONTE. (Somewhat excited.) I knew that she would please you.

MOZART. (After reflecting anew.) But, dear Abbé, to what genus does our common work belong. Plainly no opera seria will come of it. The great scape-grace and woman-devourer, the Didone abbandonata, about whom they make merry, the blockhead who is jeered and cudged, even the statue, who accepts an invitation to supper, all this seems to be far from suitable to the heroic kind. At the most, only the daughter of the Commendatore and her lover could come on in the coturnus; and your renowned predecessor, Signor Metastasio, of glorious and enduring memory, would have rejected even these with contempt, because they are neither Greeks nor Romans, neither kings nor princesses. On the other hand, a piece, which ends with the death of the principal person, and whose closing decoration is a representation of Hell, is quite as far from being an opera buffa. What is it then?

* The Abbé passed for a woman-hunter.

DA PONTE. (Almost angry.) Corpo di Bacco! am I then a simpleton, that you can suppose I meant to make an opera seria of such materials. My purpose was, to write a dramma giocoso, and the comic element is nowhere wanting in the plot which I have the honor to explain to you. But you take the thing up in a way MOZART. Let us not get excited. Am I not contentissimo with all that you have given me? Dramma giocoso let it be then; what care I for the title of the work? after us perhaps somebody will find a better one for it. What is of the most importance to me is, that all sorts of contrasts are found united in it; everything in this opera must be brought out in strong colors. Foolery must not look paler than crime; nor love paler than anger and revenge. Else would the last form, that of death, crush all to atoms. There is something so fine in laughter! In "Figaro" I have only smiled; but here I want to laugh out heartily, to unburden myself in earnest; only about whom and with whom, is so far not quite clear to me. You know my views about your alleged crazy lady. The country bumpkin, to be sure, might entertain the public by his rôle, but this does not afford much material for the score. A blockhead in music is the same thing as in the world, poco o niente. Have you not perhaps still another person in reserve? You smile.

DA PONTE. I see, I must produce in self-defence the very thing which I kept back at first, in order to prepare a pleasant surprise for you. Yes, my dear, we have a buffo ex officio, and I agree to lose my place as poet to the imperial royal troupe in Vienna; yes, I will renounce my peculiarity as an Italian to become a Tedesco (a German) in the broadest sense of the word, if the buffo is not to your taste.

MOZART. I do not doubt it. You Italians are masters in buffoonery.

DA PONTE. You Italians! And who are you, then, sir composer of the "Marriage of Figaro"?

MOZART. I flatter myself, I am your equal in certain respects, though not in all.

DA PONTE. And do you presume to be more than an Italian in Music?

MOZART. We will talk about that, when our present business is finished. Now the question is about the buffo; and if it is worth the pains, I will endeavor to make myself, so far as I am able, your compatriot.

DA PONTE. PAISIELLO would kiss my hand for his like. Judge yourself! Our buffoon is the servant, the secretary, the steward, the factotum of the briccone. Here it may be said: "like master, like servant." He resembles his master about as much as a well-dressed ape might have resembled the devil, before the rebellious angel had cloven feet and tail. As to the morale of the creature, he is a coward, a lick-spittle, a great talker, and a jester, and for the rest the best man in the world. He frankly blames the conduct of his master; he mourns most heartily over the young birds, who let themselves be caught by his amorous oglings and caresses; and this pursuit, in which he is entirely disinterested, seems to him so diverting, that he cannot help seconding with all his powers the bird-catcher, whose dexterity has inspired him with a profound admiration. He curses every day the onerous drudgeries, the long fastings and the dangers, to which the adventures of the Don expose him; every day he takes his leave, and every day his sheer simplicity, a certain spirit of adventure, and more than all, his attachment to his master, whom he regards at the same time as a monstrous villain and as an admirable man, entangle him against his will in the most abominable transactions. You see him sticking his nose into every broil. If his own hide is in danger, the rogue slips through your fingers, like an eel, the very moment that you think you have him. Should he see the devil, he would first shut both eyes, then he would half open one of them, because the devil is a sight not always to be seen. In short he is a compound of good nature and low drollery, of cowardice and light-hearted improvidence, of awkward apishness and instinctive cleverness, of natural and original stupidity, and of some borrowed understanding. Ha! what say you to him? Have I not given you a rich conception of our buffo?

MOZART. Yes, above price! sketched with a master's hand; the only character that you have perfectly comprehended! It only remains for me to put on the coloring; this time, if I fulfil your design, I am lucky.

DA PONTE. I forgot to tell you, that the pleasant rogue is the editor of a private journal, for which his master furnishes him the matter. Such a delectable journal, such an awful chronicle there never was before. In it you find entered, in the order of dates and places, the names, qualities, ages, and a complete inventory of all the beauties whom his patron has honored with his attentions. I presume that you would find also a historical sketch of each adventure. For the journal already forms an immense folio volume. Naturally enough, this servant is rather proud of his labors as editor. He reads it to everybody, who will or who will not listen. As to seizing the fit hour and audience, you will see that he has about as much tact as any of his colleagues, who drive the pen. The forsaken Dido awaits an explanation; now is the time or never, thinks the historian of the king of scape-graces. Surely, nothing can console her so well as a work, in which there is a chapter especially devoted to her; and instantly he prepares this edifying lecture for her. Is not this comic?

MOZART. Comic certainly, but scandalous, and almost horrible. I will put in an apology to the audience, that they may pardon you this joke. At bottom it is quite pardonable. Dido is an entirely victimized person in the dramatic point of view; one wrong more, one insult less, — she is used to that, poor lady. These are all glowing coals heaped upon the head of the briccone! We could not collect grievances enough against him, to bring the contents of the piece into harmony with the developement and the finale. But, a propos! how many acts has the opera?

DA PONTE. Two acts, which will certainly outweigh four.

MOZART. What shall we have for the finale of the first? I should like a grand finale with choruses and scenic action.

DA PONTE. Verily that shall not be wanting. You shall have a splendid festival, to which the briccone invites all the passers by. You shall have peasants, peasant-girls, and masks, ball, music, and magnificent supper. Here is the knave of a master, planning the most abominable tricks, and the knave of a servant, paving the way; others are busied with plans of revenge; the crowd drink and dance, including the blockhead, whom they also persuade to dance, though his heart goes not to the violins. All is pell-mell, what we technically call a beautiful confusion. Suddenly in the midst of this gay whirl is heard a piercing shriek from an adjoining cabinet. What is the matter? They all look round, and find the young lady missing; the briccone too has disappeared. Ah! the traitor! ah! the arch villain! you understand. . . . They shriek, they swear, they storm, they beat the door with violence, it bursts open, and forth steps the briccone, sword in hand, dragging his servant by the hair. He the guilty one! O, no! bold liar. He is surrounded, encircled, pressed upon, insulted, stunned, confounded; a hundred clubs are brandished over his head. The tenor makes the most of his lungs, the women support him with their screams, as the old geese do when the goslings fight; the musicians jump over their overturned desks and rush out; a storm, which happens to be raging out of doors, comes as if called to take part in the heathenish uproar. Shrieks and confusion, seem to know no bounds. Ah, mein Herr! are we fairly rid then of our scape-grace; the pitcher goes to water till it breaks. No, by no means! Our briccone, whose eyes glarè like a tiger's, his drawn sword in his right hand, hurls back with his left whatever opposes his way; he cudgels the invited guests, receives no wound and disappears behind the scenes, with a loud, devilish laugh. The curtain falls; you clap your hands with approbation.

MOZART (embracing the Abbé several times with enthusiasm.) Friend! brother! benefactor! What demon or what god has poured all this into thy poor poet's brain? Know, that the world owes you a monument for this finale. Tell me no more; I know the thing now better than yourself. You are a great man. You task the powers of the musician terribly, but never did a more splendid opera subject come out of the head of an artist, and never will there come such another. Let me embrace you once more, my dearest friend, and thank you in the name of all the Faculty of composers, singers, instrumentists and dilettanti, nunc et in secula seculorum!

DA PONTE (much flattered.) O, you are too good, dearest maestro! Spare my modesty. In your opinion then I have produced a masterpiece?

MOZART (inspired.) Without the slightest doubt. You, or the destiny of MOZART. It now remains for us to combine the concerted pieces; in relation to which you shall receive from me, as you did for "Figaro," the most precise and circumstantial instructions. I will also give you the poetical thoughts of the arias, which shall characterize the persons as I conceive them. As to the action, there is nothing to be said.

DA PONTE. My rule, my metrical compass, my shears and file are at your service, and I will say all that your propose to do. You believe then, that our opera will rise to the stars?

MOZART. I know nothing about that, but I believe that sooner or later "Don Juan" will make some noise in the world.

ERNST IN SWITZERLAND. From Bâle, Ernst went to Zurich, and the day after his arrival he gave his first concert in the Casino. What gave to this concert a more than ordinary interest, was the presence of the unfortunate Countess Bathyani, who was desirous of hearing the accomplished virtuoso whom Hungary had applauded and fêted in happier times. Since the illustrious lady has inhabited Zurich, she has not been once to the theatre. Ernst played his famous solo on the Hungarian melodies, with that expression of tender poesy which always animates his execution. Tears were seen to flow from the cheeks of the Countess Batthyani, and the following day she was anxious to see and speak with the great artist, who had given her such sweet and profound emotion. This touching interview produced a deep sensation in Zurich and the vicinities.

[HENRI HEINE has written perhaps better verses for music than almost any man since Shakspeare. The following little wildflower of his fancy (of which we translate the form only, and the sense, so far as it is not for life or death involved in the untranslatable melody of the German words,) is the theme of one of ROBERT SCHUMANN's most exquisite and unique melodies. It will be understood that in German, the Moon is masculine and the Sun feminine.]

THE LOTOS-FLOWER.

FROM THE GERMAN OF HENRI HEINE.

The Lotos-flower is troubled
Before the Sun so bright,
And with her head down drooping
She dreaming awaiteth the night.

The Moon he is her wooer,
He wakes her with softest rays,
And to him all friendly unveils she
Her flow'r-sweet, innocent face.

She blows and glows and brightens,
And straightens up mutely again,
Tears sheds she and odors, and trembles
For love and for love's sweet pain.

FREDERIC CHOPIN.

BY FRANZ LISZT.

III.

These aberrations of an over-excited feeling, which however never lessen the rare worth of the harmonic material — on the contrary they entice the initiated to a deeper study of it — are scarcely to be found at all in the more familiar and favorite compositions of CHOPIN. His Polonaises, which are less sought than they deserve to be — to be sure, it is very difficult to perform them perfectly — belong among the finest products of his inspirations. That they have nothing in common with the painted primness of ball-room, virtuoso and saloon polonaises, will be understood of itself. Their powerful rhythm electrifies the slack nerves of our blasé indifference. The noblest traditions of the Polish national character are preserved in them: that firm determination and that earnest pride of the old Slaves steps forth from them to meet us. Almost all of them breathe the warlike sentiment, together with the tranquil, thoughtful power, which was the inheritance of those Poles, who, following the maxim of Boleslaw, the duke of Pomerania: "First weigh it, then dare it!" combined the courage of the brave with that chivalric courtesy to women, which neither on the day before nor after the battle ever forsook those warriors, and which to the heroic king Sobiewski, "when the horse-tails of the Crescent were as thick before him as the ears upon a corn-field," suggested the tenderest letters to his wife.

In listening to many of CHOPIN's Polonaises, you fancy that you hear the firm and heavy tread of men, advancing with the consciousness of courage against every turn of fate. In some of the others this broad manner disappears. Especially in the Polonaise-Fantasia, which belongs to the last period of his works, you perceive no more those bold and brilliant portraits; no more the lively step of that cavalry so used to victory; an elegiac mood predominates, which at the most is interrupted only by a melancholy smile.

The celebrated Mazourkas of CHOPIN wear an entirely different character from the Polonaises. Upon a wholly different ground play tender, pale and opaline nuances, instead of the juicy and strong coloring. The feminine — and even effeminate — element is no longer placed in a certain mysterious twilight, but advances into the foreground with such decided significance, that the other elements vanish before it or are banished into its train. Woman here appears the queen of life: Man, to be sure, is still spirited and proud, but lost in the dizziness of pleasure. In spite of this, there is a sad vein running through it. The national songs, in their melody and in their words, strike both these tones, and both bring out the singularly effective contrast, which results in real life from that necessity of cheering sorrow, which finds a magical narcotic in the grace and stolen charm of the Mazourka. The words, sung in Poland to these melodies, give them moreover the right to cling closer to the life of memory than any other dance music.

CHOPIN has happily appropriated to himself the popular melodies and transferred into them the whole merit of his labor and his style. In polishing these diamonds to a thousand facettes, he discovered all their hidden fire, and, even gathering up their dust, he set them in a pearly ornament. Could there be a better frame, in which to enclose his personal recollections, poesy of all sorts, attractive scenes, episodes and romances? These now owe to him a circulation far outreaching their own native soil, and they belong at present to the ideal types, which Art surrounds with the glory of its sanction.

CHOPIN has set free from its bondage the secret essence of Poesy, which is only indicated in the original themes of the Polish mazourkas. While he has adhered to their rhythm, he has ennobled their melody, enlarged their outline, and magically introduced into many passages a harmonic chiar-oscuro, which gives back that world of excitements and emotions, wherewith hearts are moved in the dance of the mazourka. Coquetry, vanity, fantastical humors, inclination, sadness, passion, the outgush of feelings, all are in it. To comprehend how admirably this frame suits these soul-pictures, which CHOPIN executes within it as with a pencil dipped in the colors of the rainbow, one must have seen the Mazourka danced in Poland; there only can one learn the whole that lies in this national dance.

Indeed one must perhaps have been in CHOPIN's Fatherland, fully to understand and appreciate the character not only of his Mazourkas, but also of many of his other compositions. They almost all breathe that aroma of love and longing, which surrounds his Preludes, his Nottornos, his Impromptus, like an atmosphere, in which all the phases of passion move by in succession. In all these compositions, as in every Ballad, every Waltz, every Etude of CHOPIN, lies the memory of a fleeting moment of life full of poetry, which he often so idealizes and spins his web out of such fine, ethereal threads, that they seem no longer to belong to our nature, but to the fairy world, and sound like the chattering, confidential whisper of a Peri, a Titania, an Ariel, or of those elemental spirits, which likewise are subject to the bitterest illusions and to unendurable ennui.

Amongst the great number of his Mazourkas, too, there reigns a striking diversity of subjects and of the impressions they call forth. In many you hear the clink of spurs, but in the most above all the scarcely distinguishable rustling of crape and gauze in the light breeze of the dance, amid the flutter of fans and the jingling of gold and diamonds. Some seem to describe the lively enjoyment of a ball, which on the eve of a storming of the castle is as it were undermined with heaviness: you hear the sighs throughout the dance-rhythm, and the dying away of the farewell, whose tears it veils. Through others glimmers the anguish, the secret sorrow, which one has carried with him to the festival, whose stir cannot drown the voice of the heart. There it is a murmuring whirlwind, a delirium, through which a breathless and spasmodic melody is hurrying to and fro, like the impetuous beating of a heart, that breaks and perishes in love and passion. There again resound from afar bold fanfara, like distant reminiscences of glory and of victory. Some there are, whose rhythm is as vague and evanescent, as the feeling, with which two lovers contemplate the rising of a star in the firmament.

One afternoon — there were but three of us — CHOPIN had been playing a long time, and one of the most distinguished ladies of Paris felt herself overcome by a certain mournful feeling of devotion, somewhat such as comes upon us at the sight of grave-stones on those fields in Turkey, whose cool shades and beds of flowers hold out to the astonished traveller the promise of a cheerful garden. She asked him, whence the involuntary awe might come, which bowed her heart before monuments, whose exterior disclosed only what was soft and lovely to the eye, and how he would name the extraordinary feeling which he enclosed in his compositions, as if it were the ashes of unknown ones within sumptuous deeply hollowed alabaster urns? Conquered by the beautiful tears, which moistened such beautiful eyelashes, CHOPIN answered with an openness, that was rare with him, in cases which concerned the secret relics he had concealed in the shining casket of his works. He told her, that her heart had not deceived her in its melancholy mood; since, bright and cheerful as he sometimes was, he could not free himself entirely from a feeling, which in a certain manner formed the bottom of his heart, and for which he found an expression only in his mother tongue, no other having a word corresponding to the Polish Zal. This word includes the whole gradation of feelings, which a deep grief engenders in the soul of man, from mere dejection and regret to bitterness and hatred.

And in truth it is this Zal, which gives to all of CHOPIN's works their peculiar color. It is not wanting even in his loveliest reveries, — those in which BERLIOZ, that Shakspearian mind, embracing all extremes, saw with so accurate a glance "de divines chatteries;"* that is to say, the coaxing, flattering love-charm, which is peculiar only to the women of those semi-oriental countries, whereby the men are cradled by their mothers, fondled by their sisters, enchanted by their sweet-hearts, and in comparison with which the coquetries of other women appear awkward and insipid to them, so that they exclaim with perfect justice: Niema iak Polki! (Nothing beats the Polish ladies!) That caressing, sportive nature, at once so full of abandon and of reserve, transports the heart into the wavering, aimless motion of a boat without sail or rudder.

* Untranslatable. By chatteries Berlioz seems to have had in mind the playful fondling of little kittens.

In his playing, CHORIN painted in a fascinating manner this wavering and heaving, letting the melody continually rise and sink like a boat upon the undulations of the mighty waves. In his works he indicated this manner, which lent such a peculiar stamp to his playing, by the mark "Tempo rubato." Latterly he left it out, persuaded that, if one correctly understood his compositions, it would be impossible for him not to divine this rule of irregularity. In fact his music must be delivered with that sort of accented and prosodically measured wavering, of which it is difficult to catch the secret, if one has not often heard him play himself. He took much pains to impart this mode of playing to his numerous pupils, especially his countrymen; and the Poles, or rather the Polish ladies, caught it with the talent and the tact, which they possess for every thing, that has to do with poesy or feeling.

RATES OF POSTAGE. We receive many inquiries and complaints from out-of-town subscribers, who have been grievously taxed with postage on our Journal. This need not be. Subscribers have only to pay at the post office by the quarter, in advance, and the postage for this Journal, as fixed by law, is only five cents per quarter, for any distance not exceeding fifty miles, and ten cents per quarter for any distance not exceeding three hundred miles. By neglecting to pay in advance, subscribers are charged the high rates of transient newspapers.

Mendelssohn Quintet Club.

The last of the public rehearsals took place in Cochituate Hall last Tuesday afternoon, and was an occasion of unusual interest. The Club had during the morning contributed the music to the academic exhibition at "Old Harvard." This was a pure con amore rehearsal, and the pieces very choice. There was none of the anxiety of preparation for a concert, but the real enjoyment of re-testing the virtues of good music in a circle of good listeners. First came MENDELSSOHN'S earlier Quintet, op. 18, a rich and varied banquet in itself, whose flavors never pall upon the taste, and whose guests never miss any of the old enthusiasm. Next, by way of variety, Mr. WULF FRIES "said" (as the present French musical critics express it) the Serenade of SCHUBERT on his violoncello, with quartet accompaniment. — Then came a Quartet by MENDELSSOHN, in E flat, with a pathetic slow introduction, a passionate Allegro, an Adagio of the profoundest melancholy, a quaint minor strain in the spirit of some wild old Volkstied or Ballad, and a bold finale: — in fact the whole, by its eminently impassioned character, now and then analogous to Beethoven's Sonata, might be distinguished as the "Quartet Pathétique."

But the last piece was the climax of this kind of inspiration. No words could describe that wonderful Quartet of Beethoven, in C, though opening with chords that indicate no settled key, and in which the most fantastic and original humors of the man are worked out with a gigantic force of logic. Much of it reminds one of ideal landscapes of the boldest and wildest Alpine scenery, relieved with exquisite green spots where the sunshine loves to linger and tempt forth the innocent, sweet flowers. In one passage, the smooth commingling of the harmonic currents, with the cool feeling of deep, quiet waters, seems an unconscious presentiment of what is most Mendelssohnian in MENDELSSOHN. To crown the whole with glory, a fugue-theme, of unusual length and florid figure, is at last introduced by a single instrument, and, duly answered by the others in their turns, is wrought up with surprising power and beauty. It tasks the utmost hardihood of execution, but at the same time inspires the courage (without which man would not be so much above machines and animals) to essay even the Impossible.

Mr. AUGUST FRIES, the genial leader of the Club, sails this week for Europe. A pleasant summer to him in his native Germany, and may he bring back fresh inspiration from that real home of Art, as well as more "treasures new and old" of its choice music. Another season will, we trust, show the "Mendelssohnians" that a hearty and a paying audience has at length been moulded by their potent, plastic spell into a true and constant sympathy with what they may undertake for us in the way of genuine classic music

Mlle. Clauss. — An American's Description.

This rising star among the pianists, of whom we have already transferred some notices from the French papers, has excited the interest of "Spiridion," the lively Paris correspondent of the Atlas, who thus tells her story:

"Picture to yourself a beauty of the Saxon race: a beautiful, smiling, and yet poetical face, set off by silken pale blond ringlets, eyes of limpid blue, lips perhaps rather too large, but bright as rubies, and full of frankness, innocence, and kind-heartedness, hands small as an infant's, so delicate that you may trace the blue veins in them — a timid, modest, embarrassed woman. A face of that chaste, divine, melancholy, loving expression which characterizes the women of the Saxon race; which seems formed by God for the solace of some happy hearth, for a mother and for a home.

"What does she here? Why have precocious sorrows traced their lines on that face, made to be loved and to be sheltered even from the rougher winds of heaven?

"Alas! the common tale: Misfortunes and poverty. Her father died before she was out of the nurse's arms, the mother strained her resources to educate her; she evinced some talents for music; new privations were supported; other efforts were made to cultivate these gifts. The child was now grown to be the girl of eighteen; it was time she contributed to the common stock.

"Mother and daughter came to Paris, to thrust their hands in the great wheel where so many skinny fingers are seeking to secure prizes. This was about the close of last winter. Mlle. Clauss played in some drawing-rooms, and once in a grand matinée musicale of Berlioz, but she was unnoticed; even the musical journals and the feuilletons of Tuesday, which spoke of the beautiful concert-room, the fine eyes of Mme. Frezzolini, and the talents of Berlioz, seemed unconscious of her existence. . . . All she wanted was a line — one God speed you! — that she might give her own concert with some chance of success.

"She knew that she had but to be heard, and her success was assured; but Paris, so cordial, so kind to the famous, is completely indifferent to the obscure. It cannot be otherwise, so many appeals are made to her, so much mediocrity boasts the wand of genius.

"Unaided as she was, her concert must be given. Her mother, who had health and energy of character, went to printers, music sellers, critics. The poor girl was discouraged. She would not stir out of her house. She sat all day long on the piano stool, seeking consolation from her instrument. She had become pale and emaciated. Many a time her poor mother awoke in the night and looked to see if her child slept, and the child, to quiet her mother, hastily closed her eyes and feigned sleep. At last the great day was at hand, all the tickets had been sold and the bills printed. Suddenly Mme. Clauss falls sick, she becomes worse, her physicians give her up, she is delirious, she is dying, she is dead. The poor orphan throws herself upon her mother's corpse, bathes her cold hands with her tears, and almost reproaches her by her sobs to have gone and not taken her away too.

"Fortunately, they knew Mme. Sabbathier Ungher. This benevolent lady took her home and became a mother to her. Her kindness re-established her health, she returned to Paris this winter, and is famous. Thalberg and Herz and Liszt proclaim her the first of living performers."

A GOOD SUGGESTION. Many plans for reforming the system of Musical Notation are now agitated. Some of these would modify the common mode of representing music to the eye only in certain particulars; others proceed against it root and branch. All of them set forth a goodly show of reasons; but the difficulty is to turn the current of musical study out of its old channels into new ones, however straighter, plainer, easier these may be. But now and then a very slight change is suggested, which has but to be seen to be adopted, and which, once adopted, is fraught with conveniences quite out of proportion to the modest magnitude of the change itself. Such seems to us the very simple modification of the Staff, proposed in the following letter.

To those who sing at sight plain parts within a moderate compass, our old system of five lines is clear enough. But where added or leger lines abound, as in almost all instrumental music, the eye of the reader is often perplexed with the multitude of parallels; and it is hard to tell, without borrowing too much time for it, where the main lines of the staff leave off and where the added lines begin. This perplexity is simply and perfectly avoided by the suggestion of our correspondent. Let any music publisher adopt it in some standard publication, and we see not how it can fail to pass into universal practice.

But we let the originator of the idea speak for himself.

PORTLAND, Me.

MR. EDITOR: — It has occurred to me that an improvement may be made in the Staff upon which notes in music are written, by having the upper and lower lines made of double thickness, also of the added lines the fourth above or below, thus:

[See Huxten's Instruction Book, page 93.]

EX. I.

EX. II.

The advantages are, that in reading the leger lines at sight, there will be less hesitation in determining the letters; for often the short lines, being run together, leave the mind in doubt for an instant as to what those letters are; because the eye does not distinguish the fifth line on the Staff from any other.

Again, there will be less effort in reading notes, because having these prominent points to judge from, the eye will perceive not only with greater ease, but certainly, either in the bass or treble staff, thus assisting the experienced performer as well as the beginner.

I would, through your valuable journal, submit the idea to publishers of music for their reflection, hoping, if it be an improvement, that the musical public may be benefited by it.

ED. B. ROBINSON.

The Concert of Senora de Ribas.

There is an inherent difficulty in Complimentary concerts. The very effort to multiply attractions involves the fatality of a loss of unity in the programme, which seriously impairs the interest in a merely musical and artistic view. The musical interest has to give way somewhat, while the personal interest becomes the primary. All are anxious to lend their aid in making the compliment a solid one; many of the professional fraternity volunteer, and great as may be the heartiness of the thing, as well as the richness of material assembled, still it seldom hangs together well as an artistic feast. It almost always turns out that the bill of fare is too long, too miscellaneous, and that the viands it enumerates have been too hastily cooked.

This applies to nearly all such concerts, and of course it is no disparagement to that of Saturday last to own that it did not wholly escape the common fatality. In spite of the drenching rain, that flooded every thing, commencing but an hour before the concert, it was gratifying to see the Melodeon quite well filled; and it was an audience in the best humor to be pleased. The orchestra embraced most of the resident talent; but the putting together was partly new; some, who were expected, failed, and substitutes had been called in at a moment's warning; the foresight of rehearsals therefore had been balked; and so the overtures moved forward rather confusedly and lamely. Especially that first one, to Massaniello — not Auber's, but Caraffa's — which opens with a slow movement in which the horns had much to say, and said it very unintelligibly. So too the accompaniments about spoiled the Trio from Don Juan, which seemed to have been well enough studied on the part of the singers.

Senora DE RIBAS was warmly received, nor had her voice lost any of its flexibility or sweetness. The air from Cimarosa she executed with great beauty. Her two younger sisters, Miss JULIA and Miss EMMA GARCIA, pleased by the rich and musical quality of both their voices. Mr. ARTHURSON sang "Thou sweet flowing Avon," Dr. Arne's old song, in pure voice and style, accompanying himself. Senor DE RIBAS played Ernst's Adagio Religioso on his oboe with a breadth and rich warmth of tone, so feelingly modulated, that this intractable instrument seemed, thus skilfully coaxed, not so very far inferior to the violin in power of expression. The piano-forte solo by Mr. GARCIA, (père), was a very neat, light-fingered performance, and proved that there is some virtue in the old school. Messrs. RIHA and FRIES played their brilliant Duo Concertante, by Kalliwoda, with the usual éclat.

A Few Words on an Opera House.

To the Editor of the Daily Advertiser:

SIR,—In an article under the above caption, which you did me the favor to publish on the 19th of June last, occur the following remarks:

"But, while the extensive canvassing which has been carried on by the friends of this project (the Boston Music Hall), has met with such signal success, it has further elicited in every quarter the unexpected, but most agreeable fact, that a large majority of the most influential class of our citizens, — of those in fact who pay for the erection of such buildings, and who patronize and enjoy them when erected, — desire an opera house in addition to the Hall, a bona fide opera house, of such a size and character as shall give them and their families the means of permanently enjoying the Opera in their own city, such as shall place Boston in the foremost rank of music-loving and music-supporting communities, and cause her name to be mentioned with the highest honors for a practical and earnest appropriation and patronage of art."

Your readers will have perceived, by recent announcements, that this long-desired project has at last taken a tangible form, and that the preliminary measures have already been commenced, in the appointment of a most influential and excellent committee. The same papers which make this announcement, however, couple with it the somewhat absurd statement that the intention is to build a theatre which will seat five thousand persons. This must certainly be unauthorized by any of those gentlemen who are intelligently interested in the matter, because they must be supposed to have looked somewhat into the subject, and of course to know that there is no such building as this existing as a regularly appointed theatre in the world. No theatre in London, Paris, St. Petersburg, Madrid, or Naples, begins to hold any such number, and it is well to take this early opportunity for setting the public mind right on such a point, to prevent exaggerated expectations, and subsequent disappointment. — Drury Lane Theatre, the largest in London, holds 3060 persons; — Covent Garden 2800, — and the theatres on the Continent, although many of them are somewhat larger in area, still, from the predominance of private boxes and the greater convenience of sitting room allowed, do not accommodate, in any instance that I am now aware of, more than the above-mentioned number. How unwise and unnecessary then would it be to attempt to do more than this, or to suppose that Boston could furnish audiences for which London has not thought it expedient to provide accommodation.

Many, even of these sittings, however, are, it should be stated, exceedingly uncomfortable. — Covent Garden with its 2,800 and Drury Lane with its 3,060 seats, exclusive of that "No room for standing, mis-called 'standing room.'" excite very invidious comparisons among the foreigners in London, and, according to Mr. Gwilt, cause a good deal of nightly torment to the English play-goers.

The arrangement of seats, and the extent to which the general capacity of the house should be allowed to infringe upon personal accommodation, is at once the most momentous and the most delicate question which the promoters of the present project will have to decide.

Let us suppose that the shape, which is thought least prejudicial to the effect of music by the majority of the sound-doctors, has been decided upon, and whether it be the semi-circle, the horse-shoe, the lyre, or the oblong parallelogram is all one for the purposes of the present argument. Two great considerations have yet to present themselves, which are strongly antagonistic in character, — two repugnant requisitions in fact, between which the projectors of an opera house are always compelled to choose. Like Desdemona, they "do here perceive a divided duty" between comfort and profit. They are to decide if the seats in the best portions of the house, whether stalls, chairs, couches, box seats or slips, shall be so packed, as to crowd a large number of persons into the given area, and thus make a house which will be remunerative to the manager at a moderate price of admission, — or, on the other hand, if they shall be arranged with some attention to the comfort of the occupants, thus reducing the paying capacity, and, of necessity, raising the price of admission to a point which the public will very reluctantly pay. On the one hand uncomfortable, pillory-like seats, — on the other unremunerative audiences and bankrupt management, — these are the Scylla and Charybdis between which they are doomed to steer. Happy indeed the stockholders who accomplish a successful passage. Of the first difficulty Bostonians in general know quite enough by sad and often grumbled at experience. Does not an hour in the parquet or boxes of the Boston Theatre or the saloon of the Museum, make one, with aching back and compressed knees, sigh for an arm-chair at almost any price, and dispose even the most money-loving citizen to purchase relief to the spine and the tortured patella, even at a hundred per cent. advance! Bolt upright on a shelf a foot wide, with his feet drawn under it and a narrow strip cutting across the "small of his back" to keep him in position, it is totally impossible for him to enjoy anything at all, — Zerlina's warbling and Don Sylva's thunder are all in vain for him.

Such are the accommodations to which we have hitherto been accustomed. On the other hand, the La Scala at Milan, the Grand Opera at Paris, the famous theatre at Bordeaux, and perhaps it is not too much to say above all, the Astor Place Opera House in New York, present us with the other form of difficulty. The enormous area of the first named house, and the metropolitan character of the second enable the receipts to keep some pace with the expenditure, but it is a well known fact, and one of which the New York manager will readily satisfy the most incredulous, that large as is the Astor Place Opera House, Salvi, Marini, Bettini, and Bosio cannot be engaged there without serious loss to the management, even with a full house on every representation. Before the curtain, it is perhaps the most comfortable and even luxurious house in the world in the general character of its accommodations, though behind the curtain it is very small, ill-arranged and inconvenient. Between these two drawbacks, since we must class convenience as one of them, the limited capacity of the house has always prevented its being carried on to any pecuniary advantage.

Here then is a nice question, and one, the argument of which could be easily made to fill columns of your valuable space, were it allowable to do so. Let us see, in the end, how it will be successfully solved. That it will, I have too high an opinion of cotemporary sagacity and application to doubt for an instant. Of course there will be a competition among the Architects, as it would be a gross piece of favoritism to give so large and important a public commission to any one, leaving all the others entirely unconsulted. Allow me to suggest, as the only safe and sure means of arriving at a fair result and of securing an informed and responsible tribunal of decision, that the building committee should secure the services of three eminent architects, who do not themselves compete, to advise them in their selection from the plans presented. This is the English practice, where such things have long been thoroughly understood, and there is no wonder that this is the only condition upon which their best talent can be induced to enter into public competition, since the real artist has often less to hope from an uninformed (I use this term professionally of course) or irresponsible tribunal, than the mere showy and vulgar pretender.

BOSTON MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY. The public rehearsals for 1851-2 came to a close last week. The summer vacation will give the Society a breathing space, in which to recover from the confusion and discomfiture necessarily occasioned by the burning of their old head quarters in the Tremont Temple. The loss of their musical library, seeing that it was insured, will doubtless be more than made good with their present superior facilities and judgment for selection. On Monday the Annual Meeting took place, when the following officers were elected for the ensuing year:

For President, GEORGE J. WEBB; Vice President, THOMAS COMER; Secretary, JOSEPH N. PIERCE; Treasurer, S. S. PEARCE; Librarian, ISAAC MOORHOUSE; Auditor, WILLIAM BENNETT; Associates, W. VANSTANE and VINCENT DORN; Trustees, JONAS CHICKERING, GEORGE S. BIGELOW, J. P. BRADLEE, S. E. GUILD, JOHN BIGELOW; Consulting Physician, CHARLES G. PUTNAM, M. D.

MENDELSSOHN'S "ELLJAIL." Many music-lovers will be gratified to learn that one of our enterprising music publishers contemplates issuing an elegant and cheap edition of this particularly favorite Oratorio. The great cost of the London edition, sumptuous as it is, has hitherto placed it beyond the reach of most of us.

MADAME GOLDSCHMIDT and her husband, we see it stated, have been prevailed upon by many of the citizens of Northampton to promise a private concert in that beautiful village, before they leave it. The proceeds will go to charitable purposes.

It is now confidently stated that the large-hearted Songstress has remitted to Sweden the last instalment of the $150,000, which she dedicated to the foundation of Free Schools in her native country.

The NEWTON MUSICAL ASSOCIATION will give a concert, during the next or following week, in compliment to their conductor, SAMUEL JENKINSON, JR., Esq., to whose arduous "labors of love" in arranging, copying, composing and carrying through rehearsals, the Society owes so much of its success.

In Watertown a musical society has been formed, under the auspices of Mr. ASA R. TROWBRIDGE as conductor. It takes the name of "THE WATERTOWN CHORAL UNION."

In Baltimore, OLE BULL, assisted by JAEEL and the GERMANIANS, has given two brilliant concerts. The papers speak of a new piece, for violin and piano, the joint production of Ole Bull and Jaell.

California.

MADAME BISCACCIANTI. Great is the success, apparently, of our esteemed cantatrice in the land of gold. There is something quite refreshing, like a return to the days of our own musical youth, in reading full-fledged musical criticisms in the newspapers of that far off new world. If only for the curiosity of the thing, therefore, our readers will perhaps warrant our copying the greater part of one notice sent us in a San Francisco paper. It shows that a concert can be got up on a pretty good scale there already, and be well appreciated. The prices of tickets, we are told, ranged from two to five dollars.

SIGNORA BISCACCIANTI'S SECOND CONCERT.—The American was filled last night with a highly intelligent and appreciative audience, among whom shone conspicuous a large number of fair ladies, to listen to the performances of Signora Biscaccianti, on her second appearance in California. The opening piece was an overture, "L'Italiano in Algieri," performed by the whole orchestra, under the direction of that accomplished musician, Mr. Loder. They exhibited the evidences of his careful training since the last concert, and proved that there is material sufficient to constitute, when more accustomed to each other, an orchestra of rare excellence. . . . The fourth piece was the opening song in Bellini's "La Sonnambula," "Come per me sereno," by Signora Biscaccianti. On her entrance, led by Mr. Loder, she was received with the enthusiastic plaudits of the audience. Her execution of this gem was in the highest degree finished, and called down a vociferous encore. In response to the call she again made her appearance, but contented herself with acknowledging her kind reception with most arch and bewitching grace. . . . The Signora again made her appearance, and this time in the English song, "I'm Queen of a Fairy Band." It took all hearts by storm, and in truth it is not to be wondered at, for never had a California audience listened to such exquisite melody, such bird-like song as fell from the lips of the fair cantatrice. Of course it was encored to the echo. Miss Coad, though evidently shrinking with timidity at following so celebrated a songstress as the Signora, was reassured by the kindly plaudits of her friends—and all appeared to be her friends—and sang the favorite ballad, the "Bells upon the Wind," with much sweetness and expression. The next piece was that most touching of Scotch ballads—and none can express so much feeling as they—"John Anderson my Jo," by Signora Biscaccianti. We can hardly give utterance to the sensations this produced. The opening, joyous and confident, the finale, melting with tenderness, exhibited in perfection the Signora's great powers of expression. The prolonged gush of melody that prefaced each stanza was one of the most splendidly executed pieces of vocalization we have ever listened to. Loud, rich and full at first, it died away like the vibrations of a bell, and with a little break in the cadence, until it seemed as if the very silence that for an instant followed, could be heard. Though out of place, the applause that followed each repetition of this was irresistible. The two last lines were rendered in a low and touching strain, that went to every heart. In response to the most vociferous encores, she appeared, and seating herself at the piano, her beaming countenance turned towards the audience, sang with a world of expression, the well known ballad of Moore—"Believe me if all these endearing young charms." Amid the most enthusiastic applause, and a shower of bouquets, she retired. Part the third opened with an overture by the orchestra, after which Madame Foubert sang a pretty Spanish song, "La Manola," with great effect. She was called out to repeat it. "Porgi Amor," from Mozart's Opera of "Don Giovanni," showed the Signora possessed of new and most versatile powers. The Romanza "Una furtiva lagrima," from "L'Elisire d'Amore," by Signor Moretto, adorned, by his fine masculine voice, a pleasing contrast with the rich melody that had preceded. But how shall we describe the grand finale, "Ah non giunge," repeated by Signora Biscaccianti by universal request? She was evidently aware of the high expectations that had been raised, and seemed to have reserved her full powers to give effect to this exquisite gem. Her voice now raised in a burst of song—now sinking to the lowest and softest notes, sounded at times like the rushing breeze, and again like the gentle zephyr sweeping across the strings of the Æolian harp. It was the very perfection of music, and seemed to surround one with an atmosphere of melody. The audience were transported with enthusiasm, and the house resounded with the most rapturous applause. Again she repeated the concluding and most striking portion, and then, followed by the same demonstrations of delight, she retired. She had achieved and sustained a triumph. It is impossible in this already extended notice to enter into an analysis of the Signora's vocalization, and point out the many excellences of her performance. The citizens of California have never listened to anything approaching her singing, and none, who enjoy and appreciate genuine music, will fail to hear her.

England.

Our last summary brought us through the opening performance of the two Operas, and the two Philharmonic Societies. We now resume.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. Rossini's Guillaume Tell was brought out, twice at least, in grand style. Herr ANDER, called the first tenor in Germany, took the part of Arnold, in a manner which has been pronounced the best since Duprez was in his prime. We quote from the London Mus. World:

Herr Ander has a fine voice—a pure, legitimate tenor, with good notes de poitrine, and a fine command of them. His method of singing is admirable. He declaims well, phrases well, and executes with facility. Like all German singers, he is deficient in agility; but, unlike many of his compatriots, he has a good portamento, and his style is at once noble and devoid of exaggeration. His performance, on Thursday, of the music of Arnold, decidedly was the best we have heard since Duprez was in his prime. . . . In the duet with Mathilde, Herr Ander exhibited both passion and good taste, and the fine quality of his middle notes could not fail to strike the connoisseur. The defects of the new tenor are few, and easily amended. He, at times, forces his voice in the higher notes, and thereby impairs his intonation; while occasionally he gives way too much to impulse, and perils not merely the correctness of his execution, but the purity of his tone, which, almost throughout the register of his voice is remarkable. As an actor Herr Ander is natural, manly, and prepossessing; but to judge him fully in this particular, he must be seen in a part of greater dramatic importance than Arnold. Since the first appearance of Signor Tamberlik, the theatre (already rich in tenors) has not made so valuable an acquisition as Herr Ander.

The Guillaume Tell of Signor Ronconi is much superior to that of his predecessor, Signor Tamburini, although the peculiarity of his means forces him to alter, and therein not to improve a great number of passages in the recitatives, airs, and duets. In spite of this drawback (which was materially felt in the magnificent duet with Arnold, "Dove vai") his impersonation of the Swiss patriot was very masterly, and he entered thoroughly into the spirit of Rossini's music. In the great finale of the second act, when the deputies from the various cantons meet to organize the plot against the Austrians, his acting was very striking, and he completely filled the stage with his presence. Perhaps Signor Ronconi's most impressive scene was that in which, at the command of the tyrant Gessler, Tell shoots the apple from the head of his son. A more pathetic piece of singing than the air (one of the most exquisite morceaux in the opera) in which he previously addresses Jenny, bidding him be firm and invoke the aid of Heaven, has rarely been heard, and rarely has an audience been more completely moved. The return of Signor Marini, who will be remembered during the two first seasons of the Royal Italian Opera, is a boon to the subscribers, who have now (with Herr Formes) two first-rate bassi profondi instead of one. The small part of Walter is only important in a musical point of view, and the fact of its being confided to such a singer as Signor Marini tells in favor of the liberal policy which the management appears bent upon pursuing. Signor Tagliafico, another old and deserved favorite, made his re-entrée in the character of Gessler, to which his clever singing and intelligent acting imparted due importance. Of Madame Castellau's Mathilde it is only necessary to say that it was as good as ever, and that she sang the beautiful aria, "Selva opaca," and the duet with Arnold, with great feeling and purity. . . .

The orchestra and chorus were perfect. The overture was encored with acclamations, and a similar compliment was paid to the magnificent chorus, "Giuriam, giuriamo," at the end of the finale to the second act, in which the genius of Rossini has reached its highest flight. The execution of the whole of this picturesque and masterly scene was admirable. The chorons of the inhabitants of Uri, in A minor, "Guglielmo," which usually passes without a hand, was given with such crispness, and such a well managed pianissimo, that this was also redemanded; and at the fall of the curtain Mr. Costa was compelled to come forward by unanimous desire. The opera was placed upon the stage in the most liberal manner as regards scenery, costumes, &c., and the performance in general was one of the most remarkable in the annals of the Royal Italian Opera.

Donizetti's Les Martyrs was to be given for the first time in England on the 13th ult. The cast included Tamberlik, Ronconi, Formes and Mme. Julienne; the last named lady bringing a high reputation, as a dramatic soprano, from Brussels.

Mlle. JOANNA WAGNER, whom we have seen even compared to GRIST, is announced as being exclusively engaged for the Royal Italian Opera.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. (Lumley's.) On the 13th Rossini's Italiana in Algieri was to be revived for "the dashing and energetic Mlle. Angri." (By the way, Garcia, we believe, thinks her the only contralto besides Alboni, and for this reason wishes his new pupil, our own Adelaide Phillips, whose voice he finds to be a genuine first class contralto, to enter this interesting field.) Belletti, too, and Ferranti, were to take part.

"Vive la CRUVELLI" had become the word. This lady, crowned with Parisian laurels, was announced at her Majesty's to sing in Norma, on the 17th.

In spite of what is said above, Lumley also announces Mlle. WAGNER to make her debut in Romeo et Julietta.

The programme of the second concert of the (old) PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY included, besides the Pastoral Symphony, three overtures: viz., Mendelssohn's Meeres-Stille und glücklicher Fahrt, Cherubini's to Les Deux Journées, and Weber's "Ruler of the Spirits." Piatti and Bottesini played a Duo concertante for 'cello and contrabasso. The rest was vocal. Simms Reeves sang an Aria by Beethoven, from Fidelio: Della vita; and with Ronconi a duet by Rossini: I Marinari. Ronconi sang an old Aria, by Stradella; Castellau, a scena by Mendelssohn: "Infelice"; and the two a duet by Mozart. This programme is said to have been entirely selected by her Majesty and Prince Albert.

JETTY TREFFZ had arrived in London; also the great German basso, STAUDIGL. ERNST and VIEUXTEMPS were both expected.

The SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY repeated the "Messiah," according to the annual custom, in Passion week. The singers were Madame Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Mr. Simms Reeves and Herr Formes.

CHAMBER MUSIC. Quintet Soirées (Mr. Ella's); Quartet Soirées (Herr Jansa's); Trio Soirées (Mr. Harris's, at Manchester); and classical piano forte soirées (Mr. Bille's, the Russian, and Mlle. Speyer's), still furnish forth the choicest programmes.

DUBLIN. The Musical Festival in commemoration of Moore passed off triumphantly.

The performances were opened with a monody and chorus, after the manner of the Grecian Drama, delivered by Mr. David C. Bell, professor of elocution, in a style which gave assurance of his accomplishments in the profession of which he is a distinguished master: then followed selections from the "Odes of Anacreon," the "Melodies of all Nations," "Lalla Rookh," the "Sacred and the Irish Melodies,"—the second part having been opened with "Evenings in Greece," recited by Mr. Bell.

FREDERIC CHOPIN.

BY FRANZ LISZT.

IV.

We have now spoken about CHOPIN, the composer; about his works full of immortal thoughts and feelings, in which his genius, now conqueror and now conquered, wrestles with sorrow, with this fearful element of earthly life, which it is one of the problems of Art to reconcile with Heaven;—his works, into which, like tears into a vial, all the enchantments of his heart, all the outbursts of his musing and aspiring, of his inward indignation have discharged themselves;—his works, in which he has overleaped the limits of our dim and obscure perception and penetrated into the world of Dryads, Oreads and Oceanides. It would still remain for us to speak of his talent for delivery, of CHOPIN as a master of his instrument, had we the melancholy mood for that, and could we awaken feelings and emotions, that are intertwined with our inmost personal remembrances, out of the grave and work into their winding shrouds the colors that belong to them. For this power we trust not ourselves; and vainly would it strive for any tangible result. Who could undertake to describe to those, who have not heard him, the charm of an indescribable poesy, a charm as fine and permeating, as that light exotic aroma of the Volkameria or Calla Aethiopica, which pervades only places, in which few men dwell, and is shyly dissipated, where the dense crowd thickens the air, so that it is only impregnated by the sharp smell of full-blown tuberoses or of brightly blazing pitch-pine torches.

CHOPIN knew that his playing did not take effect upon the multitude, and that he could not pack the masses. For these are like a leaden sea; although to be bent and hammered by every fire, yet its sluggish waves are hard to stir up; they require the powerful arm of an athletic workman to run them into a mould and cause them, under the image which he impresses upon them, to become at once thought and feeling. CHOPIN knew that he was fully understood only in those alas! too far from numerous circles, in which all minds were fitted and prepared to follow him, and to transport themselves with him into those halls, whose entrance is guarded by a door of ivory, with diamond pillars, which support a cupola, flashing with the play of the prismatic colors,—halls, where all is bewildering enchantment, frolicsome surprise, where dreams prove real, and where CHOPIN fled and loved so dearly to remain. Indeed he said himself once to a friend, an artist, who has been much heard since then: "I am not made to give concerts; the public makes me low-spirited, I feel myself as it were stifled by its breath, embarrassed by its curious gaze, and dumb before all those strange faces. But you, you are intended for it; for, if you cannot win the public over to yourself, you have the stuff to strike it dead."

As he was fully conscious of what the nature of his talent demanded, he seldom played in public, and with the exception of some concerts at his first appearance in the year 1831, when he let himself be heard in Vienna and Munich, he confined his concert-giving entirely to Paris. Moreover the state of his health forbade his travelling; for about fifteen years this was so shattered, that many times he lay whole months long as it were dying. In the single excursion, which he made into the South of France in the hope of healing influence from the milder air, his condition was so miserable, that the landlords several times demanded pay for the full value of the bed he occupied, so that they might burn it, because they were afraid of its contagion.

And yet—we must be pardoned the remark—we believe, that public concerts injured his physical strength less than his artistic sensibility. His voluntary renunciation of noisy applause concealed, as it seems to us, a wounded feeling within him. He had a very distinct consciousness of his high stand-point; but possibly the outward recognition did not offer such a corresponding echo as to give him the calm certainty, that this stand-point was entirely appreciated. The applause of the multitude failed him, and he undoubtedly asked himself, how far the select saloon society could by its enthusiasm supply the place of the greater public. But few understood him. And did they understand him fully? An uneasiness, which was perhaps a riddle to himself, at least in reference to its real source, was undermining him in secret. Praise itself almost made him irritable. Inasmuch as the whole applause, to which he was so perfectly entitled, did not rain down upon him out of full clouds, the isolated expressions of praise annoyed him. In the midst of the courteous forms of speech, with which he often shook them off like burthensome dust from himself, one could perceive, with little knowledge of human nature, that in his own opinion he fancied himself applauded not only slightly but in the wrong way, and that he then preferred remaining in his solitude alone with his own feelings.

But he was far too fine a connoisseur in the department of irony, he had too shrewd a perception of the ludicrous in others, not to avoid naked sarcasm. He would not wear the mask of a genius misunderstood. Under a seeming complacency, full of amiability and graciousness, he so utterly concealed the wounds of his quite justifiable pride, that one scarcely dreamed of their existence. One need not be much in the wrong, were he to ascribe the ever growing infrequency of his concerts more to his inclination to avoid occasions, which did not yield him all the tribute, which he could require, than to his feebleness, which had been put to equally hard proofs in the lessons, which he gave all his life long, and in his playing hour by hour in his chamber.

It is to be lamented, that the indubitable advantages, accruing to the artist from the fact that he devotes himself only to a select public, are so much diminished by the niggardly alms-giving sympathies of such circles. The cold polish, which covers the forms of their applause, like the fruits upon their supper tables, and the imperturbable tranquility which broods over the expression of their warmest enthusiasm,—these cannot further or inspire the artist. If the poet is carried away by the inspiration, which seizes him in his solitude, he can only find it again in the most attentive, most intense and living sympathy of his audience: he cannot drink it from the cold looks of an Areopagus, assembled to judge him. He must feel assured, that he moves his hearers, that he thrills them, that his feeling sets like chords to vibrating in their hearts, that he bears them along with him on his flight into the infinite; just as the leader of yon winged troops, when he gives the sign for departure, has them all follow him on the route to fairer shores!

But had it been otherwise; had CHOPIN actually reaped all the homage and the overflowing admiration, which he deserved; had he been heard, like so many others, by all nations and under all skies; had he solemnized those splendid triumphs, which create a capitol wherever a whole people greets with acclamation merit, honor, or genius; had he been known and recognized by thousands, as he was by hundreds only:—still we would not linger in this part of his career to count up its successes.

What are nosegays for those, whose brows demand immortal laurels? Ephemeral sympathies, passing admiration, are scarce worth mentioning upon a tomb, which calls for monuments of a true and enduring glory. CHOPIN's creations are destined to carry into distant lands and times the joy, the consolation, the beneficent spiritual excitement, which works of Art awaken in the suffering, thirsting, languishing, or in the persevering and believing souls, to whom they are consecrated. Thus they knit an endless bond between all noble natures, on whatever zone of the earth, in whatever section of time they may have lived; unrecognized by their contemporaries, when these have been silent about them, or, if they have spoken about them, frequently misunderstood.

[Written in June, 1851, for Sartain's Magazine.]

We have just been recalling, in happy reverie, the impression made on us by the singing of JENNY LIND; or rather, endeavoring to shape into words the impression that abides with us, after a frequent hearing of nearly all her concert pieces during her tour of the Eastern cities, and after time enough has passed to test the durability of first impressions. At this distance, we can think the matter over calmly, and with every allowance for any enthusiasm which circumstances and the magnetism of such great popular occasions, as the first Castle Garden concerts, may have produced, over and above what was due to the intrinsic music of the woman.

Calmly, we said. But always, from the first, we heard her calmly. We have not needed the effect of distance to tone our admiration down to that. Thus, then, we may as well begin: let that confession stand as one important element in the artistic fact to be described. Our delight in the Swede's singing was, from the first, a calm delight. It was not so exciting, as it was satisfying. Not that her voice and art were passionless, or coldly intellectual, or simply sensuous and natural in the sense of childlike. We mean no negative sort of calmness, such as was alleged in a disappointed tone (if not in a triumphant tone of preconceived disparagement) as their experience, by certain of her hearers, who, either from their unreasonable expectations, or their addiction to the cheaper stimulus of Italian Opera, or some other cause, seem to have been non-conductors and non-receivers to the fine, strong LIND electricity.

For instance; it is altogether a calm and passionless pleasure which we feel in the mere physical fact of a remarkably rich, clear, musical voice, of great compass; hers is certainly a splendid specimen of that branch of natural history; and we have even met one or two individuals so rash as to declare that the whole secret of her vocal fame. If we heard her calmly, we nevertheless heard more than a voice.

There is a similar, but heightened pleasure, too, where human ingenuity (we speak not yet of Art) perfects, or curiously and happily applies, the gift of nature; as when we listen to a musical box; though it is doubtful, if the pleasure be enhanced by finding the said musical box encased in the throat of a laboriously soffeggiato prima donna;—a doubt predicated on the principle of rendering unto nature the things that are nature's, or unto the mechanic the things that are mechanical, but unto the woman and the artist only the things that are woman's, by virtue of a soul and understanding in them. For some time, not a few were willing to confess only to this sort of calm entertainment in the LIND, magnanimously conceding to her any amount of musical-box notoriety, and thinking to compensate for this detracting of the artist, by an equally cold abundance of praise of the woman personally, aside from her art. But we well know that it lies not in any conceivable, or even infinite perfectibility of mere vocal execution, to affect us at all like the artist, whose soul it was we heard making music through her voice. Did she make a flute of herself in that clever trio from the "Camp of Silesia"? There was, indeed, the triumph of execution: but was it only that? was there no poetry in it? no play of the fancy? nothing of that same trace of genius which we are willing to own in some of the humbler efforts of genre painting? And, after all, the flute-trills, the warbles, were but two smallest passing phases of her; mere flitting sun-specks through the leafy shadows; trifles in themselves, and yet, in essence, of the universal daylight that fills the world with light and beauty.

From a musical box to a lark, a thrush, a nightingale, is one step higher, we suppose, at least in the line in which our present thought is moving. That bobolink we heard this morning in the meadow was higher, by whole circles of song, than all of them. That gushing melody of nature; that free, wild, bird-like quality of song, blithe and unstinted; song that seemed to sing itself out of a heart that only sparkled with the sunshine that lights up the fresh morning face of the whole outward world, to tunes unstudied, exquisite, for ever varied:—that every one enjoyed in her. The "Bird Song" and the "Herdsman's Echoes" made you fresh and young again: they brought you back to childhood and to nature; those single notes brought whole related sceneries and memories with them; the mountains came and stood about you, and the chest seemed almost to expand with purer and more bracing air, even in the crowded concert-room. Well, this too, was a calm enjoyment; here was a genuine, a rich emotion; here was the transporting magic of Art recalling Nature, and the fresh sensations of a child yet at one with Nature; but, like the wholesome influence of Nature itself, there was repose, serenity, and balance in the emotions awakened.

"True," said the disappointed; "that was all very pretty, very wonderful; but it was something more that we expected from the Queen of Song. We went to have our souls shaken like reeds bowed before the wind, by the fiery, lyric passion of a Norma or a Borgia, as we have heard of Grisi, Pasta, and the like. We looked for more exciting stuff, for the cold thrill of tragic crises, or to be melted into tears and sweet delirium by a voice that should seem the very soul of the Bellini melody, and come over us like a south wind to reveal the latent Italy within us. But when we came to hear her Casta Diva, and her various cavatinas and romanzas from our favorite operas, by which the world tests all great singers, we owned, to be sure, the artistic finish, the triumphant execution, the faultless taste, so far as the outward form and unity and beauty of each piece were concerned; but still we found it cold,—we did not feel the passion seize upon us. She was cold, and of course we could not be much on fire." And so on to the end of the chapter.

We never sympathized with this talk, although we heard her calmly. Her quiet manner in Italian song was far more to our taste, than the impassioned seeming, the hyper-tragic intensity, the extravagant gesticulation, the furore-calculating outbursts upon common-place cadenzas, of the full-blooded prima donnas, who take fire as readily without as with occasion, and who seek to carry an audience by storm every five minutes. JENNY LIND never forgot the propriety of the concert-room, and of a miscellaneous programme. She gave us, at least, elegant, discriminating, chaste, artistic readings of the different styles of music, naturally expected of a singer who must be at home in whatever there is current. If we had found her altogether absorbed, as if seeking and finding her whole sphere in the Italian Opera songs of the day, and as if there could be no greater glory than to be queen among the Italian prima donnas on their own ground, we should at once have felt her limit and have missed the LIND, this new and greater fact. To our mind, she did full justice to the Italian music; only she did not treat it as the all in all of music. In her singing of it, though it was appreciative, sympathetic, hearty, there was the implied power and passion for a much deeper and greater kind of music. And this it was that spake so powerfully to us that first night in Castle garden, in the very first strain of the Casta Diva, that we feared we had been dreaming when we heard the next morning the criticisms and complaints of failure, from those who only marked the flutter of a half-abashed appearance before a New World audience, or who, preoccupied with some ideal or conventional notion of the true style of Casta Diva, saw only the deviation from that, ignoring almost the divine fact before them. We rather were delighted with the palpable assurance, which, with her first tones, shot to our heart with the warmth of sunbeams, that it was in her to do all that, and more; and in the long run, how has it turned out with regard to that very song? The supremacy of her model of the Casta Diva has been acknowledged in New York, after disarming, at the first attack, the firm-set Italian prejudices of the most fastidious of audiences at Havana and at New Orleans. Truly, it must have been a taste long pampered with coarse and questionable spices, which could not feel the pure and genuine sweetness and pathos of her Qui la voce. We never felt the sentiment of Bellini's melody so exquisitely, and so unalloyed with sickening sweet. In mere bravura passages, she, indeed, sang coldly; for much of this, although Italian, is cold music: mechanical and for display, like fire-works; and it is only saying that she could not affect passion. She could treat all these things, after their several kinds, each characteristically, genially, entering into its spirit, with a sort of universal sunshine and Protean facility of Art, in them all and above them all, whether the dazzling bravura, or the impassioned, tragic scena, or the delicate and subtle grace and sprightliness of the Opera Comique. When were Rossini's sparkling fancies heard in such perfection?—Rossini, the least pathetic, yet the most creative and ideal, of the modern Italian composers,—the man of genius of them all!

The truth is, JENNY LIND is a great singer, and to be fairly judged, must be heard in many varieties of music, but especially in great music; and it is a melancholy fact that, although Italy once had her Palestrina, and her severe, sublime, church music, the modern Italian music is not great.—An artist, in the high and large sense, like JENNY LIND, only illustrates with her many-sided faculty these lighter things of which we have been speaking, these various specimens of song, culled from all quarters and all fashions of the day. To sing herself out, to concentrate all her energy and all her fervor on the given music of the hour, she must have great music; music inspired by a great sentiment; music, which, whether secular or sacred in its name, naturally rises to the religious; music that leaves you stronger, calmer in your soul, and not the victim of a weak and morbid moodiness and pathos; music not empty of passion, but so full of passion, of the central passion of the soul, in which all souls are one, and which only the Eternal can satisfy, that its effect is more like repose than like excitement. You feel for once your normal state in it, sound and strong, and at home, and at peace with all; for, addressing the central spring of feeling, it quickens into harmonious life all the emotions of the soul. The singer who truly and worthily renders such music, even with her utmost fervor, with her whole soul, will seem calm and lofty, and you will listen calmly, while it may yet be one of the intensest moments of your existence.

Now, this was the music in which we were destined fully to know JENNY LIND. This was the real power and mission of the singer; this the gift she gave so calmly, to be laid up in the calm depths of the receiver's soul. We felt it in reserve for us through all the little things she sang, (the Swedish songs, the flute songs, the Donizetti airs, &c.) complete and individual as each was in itself; we felt it full and direct upon us, as if admitted to the inmost sanctuary, when she came to the great music, the sublime Handelian song of faith: "I know that my Redeemer liveth," to the spiritual sweetness of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," the "Mighty Pens" of Haydn, &c.; and, from these heights, we came back to enjoy still more the happy, sunny distribution of her Art over all kinds of wild or hot-house (operative) flowers of song, to please all kinds of tastes and fancies and degrees of culture. It was this sound central energy that seemed to explain the whole. A Swedenborgian said of her, in the dialect of his school: "She has the strongest sphere of any person I have met." If there is any one phase or attitude of song in which she still stands in our memory as most characteristically herself, the impersonation of her own art, it is in that great song from "The Creation," where her soul did really seem to soar "on mighty pens," eagle-like, with unflinching, and yet reverent eyes, looking into the very sun. We think of the copious sunshine of her singing, so large and liberal and wholesome is it, and so quickening. It is this large, central, sunward reference and convergence, as it were, of all her special efforts, this great central passion gently glowing in the background, through the lightest and most playful, the most artificial and the wildest of her songs, that makes JENNY LIND the most popular singer in the world. Independently of all known of her outside of the concert-room, the whole impression of her performance, however it may be of the songs taken singly, is always accompanied with enthusiasm. A sympathetic thrill of genuine, large humanity, is sure to reach every hearer, relating all these multifarious melodies to him, and proving to him the reality of that world, that element of Art, of which he knows so little, but must know more, as he would carry with him a type of the solution of all present discords, and an emblem of the true, divine state of the soul.

A truce now to the talk about Northern and Southern singers. JENNY LIND is not a mere national phase of vocal art. Genius is not national, in so far as it is genius, but universal. If she is greatest in the rendering of German music, it is because the German now-a-days is intrinsically the greatest music. You may talk of Italian melody and German harmony; of Italian pathos and expression and of German science, fugue and counterpoint; of Italian voices and of German orchestras. But real, original, creative genius, in these days, has appeared mainly, if not only, in the German music. There is a deeper feeling and a sweeter melody in the Freyshutz, in the songs of Mendelssohn and Schubert; and, certainly, if we go back so far, in every slightest air of Mozart, which will outlive scores and schools of modern Italian operas. Best in these JENNY LIND cannot but be, if she is great and universal; while, with a catholic comprehensiveness of taste, her voice and art illustrate all varieties and nationalities of song. The key-note of her world-enchanting, ever-varied strain, however, whether it modulate to grave or gay, to solemn or fantastic, is still high and central, and to be interpreted only by these great words, Art, Humanity, God, Universal Harmony. To be an artist, above the criticism of the cultivated few, and, at the same time, holding spell-bound all the millions, as no artist ever did before, is a fact admitting of no lower explanation. J. S. D.

The Knickerbocker for May, in publishing the following lines, says of them, that they were written for Mr. Dempster, who has set them to music:

LINES.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

The May-sun sheds an amber light
On new leaved woods and lawns between:
But she who, with a smile more bright,
Welcomed and watched the springing green,
Is in the grave,
Low in her grave.

The fair white blossoms of the wood
In groups beside the pathway stand;
But one, the gentle and the good,
Who cropped them with a fairer hand,
Is in her grave,
Low in her grave.

Upon the woodland's morning airs
The small birds' mingled notes are flung;
But she whose voice, more sweet than theirs,
Once bade me listen while they sung,
Is in the grave,
Low in her grave.

That music of the early year
Brings tears of anguish to my eyes;
My heart aches when the flowers appear,
For then I think of her who lies Within her grave,
Low in her grave.

Mademoiselle Johanna Wagner.

This celebrated vocalist is the niece of Richard Wagner, the Chapel-master of Dresden, whom Liszt, in a recent pamphlet, pronounces to be the greatest composer of the age. The early days of Johanna Wagner were passed at Wurzburg in Bavaria, her parents being engaged at the theatre. As a child she was selected to represent the good spirit in the fairy spectacles, her declamatory powers being remarkable. At fifteen years of age she made a successful début in Abigail, in the comic piece, "Le Verre d'Eau," at the theatre of Ballenstadt. She subsequently appeared as Preciosa and Esmeralda, and made a great sensation in the part of Cordelia, in "King Lear." At this epoch of her career it was remarked that her style was distinguished as much for juvenile grace as tragic energy. Her original destiny was fixed for the drama; but as her parents, who had a reputation as teachers of singing, perceived that she had a good voice, she was taught the character of the Page in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots." Her organ, however, daily increasing in compass and power, she was allotted the part of Caterina, in Halévy's "Reine de Chypre," and the striking success she met with decided Mlle. Wagner to quit definitively the legitimate drama for opera. Her uncle strongly urged her to visit Dresden; but before she went to that city she visited Paris with her father, and there took lessons for six months of Manuel Garcia, the brother of Viardot and Malibran, and the master of Jenny Lind. On the arrival of Mlle. Wagner at Dresden, she was engaged for five years at the theatre; and from this time she took the line followed by Madame Schröder Devrient, although without any servile imitation of the style of that eminent artiste. In Agatha, in Weber's "Der Freyschutz," and in Beethoven's "Fidelio," she acquired great fame. Her next engagement, owing to political events having affected the Dresden theatre, was at Hamburg; and she was the first singer in Germany who undertook the part of Fidès in Meyerbeer's "Prophète." It was her delineation of the character, which spread her name throughout Germany. She afterwards sang in Vienna and Berlin with signal success, in the last-mentioned capital being the successor of Mme. Viardot in Fidès. The result was, that the Royal Intendant of the Berlin Opera House entered into an engagement with Mlle. Johanna Wagner for ten years, on terms far beyond those ever before granted to any prima donna in Germany. In her contract, leave of absence for six months during the year was reserved for the young and gifted artiste.

The répertoire of Mlle. Wagner is rich and varied; and, owing to her genius, the masterpieces of Gluck and of Spontini have been most successfully revived at Berlin. Iphigénie (en Tauride) and Clytemnestre (en Aulide,) and the Grand Priestess in the "Vestale," have been highly popular. Her Alice in "Robert le Diable," Valentina in the "Huguenots," and Fidès in the "Prophète," have displayed her supremacy in Meyerbeer's operas. Her Eglantine in Weber's "Euryanthe," was her farewell part at Berlin, on the 18th of last month. In the revival of Spontini's "Olympia" she was the Statira, surpassing, according to the German critics, the celebrated Milder, who was the original representative. Kellstab, the eloquent critic of Berlin, writes of her Statira, "In passion she is a Medusa, in imperious command a Juno, and in pathos a Niobe."

Mlle. Wagner does not confine her line of characters to the classic models. Her Norma, Lucrezia Borgia and Romeo, in Bellini's works, have created as great a sensation in Germany as her Fidès, Fidelio, Statira, Alice, Valentina, &c. Her Donna Anna in "Don Giovanni," and Odette in Halévy's "Charles VI.," show the versatility of her lyric capabilities.

Mlle. Wagner, while she has acquired within such a brief period her artistic fame, seems to have inspired her admirers in Germany with the highest respect for her personal qualities. When she quitted Hamburg, in the spring of last year, for her engagement at Berlin, there was a grand ceremonial at the Tonhalle: she was crowned in public, and the population accompanied her to the railroad, greeting her with prolonged acclamations.—London Illustrated News.

Correspondence.

LEIPSIC, March 12, 1852.

Dedication of the Music Hall of the "Thomas School"—M. Hauptmann—Chorus Singing.

The "Thomas School" is connected with the Thomas Church; and the choir of the latter is obtained from it. JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH was formerly Music Director here; and he has been succeeded by several distinguished men. The present incumbent is M. HAUPTMANN, who is also Professor of Harmony in the Conservatory. The place was procured for him by MENDELSSOHN, with whom it was a favorite object to gather around him men of science, and Hauptmann most deservedly ranks among these. He is now everywhere known as one of the most profound theorists living. He has also published Motets, and other pieces of Church Music, which are held in high estimation by musicians. But there is something more attractive about Hauptmann than either genius or learning; it is amiability. He seems to be filled with kindness, gentleness, and courtesy; and I have met no German, nor indeed any one, in whose presence one is made more perfectly at home, and by whom one is treated with more affability and attention than by him. Although standing at the very head of musical science, he has, as yet, published no work of importance on harmony; he says that he waits for more experience, so that when he publishes a book, it may be of some value. A good hint is this to some of us, who write, and publish works on the theory of music in the United States, without knowledge and without experience. How often we see verified the old saying (and frequently in musical productions) that "a little knowledge is a dangerous thing." Hauptmann is now, however, engaged in the preparation of a philosophical treatise, which he intends to give to the public in a few years. His health is not firm; he is a diligent student, and bodily infirmity is probably the result of severe and long continued mental labor. He is very popular, and is, perhaps, equally respected for his knowledge, and beloved for his goodness. He called yesterday, bringing tickets to a musical performance, on the occasion of the dedication of the Music Hall of the School. It is not indeed a new hall, but an old one repaired, painted, and ornamented; it is in the same house where BACH lived, and is the very room where BACH, HILLER and others labored and conducted musical performances. Hauptmann now occupies the same apartments which were formerly occupied by the great Fugist. The exercises, with the exception of a short address by one of the pupils, were exclusively musical, as follows:

- I. Prayer. "Kommt, lasset uns anbeten."— HAUPTMANN.
- II. Motette. "Der Geist hilft unserer Schwachheit."—
J. S. BACH.
- III. Four part songs:—
 1. "O Thäler weit, o Höhen."—MENDELSSOHN.
 2. "O sanfter, süßerer Hauch."—MENDELSSOHN.

[The above may be found in the "Social Glee Book," and have been sung in the Boston Musical Conventions.]

 3. "Waldeinsamkeit."—HAUPTMANN.
 4. "Ich stand auf Berges Halde."—HAUPTMANN.
- IV. Motette. "Jauchzet dem Herrn."—SCHICHT.

The singing was by the choir of the school and church, which consisted of about fifty voices; Soprano and Alto by boys. It was entirely without accompaniment. A grand Piano Forte in the room was only used to announce the pitch before each piece. This singing most difficult music without accompaniment is something wholly unknown with us in America. I know full well that there are choirs and Quartet clubs, who sing comparatively easy music in public without accompaniment, but even in this what is often the result? Bach's music is exceedingly difficult. Handel, in comparison to Bach, may be said to be easy; and yet our choirs could but few of them sing Handel and sustain themselves well without instrumental aid. But here is a chorus who stand up and sing Bach's and other most difficult motets, the most difficult vocal music perhaps ever written, by voices alone, with as much certainty as the sure aim of an experienced marksman.

I think I have never before witnessed such devotion to the work as in these singers. Here is indeed entire self-committal. Every one throws all the powers he has, physical and spiritual, into the performance of the music. Every tone is attacked with a conscious certainty of success; no matter how complicated the rhythm, it is given with an energy and truthfulness that a first rate violinist can hardly excel. The singers seem to have a perfect command of their vocal organs, and are no less certain of results than is the accomplished Pianist when he strikes the keys, or the violinist when he draws the bow. There is an entire absence of that sleepiness, drowsiness, inattention, and foolish levity too often witnessed in our choirs. No looking about, or whispering, or laughing, or silliness, but close attention is ever manifested. I wish I had words to point out that consecration to the work, that deep, heartfelt interest which these choir members seem to possess; so that it might be sought for by our American singers. But we cannot obtain it unless we use the appropriate means; education only will do it; musical training, such as we have but little idea of, must go before; and as we plant, so we shall reap in these things. This choir is drilled daily; five o'clock is the hour when they come together every day for their lesson, or rather their training and practice. For so far as I have had opportunity to observe, the teaching here consists mostly in training. But I must not enlarge. I have never before heard a vocal chorus so prompt, so energetic, and perfect in time and tune as on this occasion. The place too, was holy ground, for all the great musicians have visited that saloon; BACH lived there as his home, and HANDEL, and HAYDN, and MOZART, and BEETHOVEN have been there. A new portrait of Bach (or rather an old one put in perfect order) has been placed at the head of the hall, and opposite to it, is a fine bust of SCHICHT, who, though less known, was a very profound musician, as his works testify. On the whole, I have not attended a more interesting musical performance in Germany. L. M.

LEIPSIK, April 2, 1852.

Concert by the Pupils of the Conservatory of Music.

Last evening the saloon of the Gewandhaus was crowded to listen to the pupils of the Conservatory. Concerts are occasionally given, perhaps once a quarter, or once in six months, under the direction of the Professors, in which the pupils give specimens of their proficiency in the composition and in the performance of music, vocal and instrumental. The weather was very unfavorable; but notwithstanding the rain, the house was crowded, indeed some persons could not find admission. Tickets are not sold, but are given away by the teachers and pupils to their friends. The orchestra at such times is in part made up of the pupils, deficiencies being supplied by professors employed for the occasion; of course they have one efficient band. DAVID and DREY-SCHOCK were at the head of the violins. MOSCHELES conducted the piano forte pieces; DAVID conducted the violin concertos; REITZ conducted the songs; RICHTER conducted the chorus music, and the respective authors themselves conducted the overtures. There were two original overtures performed:

- I. Overture for Orchestra, composed by W. FREDERIC NICOLAI, of Leyden, Holland.
- II. Overture for Orchestra, composed by HEINRICH VON SAHR, of Dresden, Saxony.

Both of these overtures were highly creditable to the young men, and were well received; the last, perhaps, being the most meritorious production. The other music consisted of selections from various authors, as follows:

PIANO FORTE MUSIC.

- I. Concerto for Piano Forte with Orchestra, by BEETHOVEN (C Minor, first part,) performed by Wilhelm Gerbig, of Almelo, Holland.
- II. Trio for piano forte, violin, and violoncello, by Mendelssohn (No. 2, C Minor,) performed by three pupils, Fraulein Laura Boerngen, of Verden, Hanover; Herr F. George Haubold, of Leipsic; and Herr Gruetzmacher.
- III. Grand Sonata for piano forte, (F Minor, op. 54,) by Beethoven, performed by Fraulein Rosalie Hirschfeld, of Danzig.

VIOLIN MUSIC.

- I. Concerto for Violin with orchestra, by Molique (A Minor, No. 5, first part,) performed by Herr George Japha, of Königsberg, Prussia.

- II. Military Concerto for Violin, with orchestra, by Lipinski (first part,) performed by Herr Carl Hahn, Nuremberg.
- III. Introduction and Variations for Violin, with orchestra, by David, performed by Herr Wilhelm Langhans, Hamburg.

VOCAL MUSIC.

- I. Aria, from Stradella, sung by Fraulein Anna Masius, Leipsic.
- II. Aria, by Rossini (Barber of Seville,) sung by Fraulein Marie Kuehne, Magdeburg.
- III. Recitative and Aria, from Figaro, by Mozart, sung by Fraulein Marie Grohmann, Magdeburg.

CHOIR MUSIC.

- The 137th Psalm, for Soprano Solo, Choir and Orchestra, by E. F. Richter.

Such was the music of the school exhibition; it was in all respects highly creditable to the institution. The students are from various parts of Germany and England; and for the last few years America has also been represented. Such an institution is much needed in our country. A Conservatory of Music upon a proper basis, and under suitable regulations, would do much for the advancement of a pure style, and correct taste. It would be to music what the Normal Schools are to education generally; would raise the standard of musical education, and the qualifications of music teachers; and put forth an influence in many ways to promote the cause of secular and sacred, vocal and instrumental music in the land. Sonata Pastoral, for the Piano Forte, op. 28, by BEETHOVEN. Boston: O. Ditson.

Sonate, que voulez tu?—(Sonata, what do you want of me?): said the French critic, who was at a loss to comprehend the meaning or the charm of this classical form, in which the great composers have loved to develop their purely musical ideas. It is the form also of the orchestral symphony, and the quartet, trio, &c., for string instruments. It is "caviare to the general," who care nothing for a strain without the words, unless it be to lift the heels in march or dance. Nevertheless the Sonata is and will ever remain one of the most perfect, most inexhaustibly novel and interesting, as well as strictly logical forms of pure music. Not till one feels its beauty, and can become delightfully absorbed in the pursuit of its ever-unfolding and changing, ever-vanishing and re-appearing, intertwining and separating threads of melody; not till one can listen deeply interested in the fate of the themes first announced in the Allegro; can demand a religious expression for the pitch of enthusiasm to which it carries him, in the Andante or Adagio following; and then feel the need of frolicsome recreation in the free and graceful Scherzo, or Minuet and Trio; and finally feel curtailed of a just satisfaction, unless he may hear in addition to all, in like key and kindred theme with the beginning, the bold conclusion of the Finale:—not till one knows this experience, does he properly know the real enjoyment of music. And hence all musical artists and composers find their choicest pleasures in little social performances of something in the Sonata form, especially the string Quartet.

In the Sonata for piano forte, one who has half the executive power required for the modern variation and fantasia school, can, to say the least, have a rich and realizing taste of this kind of inspiration, all by himself. And would he taste it in its richest depth and in its purity, would he number the hours thereof with his best spiritual communions or poetic raptures, let him study these Sonatas of BEETHOVEN, who in this outline form discloses as much grandeur of thought and depth of passion, as in his greatest symphonies for a whole orchestra.

The knowledge of these things is growing among our young students of the piano; and the taste so formed, can never die out. With so excellent and cheap an edition as Mr. Ditson is now issuing of the whole of them, it becomes a duty which every student and amateur owes to himself, to possess the set, number by number, as it comes out. This "Pastoral Sonata" forms the fifteenth of the series, and breathes the deep tone-poet's feeling of the woods and fields and summer, like his greater Symphony of the same title. It is full of exquisite passages, and there is great variety of beauty in its several movements. Possess yourself well of its spirit, by practising it over and over, and you will have a new bond of intimacy with nature.

Les Willis (Spirit dances). By the Author of "Glen-mary Waltzes." pp. 9. O. Ditson.

Five delicately graceful little dance melodies, for the piano, in the forms of Mazurka-Polka, Redowa, Waltz and Polka, conceived in allusion to a French tradition, according to which the "Willis" are the spirits of maidens, who suffer punishment in another world for an excessive love of dancing. Of course the punishment is dancing still. It is one of the London Art Union engravings, if we remember rightly, which embodies the same superstition exquisitely to the eye. MENDELSSOHN should have made the music. But as he did not, we may be thankful to Mr. RICHARD WILLIS for writing his imagination of it, in these popular and easy forms. — The title page is prettily engraved, and the inside copies a description of the scene of such a dance.

The Pestalozzian School Song Book. By GEORGE W. PRATT and J. C. JOHNSON. Boston: A. N. Johnson, 36 School Street.

From a brief perusal, this seems to us a very useful and convenient little book of elementary lessons, vocal exercises, songs and hymns for Schools. The rudiments are well stated and arranged. It is properly a text book, from which the scholar can learn at first hand; the definitions being in plain language and order, and each followed by such a series of illustrations, as saves the trouble of writing on a blackboard. The Songs are harmonized in three parts, pleasant melodies to pleasant words; and the whole concluded with a small collection of plain psalm and hymn tunes. The size and type are convenient.

Two Hundred and Fifty Easy Voluntaries and Interludes, for the Organ, Melodeon, Seraphine, &c. By JOHN ZUNDEL. pp. 87. New York: Mason & Law.

Mr. ZUNDEL is one of the thorough-bred German organists, a pupil of RINK, at home among the fugues of BACH and HANDEL, and one whose example goes to the discountenancing in the church of shallow, frivolous, operatic or variation music, or drivelling, aimless so-called voluntaries and improvisations, and to the illustrating of the real, lofty and religious style of music that has grown up with the instrument, through its inspired masters. The "Plymouth Church" in Brooklyn has him for an organist. Many here in Boston will remember the impression he produced a few summers since by his organ-playing at the "Musical Convention," when he held a large audience, mostly of the uninitiated in such things, enchained by a great fugue of Bach. It would seem that he was a fit person to prepare a manual for his juniors, who compose the rank and file of organists in our many churches.

The advantage of this collection resides in the fact that, while it meets just the practical organ wants, established in the routine of our congregational forms of worship, supplying opening voluntaries and interludes of the customary length, in all keys and moods of devout sentiment, it carries into all these little things the air and style of the true learned masters of the instrument, — priests, they might be called, of that tone-temple or celestial city of harmony, which a great organ is. In the simplest thing you like to feel that the learning and the power for greater and more complicated lie behind it. Mendelssohn may write a Choral, as plainly and simply as a Yankee singing-master; still it will imply all the learning and the genius of Mendelssohn; it is steeped, baptized, as it were, in the deep and holy spirit of his whole musical culture. Were it not better that the common church organist, instead of extemporizing his own crude voluntaries, should take such simple gems as he can handle out of the mines of the great composers; then, simple as they are, whenever they are played, they will set vibrating those chords in the audience which are in unison with all that is most sublime and intricate in the creations of musical art. It is somewhat in this sense, judging from a hasty perusal, that this collection has been composed or arranged from noted masters.

A well-written Preface contains a history and description of the organ, with hints to church committees with regard to purchasing. The book is printed on a large, oblong page, on beautiful paper, and with a music type superior in elegance and neatness to any that we have seen.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 15, 1852.

Mendelssohn's Songs without Words.

Without words, and without names even! It is music speaking for itself, or rather speaking for the human heart, disdaining any other interpreter. Each melody, with its accompaniment, is like a pure stream flowing through rich scenery. The stream is the soul's consciousness, the scenery is the world of mingled associations through which it flows, time's shadow on its surface. Sometimes however the accompaniment suggests unearthly scenery, enchanted regions, and the song is like the life of a soul disembodied, or translated where it knows no more the fretting bounds of time.

Several of these pieces however have a title, indicating merely their general character: there is one styled a "People's Song," and there are three "Venetian Gondola Songs." Let us look at these latter for the present. After being rocked by this music, till it haunts your thoughts, you feel that you know Venice, though you may never have been there.

"My soul is an enchanted boat,
Which like a sleeping swan doth float
Upon the silver waves of thy sweet singing."

The atmosphere, the limpid coolness of the water, the rhythm of its motion, and the soft, sad, yet voluptuous coloring of all things; in short, the very volatile essence of all that life, is, as it were, caught and perpetuated in these subtle, accommodating forms of melody. What is the meaning of Venice in history, is a question which might perhaps be answered, if we could only tell what influence this music ministers to the mind. Hearing it and losing yourself in it, you inhabit an ideal Venice, the soul, as it were, of the real one, without its sins and infirmities, its horrible suicidal contrasts.

The first of the three (Number Six of the First Set) is a sustained Andante, in six-eight measure. The accompaniment, by a very simple figure, gives the rocking sensation of a gondola, while "the oars keep time." The gentle key, G minor, indicates soft moonlight or star-light; and presently the song floats off, in loving thirds and sixths, full of tenderness and musing sadness, which has more of longing in it than of regret for actual suffering. It rises higher and louder at times, but never breaks through the gentle spell, always sinks back into the dreaminess of the hour. The sentiment is so pure, that one might dream himself in heaven; only the sadness makes it human. Far off in the smooth stream, the boat for a time seems fixed, suspended, and the voice alone, amid its natural accompaniments, informs the distance. Again the motion is resumed, but fainter and more remote, and as the sounds die away in the smooth shining distance, how magical the effect of those soft high octaves, ever and anon twice struck, as if to assure us that beyond it is as beautiful as here; and finally all the harmonies converge into a single note, just as broad spaces on the farthest verge and boundary of sight are represented by a single fine line. At the introduction, after the rocking accompaniment, so soft and dreamy, has proceeded a few measures, you seem suddenly to touch the water and have a cold thrill of reality for a moment, as the harmonies brighten into the major of the key. The predominating expression of the Air, however, is more that of tranquil, child-like harmony and peace, than of any restless passion; an innocent delight just slightly tempered with the "still sad music of humanity." The coolness of the buoyant element allays all inward heat.

In the next one (Second Set, No. 6.) which is a quicker movement, marked Allegretto tranquillo, and in the key of F sharp minor, there is a more stirring and exquisite delight. It rises to a higher pitch of enthusiasm, as if the heart in its still joy overflowed. The beauty of nature seems almost too much for the soul, the harmony of all things too complete. Fancy's images rise thicker than before. The hills, the clouds, the gleaming waters, seem more living than before, and the soul stretches out its arms to them. Listen to that long high trill, which seems to carry the thoughts up and afar, as if they had left the body to play with the fleecy, pearly clouds about the moon, while the boat glides on in its sleep unconsciously below; and then the rapture of that bold delicious cadence, with which the reverie is ended, as if the skies came down with us to earth! The memory of that aerial excursion haunts the following melodies; the song floats in the middle, between two accompaniments, the waves below, and a faint prolonged vibration of that same high note above, like a thin streak of skyey color in a picture.

The last one, which is No. 5 of the Fifth Set, is perhaps the most beautiful of the three. It is in A minor, Andante con moto, and still the same rocking six-eight measure. There is even more of the physical sensation of the water in this. Ever and anon the stillness is startled by a loud stroke of the key-note, answered by the fifth below, and sometimes in the lowest octave, which gives one an awed feeling of the depth of the dark element, as if a sounding line were dropped. And again the mingled gurgling and laughing of the water, as it runs off the boat's sides, seems literally imitated in those strange chromatic appoggiaturas, which now and then form a hurried introduction to the principal note. The whole tone and coloring of the picture is deeper than the others. It is a song of the depth of the waters. The chords are richer, and the modulations, climbing towards their climax, are more wild and awe-inspiring. But by degrees the motion grows more gentle, and the sea more smooth, and the strain melts away in a free liquid cadence, in the major of the key, like closing the eyes in full assurance of most perfect bliss.

You feel that no soul ever conversed more intimately with nature, than did Mendelssohn when he composed this music. And music only could reveal what is here revealed.

If you would know Mendelssohn truly, study him in these "Songs without Words." They are of his most genuine, most individual inspirations. They are quite various in character,—some thirty-six of them in all;—and there is scarcely a characteristic trait of the composer's style, developed in his larger works, which you will not find quite clearly pronounced in one of these little Lieder. In them you have the whole of Mendelssohn, that is of the innate, and not the acquired music of the man.

New Pianists in Paris.

There seems no end to the series of prodigies in this line, which keep up an ever renewed furor in Paris. Some seem really artists, in whom finger work is subordinate to the feeling and the soul of music; others are what the old BACH in his day called "finger knights;"—perhaps now we should say chevaliers d'industrie digitigrade. Of the former class is Mlle. CLAUS; to the latter, we fear from the description, belongs the latest wonder, who has been exciting the Parisian connoisseurs and dilettanti, M. HABERBIER. Innovations in fingering, in the mechanical art of bringing out effects, appear to be the fascination of the man, or rather the key by which he contrives to unlock the blasé indifference of Paris and get at his public. We translate from the Gazette Musicale:

"M. Haberhier is a Prussian from Königsberg, about forty years old, who plays the piano like any good player; only, he performs with two hands certain passages which a single hand might execute, and thereby gives more intensity to the sounds, especially to trills, which, being thus struck by the two index fingers, have more force and éclat. But the two hands, thus employed in a manner in perfecting a passage, a phrase, must for the time being dispense with accompaniment, with harmony; which, strictly viewed, is no great inconvenience, since harmony kept too continually complete produces monotony and ennui on this instrument.

"M. Haberhier is a composer-arranger, [the term will suit many of the virtuosos, who have visited us], and does not seem excessively set upon playing only his own music. In his first concert he played a picturesque fantasia, entitled 'Souvenirs of Norway,' upon popular airs of that country; then a fragment of Thalberg's fantasia on Sonnambula; then la Fontaine, an imitative study, not too well justifying its title; and then the overture to 'William Tell,' arranged by him, and one might say, somewhat by Liszt, who might claim, in this arrangement, the honors of collaboration. For the rest, the digital gymnastics employed in this piece by the Prussian pianist, enabled him to produce fine effects and make his new method appreciated. In his 'Souvenir of Denmark,' M. Haberhier displayed in that national song, which is the Marseillaise of the Danes, a force, a harmonic energy, which provoked warm applause, in the feminine part of the audience especially, which seemed quite enthusiastic. We need not say that the hall was crammed with artists, who occupy themselves with the art of playing the piano. You almost walked over the heads of pianists. As for me, I was flanked on the right and left by two, who did not seem very eager to adopt the fingering of M. Haberhier.

"And, to continue to treat this piano question, which seems to us not nearly exhausted, we will say that the piano, which sums up in itself all music, ought not to be regarded as an end exclusively instrumental, but as a means of expressing sentiments by harmony and melody, so far as possible. To make leap out from it a rich, sustained, round, powerful, expressive tone, not too much smothered by the accompaniment,—that should be the study of every pianist who would impress an audience. That is the result to which Mlle. MATTMANN has arrived. She elevates the modern music to its height, and elevates herself to the level of the inspirations of our great masters. In the piece entitled: Les Champs, by Prudent, her fingers are the interpreters of all the thrilling sensations of nature; she enacts a living idyll before your eyes, the songs of the villagers; she paints, by limpid and fugitive sounds, the murmuring rill; you seem to feel and breathe the freshness of the morning breeze; and then you hear the joyous and confused laughter of birds, who go to sleep warbling at the mysterious approach of evening: Theocritus, Thompson, Gessner, have painted nothing more fresh.

"And now see Louise Mattmann take up the op. 27 of Beethoven, which she has made her own, that Sonata in C sharp minor ['moonlight'], which so many pianists try to comprehend and to interpret; that sombre elegy, which exhales all the griefs of the soul, all the tortures of passion, the terrors of despair and death. The young virtuoso does not call to her aid poetic images, as we here are obliged to do. It is by her whole panting frame, it is by the emotive, vibrating sound of the human voice, which escapes from each of her fingers, that she proceeds, that she makes herself the equal, the sister, the confidant of Beethoven, that she weeps and despairs and cries in harmony with him. Thus to identify body and soul with the inspirations of genius, is to prove that one possesses it herself, that one has received this sad and beautiful gift from heaven at her birth."

MADAME OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT sings the first strains of her farewell on Tuesday night. The programme of the "last concert but two in America" is announced. It is made up after the model of the former concerts, which established her artistic sway among us; indeed the selections are mostly from the same music. Thus she is to sing first that grandest specimen of the modern romantic school of German opera, the Scena and prayer from Der Freyschutz, the thing of all her brilliant things which she sings the heartiest; then one of the florid Italian bravura pieces, showing the extraordinary play of her voice: from Beatrice di Tenda; then (for the first time here), with BADIALI, a duet from Meyerbeer's "Huguenots;" then the pure melting Mozart melody: Deh vieni non tardar, from Figaro; and finally the "Bird's Song."—This brings up in our mind some snatches of the melody, with the English words to which it is sometimes here sung, of a touching four-part song of Mendelssohn:

"The Nightingale is gone away!
Spring-time again invites her;
She has not learned another lay,
Her old Song still delights her."

And this is all to be in New York! Sadly and wistfully we read it; most of our readers probably will not be there. Yet do we not all regard those farewell concerts as in a certain sense our own occasion? The feelings of all, whom the matchless singer has won to the love of lofty song and of the divine humanity expressed in song, flow to that favored audience that is to represent us all; they are to listen for us all vicariously. For it is really a matter of general concern, when an Artist of the highest stamp, the first who ever came to us, and who has been revealing to the heart and brain of this young giant nation the true beauty, dignity and consequence of Art, now takes her leave. It is as if we, this whole people, had been hearing most entrancing and mysterious music in our sleep, music such as changes the whole tone of life, and were now leaning forward to where we seem to hear its last faint receding strains.

Perhaps next week we shall be able to report somewhat of these concerts; for no one thinks of other music now. Meanwhile we have had the curiosity to go back to, and even the rashness to print upon another page, some notes we made a year ago, recalling first impressions of the LIND. Sure we are, we shall find no occasion to unsay aught;—but who shall say the more that can and should be said,—the chief part being, after all, unspeakable and only felt and working somehow in the lives of the true listeners.

CROWDED OUT. A rich letter from "Hafiz," about music in New York, came to hand just as our paper was about made up. It will be good next week; meanwhile we make room here for the concluding lines:

"Madame GOLDSCHMIDT is in town, and was serenaded at Delmenico's on Monday evening. I had recently the rare pleasure of making the acquaintance of her husband. The impression of his playing,—its quiet, rich refinement, its deep feeling and exquisite appreciation of whatever is noble in thought and delicate in sentiment,—was most fully confirmed by that of the man. I wish it were right to say more, for there are some pleasures of which we would gladly make the whole world a confidant.

"OLE BULL comes from the South, witching the world as he advances. It is his intention, I learn privately, to give Concerts here, and I am curious to find if my old enthusiasm for him will be awakened. Think of us on the eve of hearing Jenny Lind and Ole Bull!"

Happy Howadji! But we mean to be there too, and share that happiness with you; for whence, but from New York, can a Journal of Music be edited, while the Queen of Song there holds her court!

ITEMS.—ALBONI, the greatest contralto in the world, it is reported, will sail for this country on the 17th of this month.—The mystery of Mlle. WAGNER's engaging herself to the Royal Italian Opera, in London, notwithstanding Lumley's announcement of her, is explained by the report that she was not satisfied with Lumley's security.—Two brand new English Oratorios are announced for the forthcoming Birmingham festivals.—It is encouraging to learn that our MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY have resolved to have private, as well as public, rehearsals.—The "BOSTON MUSIC HALL" is rapidly rising above ground; a hundred workmen are now employed upon its walls.

HECTOR BERLIOZ, the eccentric French composer, is just now all the rage at Weimar. His opera, Benvenuto Cellini, was brought out at the theatre on March 24th, under the direction of Liszt, who is now chapel-master at that place. By a singular coincidence, on the same evening of this performance, another composition by Berlioz, entitled Romeo and Juliet, was produced under his own direction, in London, at Exeter Hall. A letter from Liszt concerning this performance commences in the following strain:—"Honor to the master chisellers!" Glory to things of beauty, and space for them! Benvenuto Cellini, represented yesterday evening, March the 20th, will continue on its legs, and without abatement of one inch of its stature. Without any puff, London and Paris may be informed of its success. It is one of the most powerful works whereof I am aware. There is here simultaneously splendid chiselling and original and life-glowing statuary, &c."

Books and Journals.

The Howadji in Syria. By GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1852.

Who will not welcome another book by the author of "Nile Notes?" Like that, the present volume is no dry statistical log-book of voyages and travels. The measure has been taken again and again of everything in Egypt and Syria, by armies of savans. The real poet traveller, whom we love to read and talk with, takes their labors with him as his guide and yard-stick; but the book he writes to us, is the spirit of the Eastern scenery and life passed through his own sympathetic and poetic soul, as it were the music of an organ or the glow of sunset, and reproduced in free prose-poem form, which, as we read it, fills us with the aroma and the genuine sensation of the scenes which he has visited. These live on in him, and so he writes from memory, that is, from his own tempered consciousness and feeling, at a year's distance, as vividly and safely as if he were penning notes upon the spot.

The exuberance of style and fancy in the former book is somewhat sobered down in this; and yet, to show how genuine that exuberance was, it here wears for itself a thousand little sly side channels of delicate wit and humor, through which it runs prattling and sparkling along by the side of the grave or sentimental discourse. The book is toned down by a deeper experience, without any loss of young poetic wealth and fervor. We have read nothing lately, which affected us and held us occupied in a manner so like that of the best romantic music, say of Mendelssohn or Chopin. Take this sentence, as a fair sample; it closes the chapter of the first day's travel in the Syrian desert: does it not seem the translation into words of some exquisite Notturmo?

"A gay wind blew out of the desert, tossing sand in their faces, and running with low gusty laughter to play with the palms, and to carry back into the wilderness the Muezzin's cry.

"It fled, and we watched the day gloriously dying. Then suddenly fell over the world the sable folds of the great tent of Night: the darkness was cool and sweet, and through myriads of points above, the gone glory of the day looked in and made the darkness gorgeous."

The Knickerbocker for May is received from Pettridge & Co., agents in this city. It is full of pleasant literary varieties; among others, a long extract from an unpublished poem by HALLECK, and a couple of chapters of the "Fudge Papers," contributed serially, with an eye eventually to a book, by IK MARVEL. The "Editor's Table" is loaded with bon-bons; it is one unbroken stretch of twenty pages, as compact as the thickest forest foliage, where the eye may light at any point and find something pleasant;—you may begin in the middle, or at the end, and find the beginning of something, and the subjects pass you like the individuals in a crowd. A very entertaining editor is MR. L. GAYLORD CLARK, and we are happy to read the announcement on this said "Editor's Table" that some of the choice gatherings thereof for sixteen years past are to be published in a book by the Messrs. Appleton.

The Favorite, a Monthly Magazine of instruction and amusement for Boys and Girls, D. H. JACQUES, editor, is on our table. From inspection of this No. I. for April, as well as from old acquaintance with Mr. Jacques, we can commend it heartily to our young friends. It is made very attractive to the eye by marginal wood-cuts and illuminated cover; and the reading matter is just such as children love, while they gather up thereby some grains of wisdom and acquire habits of observation, as well as feed a pure imagination and a sense of the Beautiful. German Fairy tales are here happily retold; fancied dialogues of young folks, little transplantations from classic mythology, bits of news for youthful scientific curiosity, &c. &c., fill up the pages pleasantly.

Every happy child should be a subscriber to this monthly feast, and help ensure its continuous and increasing richness. It costs but $1 per year, and is published in New York, by Hyatt & Jacques, 97 Cliff Street. We shall be happy to receive and transmit subscriptions from our young friends hereabouts.

We are indebted to the Editor, CHARLES HALE, Esq., and the publishers, Messrs. Redding & Co., for a full set, from the beginning, of To-Day, a Boston Literary Journal, published every Saturday. It is very neatly printed in octavo book form, and its literary melange of reviews, poems, tales, extracts from forthcoming new books, &c., is lively, sensible and in good taste. Each number of "To-Day," seems an improvement on the last, and it has now reached number twenty.

We have owed no small assistance, in the organizing of our subscription list and sending out of specimens, to the Massachusetts Register and Business Directory, for 1852, for a copy of which we are indebted to the publisher, Mr. GEORGE ADAMS, 91 Washington street. In it you find the names of all the towns and counties, the officials, the societies and corporations, the principal traders, manufacturers and men of professions, the newspapers, the academies, &c. &c., in our State.

There is a sort of charm about well arranged Statistics, which is almost as æsthetic, as the sense of cleanliness and order in one's life. Not a little inspiration comes out of this homely economy, shaping multifarious dry facts into an orderly world or Kosmos.

AN OLD SONG, WITH A NOTE BY CHARLES LAMB.

This quaint old song, with LAMB's quainter commendation of it to his musical friend, (VINCENT NOVELLO?), is taken from "The Arrangement of Paris," a Dramatic Pastoral, by GEORGE PEELE, 1584. We prefix a bit of the introductory dialogue.

Paris. Nay, what thou wilt; but since my cunning not compares with thine, Begin some toy that I can play upon this pipe of mine.

Enone. There is a pretty Sonnet then, we call it CUPID'S CURSE:

"They that do change old love for new, pray Gods they change for worse."

[They sing.]

Ena. Fair, and fair, and twice so fair,
As fair as any may be,
The fairest shepherd on our green,
A Love for any Lady.

Par. Fair, and fair, and twice so fair,
As fair as any may be,
Thy love is fair for thee alone,
And for no other Lady.

En. My Love is fair, my Love is gay,
And fresh as bin the flowers in May,
And of my love my roundelay,
My merry, merry, merry roundelay,
Concludes with Cupid's curse:
They that do change old love for new,
Pray Gods they change for worse.

Both. { Fair, and fair &c. } (repeated.)
{ Fair, and fair &c. }

En. My Love can pipe, my Love can sing,
My Love can many a pretty thing,
And of his lovely praises ring
My merry, merry, merry roundelays.
Amen to Cupid's Curse:
They that do change old love for new,
Pray Gods they change for worse.

Both. { Fair, and fair, &c. } (repeated.)
{ Fair, and fair, &c. }

To my esteemed Friend and excellent Musician, V. N., Esq.

DEAR SIR,—I conjure you, in the name of all the Sylvan Deities, and of the Muses, whom you honor, and they reciprocally love and honor you,—rescue this old and passionate Ditty—the very flower of an old forgotten Pastoral, which had it been in all parts equal, the Faithful Shepherdess of Fletcher had been but a second name in this sort of Writing—rescue it from the profane hands of every common Composer: and in one of your tranquildest moods, when you have most leisure from those sad thoughts, which sometimes unworthily beset you; yet a mood, in itself not unallied to the better sort of melancholy; laying by for once the lofty Organ, with which you shake the Temples; attune, as to the Pipe of Paris himself, to some milder and more love-according instrument, this pretty Courtship between Paris and his (then not-as-yet-forgotten) Enone. Oblige me, and all more knowing Judges of Music and of Poesy, by the adaptation of fit musical numbers, which it only wants, to be the rarest Love Dialogue in our language. Your Implore, C. L.

MUSICAL WORKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED BY MASON & LAW,

23 Park Row, Opposite Astor House, N. York.

THE ACADEMY VOCALIST. A Collection of Vocal Music, arranged for the use of Seminaries, High Schools, Singing Classes, &c. By GEORGE F. ROO, Professor of Music in Rutgers and Singler Institutes, the New York Institution for the Blind, &c. With a complete course of Elementary Instruction, Vocal Exercises, and Solfeppios, by LOWELL MASON.

This work is intended to supply a want long felt in our Higher Schools and Institutions. The music is arranged for three parts, and in such a manner that it may be sung exclusively by female voices or by a mixed choir. Whenever solos occur, a simple accompaniment for the Piano Forte or Melodeon has been added. The work is printed from new English type and on beautiful paper. Retail price, 62 1-2 cents.

ZUNDEL'S ORGAN BOOK. By JOHN ZUNDEL. Two Hundred and Fifty Easy Voluntaries and Interludes for the Organ, Melodeon, Seraphine, &c. With Introductory Remarks, Description of Stops, Directions for the Purchase of Organs, &c., adapting the work especially to the wants of young organists, and those who have made sufficient progress to accompany plain Psalmody on the Organ, Melodeon, or Seraphine. Retail price, $1.50.

THE GLEE HIVE. BOSTON ACADEMY OF MUSIC. A Collection of Glee and Part Songs, selected and arranged for the Musical Conventions and Teachers' Institutes of the Boston Academy of Music. By LOWELL MASON and GEORGE JAMES WEBB.

Here are Thirty-three choice, tasteful, and sprightly Glee and Part Songs, mostly new, from the best Authors, sold at an exceedingly low price. It is just the book wanted by Singing Clubs, Societies, Classes, and the Social Circle. Retail price, 38 cents.

WILDER'S SCHOOL MUSIC. A Collection of Thirty-six New and Beautiful Songs, arranged for Schools and Juvenile Classes. By L. WILDER, Teacher of Music in the Brooklyn Music Schools, &c.

This work has already been adopted in the Schools of Brooklyn, New York, &c. Retail price, 18 3-4 cents.

CANTICA LAUDIS: OR, THE AMERICAN BOOK OF CHURCH MUSIC. By LOWELL MASON, Professor in the Boston Academy of Music, Editor of the Boston Handel and Haydn Society's Collection, Carmina Sacra, and other of the most popular Music Books in the country; and GEORGE JAMES WEBB, Professor in the Boston Academy of Music, and Editor of many valuable Musical Works.

The increased satisfaction with which it was received, and the unprecedented success of this book, MASON AND WEBB'S LATEST WORK, as well as the warm commendations it has received from the Musical Profession generally, establish it as the best and most attractive collection of Church Music which even these celebrated authors have ever produced. It contains a greater amount, as well as variety, of truly beautiful new tunes, anthems, chants, and other pieces, than any similar work; besides a copious collection of the standard old tunes. The Elements of Vocal Music have been newly and most carefully prepared, and to adapt it more particularly to CHOIRS AND SINGING SCHOOLS, about Two Hundred Solfeppio Exercises and Progressive Lessons have been added. In addition to numerous testimonials from the press, it having been pronounced the "MOST VALUABLE BOOK OF CHURCH MUSIC EVER ISSUED," it has received from every section of the country the unqualified approbation of more than ONE HUNDRED PROFESSORS AND TEACHERS OF MUSIC. Retail price, 88 cents.

MARX'S MUSICAL COMPOSITION. The Theory and Practice of Musical Composition. By ADOLPH BERNARD MARX, Doctor of Music, &c. Translated from the third German Edition, and edited by HERMANN S. SARONI.

A. B. MARX holds such high rank in Germany as a writer upon the subject of Musical Composition, that any recommendation of his great work to those who are at all acquainted with the musical literature of the land which is emphatically the home of music, would be superfluous. It is without a rival as a treatise upon this subject, thoroughly scientific and yet adapted to popular comprehension.

The present translation is beautifully printed in 406 octavo pages, and bound in English cloth. Retail price, $2.50.

NEW HYMN AND TUNE BOOK.

TEMPLE MELODIES. A Collection of nearly all the Standard and Popular Tunes, in connection with Five Hundred Favorite Hymns; arranged as a Hymn and Tune Book for Vestries, Social Meetings, Congregational and Family Worship, &c. By DARIUS E. JONES.

This work has already been introduced, and is used with great satisfaction and profit in the vestries of many Churches and in the Congregations of some, while the publishers have received numerous recommendations from Clergymen and others. Those who love the old tunes, and who deem it a desirable object that as many as possible should unite in the singing, especially at social meetings, will find this exactly the book wanted.

The "Societe des Concerts" at the Conservatoire at Paris.

By a Correspondent to London Musical World.

At the latter part of last year's season, two Englishmen were at Paris. They were habitués of the Philharmonic of London, and had of course heard much of the Conservatoire; but they had also been told the latter had fallen off much since the Revolution, while, as they knew, the former had considerably improved. The difference between the orchestras, they had been informed, was not so great, and consequently there was not so anxious a desire to hear and see as there often is. Besides, it must be confessed there were most decided John Bull prejudices in both of them as to French matters. But there is something about a Beethoven Symphony no Philharmonic man can resist—an Alderman would as soon refuse turtle. Accordingly we entered one of the indescribable vehicles which, under an immense variety of the prettiest feminine appellations, do the duty of cabs, and proceeded to the Rue Poissonniere in search of tickets. We found immense difficulty in procuring them, but, on mentioning the Philharmonic, we were supplied with the only two billets left, with which we proceeded to our hotel, and in due time to the appointed place. We were ushered into a large hall, on each side of which were a range of plain columns; and on exhibiting our numbers were told on which side to enter. Half Paris seemed to be there, and every one seemed full of interest and anxiety. By and-by we were marshalled to our place by an old woman in a spotless white cap, who acted as box-keeper, and we found ourselves in the Salle des Concerts. This in truth is a theatre, and not a concert-room, in our sense of the word. It is of oblong form, but it has its tiers of boxes, balcon, stalls, parterre, couloir, &c., like any other theatre. The place of the stage is occupied by some seats placed on the level, and then side benches, which run rapidly to the back. Its decorations are distemper and seem only temporary. In fact the arched ceiling appeared to be covered with nothing but common paper-hanging. The part occupied by the orchestra is painted as if ornamented with hangings, and inscribed with the names of the most celebrated composers, in which we gladly saw those of Handel and Bach. There was an evening dress. The French are always bien ganté bien chaussé—but the ladies wore their bonnets, and white chokers were not visible.

There is a marked difference on the part of the auditory. Alas! that we should have to say it, but the finer part of the Philharmonic members seem as much interested in themselves as in the music—like the Roman ladies in the time of Horace in Juvenal. There is no rustling of silks—no light breathings, that amount almost to a titter, as young ladies enter. The mammas do not faint, nor the chaperons turn out a whole row, that their fair charges may take their seats, while the band are playing the "adagios" of the first movement. Nothing of this sort at Paris. No; they come for the music; and every one is seated quietly and silently in their places. In the meantime the band enter and take their seats. The first and second violins are disposed in front, on two sets of benches, facing each other. In the centre between them are benches for the chorus. Behind these, facing the audience and crossing the ends of the violin benches, are the tenors. From these the benches rise rapidly, and are filled on the right side, as you look at them by the violoncelli, each one attended by his contra-basso, and on the other side are the wind instruments. All these benches, except the violins, face the audience. It will be understood that the wind band and the basses each form a mass, while the violins are divided. There was another marked difference in favor of the French arrangements. There was none of that fearful dissonance at tuning the instruments: no rasping of basses, howling of horns, squeaking of fiddles, and blowing of trombones, that form such an unpleasant overture to the programme, and dull the ear to the first chord of the symphony. Except a few slight touches, almost inaudible, to make sure all was right,—not a sound was heard. The band consists of somewhat less than our numbers, and of about our own proportions, except that there are four bassoons instead of two.

In the meantime our neighbors had discovered that we were strangers, and pointed out to us, with the gentlest politeness, all the men of distinction—the principal being Auber, for whom there seems an esteem and respect we scarcely ever saw fall to the lot of any musical man. A short time elapsed and the conductor, Monsr. Girard, took his place, and was warmly received; and the band began the famous E flat of Mozart.

The first chord seemed hardly so full as at the Philharmonic, and the drum began with too much of a bang, as is the general custom in France; but the rich piano echo notes of the wind band compensated for this. The scale passages for the violins seemed much like our own; but those for the tutti bassi, both in the forte and piano parts, were much better; they were as clear as a run on a piano forte. Still we would not allow of any superiority. The allegro began deliciously, the horns were so rich and so well in tune. Never mind; we are reforming our horns in London; they will be better next year thought we. The crescendo was fine, taken with great judgment, and the burst into the forte splendid. Again, the excellence of the basses, their extraordinary clearness of execution and ensemble, attracted our notice. The wind instruments played perfectly in tune, and with much judgment. The whole movement was exquisitely rendered; but the true John Bulls could not, or would not, acknowledge so very much difference as yet. Our neighbors were delighted to see us so pleased. "Monsieur knows the score thoroughly I perceive." Of course we bowed and looked as wise as we could.

The andante began, the violins playing with marvellous delicacy. The basses gave the rallentando, as they descend splendidly. It was like a gleam of sunshine. Still the playing of our two clarionets, Williams and Lazarus, is so exquisite, that we John Bulls again would not allow, as yet, any great superiority. It was the same with the minuetto—the trio is always done so splendidly by our clarionets—first with such richness, and the repeat such a wonderful piano, that though the horns reminded us we were not at Hanover Square, the difference still was not so great. At last began the finale. The violins led off the rapid passages like one single instrument, giving as much light and shade in the forte passages, as delicacy in the pianos. Instead of unmeaning division, the air in the forte came out with all the energy and beauty of Mozart, but when the second piano part came, with the imitation and answer from instrument to instrument, my friend leaned over to me, and whispered in the interval of the pause—"Ah! old fellow, we have nothing like this at the Philharmonic; in fact, we have not got a piano there." Alas! it is too true. We felt in the presence of artists of superior training and of superior intelligence; and when the symphony ended, we both sighed—"Well, this is the first time we ever heard the 'Swan' symphony done perfectly."

But we were not destined to one surprise only. The chorus entered. It did not appear so numerous as our own. The band struck a single chord; and they began, without accompaniment or forte strains, a very original motet of Leisring's,—"O Filii." The voices went together as perfectly as the "Dom-Chor" of Berlin, but not so "aigu" in tone. The strains are simple and mournful, and are echoed by the same chorus (always without accompaniment) pianissimo. Such an echo we never heard. It was as perfect as if the mocking nymph herself had repeated it from the side of a woodland hill. All that we could hear of the author was, that he was a German of little fame. The composition itself had not much to recommend it except originality; but it was most effective as a tour de force for a chorus, and it was most rapturously encored.

As if to give us the greatest possible contrast, the next piece was the andante in G, and presto movement in D, from Haydn's Quartet, No. 5, performed by the whole stringed band; and it was executed as we never heard anything done before. The andante was like the performance of two finished players of the deepest feeling. The violoncelli were surpassingly excellent. The presto was given with the most sparkling effect—the rapid divisions as clear as a Genevian box. Something of the kind has been attempted in England, but without success: you perceive a want of unity. There are continued trips and stumbles; and instead of fancying it a quartet performed by four instruments of immense power and sweetness, at once recognise it as orchestral.

As if to carry the system of contrasts to its uttermost, the next piece was the 18th Psalm of Benedetto Marcello—"I cieli immensi narrano." (We call it the 19th.) The only works of this pure and simple writer commonly known in England, are the 8th Psalm and the 41st (42d in our version)—"As the hart panteth," and "O Lord our Governor." The 18th is very superior to these. It begins with a fire and energy unusual to this writer, and reminds one of some of the spirited movements in Haydn's masses. It is but repetition to say that the chorus was superb. . . .

This simple psalm preceded the mighty Symphony of Beethoven in C minor—certainly the most inspired work of the kind ever produced. There was a pause, during which every person seemed to be concentrating his attention; the same quiet examination of instruments went on—a careful look from the conductor was cast round—and amid breathless silence the great symphony began. It is hardly possible, and besides it would weary our readers to dwell upon all the points of this noble composition. The very first four notes were given with a force and precision we never heard before. The fortes and pianos again attracted our admiration at their exquisite light and shade. The little bit of solo for the horn rang out as clear as a bell, and as round as a diapason. The long notes, which alternate as echoes between the stringed and wood band, were perfectly smooth and in tune, a thing we hardly ever hear in England; the basses were as clear as the violins themselves, and altogether the symphony seemed to develop fresh beauties at every bar. The same remarks will apply to the andante, particularly where, for the sixteen bars preceding the fortissimo reprise of the subject, the flute, oboe, and the two clarionets have the field to themselves, and their notes seem to twine round each other in the most graceful melody; their tones were perfectly silvery. The scherzo, however, deserves a few words of notice. It was taken much slower than in England, and the rallentando more cantabile, and very judiciously so; for as the time is accelerated at the fugato, it gives the instruments an opportunity to execute their notes accurately. The basses gave the subject as clearly as the notes of an organ, instead of the puff-a-puff-a with which we are usually treated. We cannot understand the reason of hurrying over this movement; it is not marked so either in the German or French scores, and its effect is marvellously enhanced by steady treatment. The oboes and horn again excited our admiration, but the treat was to come; the pianissimo was perfect—the orchestra seemed asleep except the dull beat of the drum; the crescendo was regular and gradual, not as ours, getting into a fortissimo long before its time, and trusting to the blare of the trombones for a burst, but increasing only to the forte, and then bursting with fortissimo on the first chord of that wondrous triumphal march; and here appeared the vast superiority of the brass band, as our old friend, Tom Ingoldsby, says, ing, as a facetious friend of ours says, enough to carry off one's "whiskers." We will not attempt to describe that march; let the reader remember what we have said, and then let him fancy what the different points must have been, with such horns, bassoons, and oboes as these. The close was followed by a short pause; every one seemed to draw a long breath, and then followed such a burst of applause as we hardly ever have heard. No soul attempted to move till all was over. There was no fidgetting for hats, turning boas round necks. No; it was clear the audience were as refined in appreciation as the band in execution. We parted with the heartiest shake of hands from our neighbors, who seemed positively charmed to see how we enjoyed the music. "Vive la Société des Concerts," said we, as we resumed our hats, and made our last bows to our polite friends.

To compare the two orchestras let us begin at the bottom of the score. Their contrabassi are as superior to ours as Bottesini is to all other players—they really play, and don't make a fuzzy sort of sound. The celli shew hardly so much difference, the four bassoons add much to their richness. Our tenors I think quite as good, thanks to that consummate musician and artist Harry Hill. Our violins have more power in the fortissimo parts; like all the rest of the band in the piano parts, and in tout ensemble, they are very inferior. Their solo bassoon is richer than ours in tune, though not superior in execution. Our bassoons use too weak a reed. Of the clarionets we have already spoken. Their oboes and horns are vastly superior. Our oboes never seem in tune, and our horns never seem to know their parts: how awfully they stumble about in the trio in the Eroica. Their flutes are not better than Ribas. Their trumpets are certainly not better than ours; while their trombones are as superior to our ear-splitting Bartlemy-Fair bulls of Bashan as can be conceived. We have nothing like the pure tone of this wood-band—it is like the chords of the swell of an organ—nor have we anything like the rich tones of their brass band: theirs is music, ours is blare. Our tympanist stands alone—none in the Conservatoire can rival Chipp. Whence, then, comes the difference? It is discipline—obedience—no one thinks of himself, nor plays for himself; every one is subservient to the whole. This is only to be got by repeated rehearsal; this is what the Philharmonic wants; and this it must have, or it will soon feel some rival at its heels.

FREDERIC CHOPIN.

BY FRANZ LISZT.

V.

"There are all sorts of wreaths," says Goethe, "and indeed some, which one may pluck as he walks along." These by their balmy freshness may gladden a few moments; but we may not hang them by the side of those, which CHOPIN won by such assiduous, exemplary toil, by an earnest love for Art and by a sad sympathy with the states of mind, which he has so superbly portrayed.

He has not sordidly competed for those easy crowns, on which so many of us would modestly pride ourselves; he has lived as a man of pure heart, noble sentiment, good and sympathizing, whose soul one feeling wholly filled, and that the most exalted of earthly feelings, the love of country; he passed away through the midst of us like a hallowed shadow of all that Poesy, which has its home in Poland: therefore we bend in reverence before his tomb and we would strew for him no artificial flowers, would twine no lightly woven perishable wreaths! We would exalt our hearts to his sarcophagus, would learn of him to put away from us all that belongs not to the noblest striving, and to direct all our aspiration toward deeds, which plough a deeper furrow than the stream of to-day. Let us then, in the mournful time in which we live, renounce all that is unworthy of Art, despise all that bears not in itself the pledge of durability, forsake all that hides not in itself a spark of the eternal spiritual beauty, which it is the calling of Art to let shine, that it may shine itself; and let us think continually of that old prayer of the Dorians, whose simple language breathes such holy poetry, when they besought the Deity "to give them the Good through the Beautiful." Instead of making haste to entice hearers and to please them at any price, may we rather strive, like CHOPIN, to leave behind us a heavenly echo of what we have felt and loved and suffered. Let us learn from his great memory to desire that of ourselves, which shall give us honorable rank in the mystical Commonwealth of Art, instead of demanding of the Present, without regard to the Future, those cheaply earned wreaths, which wither and are forgotten almost as fast as they are heaped up.

Instead of those, there fell to CHOPIN's lot the fairest palms, which any artist in his life-time can acquire; they were awarded by his peers and companions in Art; and an even more exclusive public, than the musically cultivated aristocracy, that visited his concerts, dedicated to him its enthusiastic admiration. A circle of celebrated names composed this public, and these names bowed before him, like kings from different kingdoms, who had come to celebrate one of their own. These rendered unto him in full measure the tribute, that belonged to him; and it could not be otherwise in a land like France, which knows with so much tact and foretaste how to discover and appreciate the rank of its guests.

The most distinguished geniuses of Paris often met at Chopin's; they loved to go to him, because they found the most delightful enjoyment, and because they were entirely without restraint. For he possessed that amiability in receiving guests, so native to the Poles, which not only subjects the host to all the rules and duties of hospitality, but also makes him free from all regard to his own personality, so that he can devote himself exclusively to the wishes and the pleasure of his guests. One felt well with him, because he left all to the decision of his friends and placed himself and all he had at their command. An unreserved bountifulness, which also is peculiar to the simplest peasant in Slavonic nations: he acts the host in his hut, with more cheerful haste than the Arab in his tent, and what is lacking to the splendor of his entertainment, he supplies by a proverb, which he always repeats and which even the grand lord after the most sumptuous banquet under golden canopies repeats: "Disdain not what is unworthy of you, but it is my whole insignificant fortune, which I lay at your feet. (Czym bogat, tym rad.)"

One who has had an opportunity to observe the manners in CHOPIN's father-land, will understand more readily what lent to our social meetings at his house more heartiness, more freedom than elsewhere; that cheerfulness, that rang so clear and genuine, leaving behind no flat or bitter after-taste and hegetting no reaction of dark humors. Although CHOPIN evidently avoided large company, yet he was in the highest degree obliging and amiable, when you fell into his house as it were; seeming to concern himself about nobody, he succeeded admirably in busying every one with just what most attracted him, and in captivating every one by his agreeable and courteous demeanor.

TRIUMPHANT MUSIC.

BY R. H. STODDARD.

I.

Ay! give me Music! flood the air with sound!
But let it be superb, and brave, and high;
Not such as leaves my wild ambition bound
In soft delights, but lifts it to the sky;
No sighs nor tears, but deep, indignant calm,
And scorn of all but strength, my only need;
From whence, but Music, should my strength proceed?—

From some Titanic psalm?—
Some thunderous strand of sound, which in its roll
Shall lift to starry heights my fiery soul!

II.

Strike on the noisy drum, and let the fife
Scream like a tortured soul in pain intense,
But let the trumpet brood over their strife,
Victorious, in its calm magnificence;
Nor fear to wake again the golden lute,
That runs along my quivering nerves like fire;
Nor let the silver-chorded lyre be mute,
But bring the tender lyre,
For sweetness with all strength should wedded be,—
But bring the strength, the sweetness dwells in me!

III.

Play on! play on! the strain is fit to feed
A feast of Gods, in banquet-halls divine;
Not one would taste the cups of Ganymede,—
But only drink this more ambrosial wine!
Play on! play on! the secret soul of Sound
Unfolds itself at every cunning turn;
The trumpet lifts its shield, a stormy round,
The lute its dewy urn,—
But in the lyre, the wild and passionate lyre,
Lies all its might, its madness, and desire!

IV.

Again! again! and let the rattling drum
Begin to roll, and let the bugle blow,
Like winter winds, when woods are stark and dumb,
Shouting above a wilderness of snow!
Pour hail, and lightning, from the fife and lyre,
And let the trumpet pile its clouds of doom;—
But I o'erstep them with a darker plume,
And beat my wings of fire;—
Not like a struggling eagle baffled there,
But like a spirit on a throne of air!

V.

In vain! in vain! we only soar to sink;
Though Music gives us wings, we sink at last;
The peaks of rapture topple near the brink
Of Death, or Madness pallid and aghast;—
But still play on! you rapt musicians, play!
But now a softer and serenest strain;
Give me a dying fall, that lives again,
Again to die away;—
Play on! but softly till my breath grows deep,
And Music leaves me in the arms of Sleep!

[Communicated.]

Organists vs. Choristers.

In our opinion it is high time that the attention of Parish Committees were called to a prevailing abuse that ill accords with an advanced condition of musical science. We allude to the division of the musical responsibility between an organist and a chorister in our sanctuaries; a remnant of the olden time, unsuited to the present; in accordance with the spirit of the age it should give place to the march of improvement.

The custom owes its origin to a time previous to the use of organs, when amateur performers upon instruments practised with a numerous choir, who elected from their number some person to select music, not on account of his acquirements, where all were equally unskilled, but by reason of his popularity. The post, being one of some little distinction, soon becomes a source of pride, like all other places of honor within the gift of a popular majority; and whatever other changes occur in the choir, if no fault is found with his general deportment, his musical acquirements are not called in question; he is permitted for years by the Parish Committee to retain his place, out of respect for the attachment he is supposed to feel for it. The change proposed will meet opposition from him;—in the order of nature it would appear that innovation shall be resisted, the better to test and justify it;—yet nothing but the vain argument of precedent can be offered favorable to the present system.

In some instances, on the introduction of organs, the office of chorister was very properly abolished by his resignation; but, too frequently, the organist, perhaps the only musician in the church, finds himself occupying a false position, subordinate to some worthy mechanic or tradesman, sans tune, sans time, sans taste, "sans every thing."

The Chorister, what is he? A shoemaker perhaps, by profession. Let him keep to it. Some are butchers, others are tailors, tinmen, men of useful and respectable talent, who should never direct in an astronomical observatory, though they be familiar with the use of the spyglass. Again, he is an eminent man in the society, always seen by the congregation at the head of the singers, separate from the rest by a space, because they are not choristers;—always heard to proclaim the page after the minister has finished the hymn, as if the arduous duty of finding a tune had occupied him every moment since the night previous, when the minister sent him a list of the hymns;—always seen by the congregation to speak to the organist between the verses, as though the power or sweetness of the beautiful harmonies depended upon it. Often has he been known to select a solo or duet in order to illustrate to the congregation his uncommon talent as a vocalist. "Vanity of vanities! all is vanity!" saith the preacher. He is not expected to know more than one part of the harmony, and in general, disappoints expectation even in that. A suggestion of the organist would meet reproof as a supererogatory meddling.

Things are not so at the Trinity or Grace church in this city, the Trinity, the Swedenborgian, the Mt. Vernon churches in Boston, nor at any other church in Christendom where talent occupies its true position. Instances have frequently occurred where organists of fine acquirements would have been received into our churches, had it not been for the jealousy of the choristers, who anticipated the ludicrousness of their position in view of his superior attainments. In other instances, however, the organist enters upon his duties against the will of the chorister, who pursues a line of policy embarrassing to the player, disheartening him; nor does this Dogberry in music rest easy until the usefulness of the organist is utterly destroyed. It has been the custom ever since the introduction of the organ among us, for our large cities to supply, in a great measure, the country churches with the organist. He finds there a choir large enough and of such material as he could drill in a short time into good discipline. But the chorister, who never knew there was such a thing as a Mass or an Oratorio, and never heard any good music in his whole life, resists any innovation as though his life were at stake; and the poor organist accompanies the harsh voices and the grating discords, till his year expires, glad of his freedom to find a situation more to his taste. As to there being a well drilled choir under such an organization, it is impossible; there can be no progress.

Why is it thus, that the organist, living in a world of harmony, to whom every day adds new inspiration, should not impart according to the universal law of nature? Simply because "The world could no more contain two Cæsars than it could two Gods." Yet, in the whole course of our experience, we never knew an organist who seemed to feel any vanity in his position as a teacher. The mantle seems to sit upon his shoulders easily, not a mark of distinction but a reward of merit, well earned by years of patient study and perhaps by the toil of a lifetime. He is unobtrusive, unassuming, manifesting none of that ostentation or that exercise of arbitrary power, which ignorance and presumption wear in order to be thought learned. His life illustrates this sublime thought of the great orator, "I wish to be like the violet, spending its fragrance unseen. I wish to do good unobserved, to see honor blotted out and its place supplied by duty." Profound experience in any science is unattended by pride; for the more a man knows, the more he regrets his deficiency. But, supposing the case, which we never saw, of an organist proud of his distinction as conductor, is it contrary to custom or to justice that one should be honored according to his merits? Let us apply this rule, and what becomes of the honors of our quasi musician, who employs the best available musical talent and uses it, as well as he knows how, to build up for himself a counterfeit reputation? The cause of religion demands the change. The hearts of many are insensible to any other appeal than that addressed to them through the solemn strains of harmony; out of the Church they cultivate their taste for the noblest music the world affords; and shall the music in the Church be to them forever an inanity? This change is due to the organist; who, like other men of spiritual talent, should be untrammelled by circumstances, free to invite and to indulge the inspiration of genius with which he is endowed. This principle has been acknowledged by nations which we would fain believe less civilized than ourselves, and we find that, throughout Europe for generations past, painting, sculpture, poetry and music have not only been patronized but pensioned, in order that even common anxiety of livelihood should not occasionally overshadow the meditations of their votaries. Were it necessary, we could cite the custom of England, where the organist is established in the church as much as the rector, and where, as there are no choristers, he does not tremble at the sight of the village blacksmith, harmonious though he be.

The organist,—what are his qualifications? He is a composer, and his practised eye recognises the good and avoids the bad of musical compositions; a harmonist, and his nicely tuned ear detects the false tone; a metronome, and his even measure perceives the slightest echo; a teacher, he imparts what he knows by the most judicious method; a connoisseur, he introduces to the choir and congregation a higher order of musical selections; in fine, he is a musician, and his science vies with chemistry, physiology, astronomy for the palm of greatness, more spiritual than either. He should be the Mentor of his choir; and it is to be hoped that Parish Committees throughout the United States will correct this common blunder, so unjust to the organist, so fatal to progress, so subversive of the natural order, and so contradictory to common sense, and make their organist, if competent, responsible for all the music in the Church.

NEW YORK, May 10.

[Paris Correspondent of the New York Tribune.]

The first representation of the Juif Errant, by Halévy, took place at the Grand Opera on Friday evening last. The musical critics are pretending to be unwell, thus deferring their reports until they can have heard the production some half a dozen times, without which it is impossible to pass a conscientious judgment upon it. The ticket offices were not open, every place having been long since disposed of. Pit seats were negotiated in the street at fifty francs, and boxes of four places brought 300 francs at 7 o'clock. The President was there, but so deeply buried in his box that few but the artists were aware of his presence. The performance was over at precisely half-past one, the machinery being a little stiff and the intermissions as long as the acts. The Opera had spent such fabulous sums upon the scenery of M. Halévy's partition, that it would have been ruined had the play been damned. Happily, a success which promises to be as durable as the Prophète has saved the treasury from being collapsed. The scenic art has never been carried to such lengths as in this opera. The Enfant Prodigue gave us a view of the glories of Heaven; the Wandering Jew opens the gates of Hell, and shows us the fiery furnace and the tortures of the damned. The crust of the earth seems to peel and shrivel away at the clang of the last trump; the weary march of the way-worn Israelite comes to an end with the close of earth; the graves give up their dead, and from every nook and corner rise, in their shrouds and winding-sheets, the hosts that have slept under the sod, waiting for the judgment-day; in the flaming caldron are imps turning head over heels, and the underlings of Satan tossing up and impaling on pitchforks the miserable sinners that had been "tried and found wanting;" over and above all are the lyres and the raptures of just men made perfect and the bliss and happiness of Paradise Regained. The Old Testament tradition of the final apportionment of woe everlasting to about ninety-nine hundredths of the human race were so marvelously and so frightfully realized, that when I woke up the next morning, and found I was still alive, I was considerably incredulous, and imagined it to be an illusion of the Evil one; but I have got over that since I have been writing this letter. I can say nothing of M. Halévy's music; it is altogether too scientific and recherché to be properly appreciated at a single hearing. In case I become qualified, by frequent attendance, to speak with a clearer comprehension of the subject, you may rest assured that I shall do so.

MUSICIANS IN NEW YORK. It is said that there are two thousand six hundred and eighty-five persons, male and female, in this city, that live by their musical labors. Some teach vocal music; some teach instrumental music; some sing; some play the piano; some fiddle; some give concerts; some sing in church; some sing in opera; some sing in both church and opera; some play the bugle, flute, haultboy, French horn, cornet à piston, ophéclide, banjo, bass drum, kettle drum, tenor drum, triangle, cymbals, fife, violoncello, clarinet, flageolet, guitar, melodeon, organ, tamborine, trombone, or other noisy instrument; and all of them blow their own trumpets.—Mus. World.

In the third act of the new play of Benvenuto Cellini, Melingue, who is as good a sculptor as he is a comedian, makes a plaster statuette of one of the female characters. This he does under the eye of the spectators, and while carrying on his share of the action and the dialogue. Such has become the demand for these specimens of this favorite actor's skill, that they are sold after the performance, by auction, in the saloon of the theatre, and bring much higher prices than they are worth as mere works of art. Every one desires to possess a model made under such curious circumstances, and M. Melingue is at present a dangerous rival to Cleverger and Pradier.—Paris Cor. N. Y. Tribune.

Music in New York.

The Germans certainly bring us a great deal for all the advantages they derive from us. We owe to them what musical cultivation we have, and although the pleasant times have not yet arrived in which, as in the father-land, we sit in Summer gardens or Winter cafés and listen to the best music which the best genius has written, yet the concerts under German auspices become yearly more popular and delightful, and those who love music, not because it is fashionable, or the opera an agreeable resort, but because they have the same pleasure in it that birds have in the sun-light,—they follow the call of Eisfeld and the Philharmonic, and are very well content to be scouted as "classical" and "pedantic."

Treating of German matters you see I fall into the German manner. Do you remember, in learning German, those breathless and balking chases of prolonged and involved sentences up and down and over the pages, with dictionary and grammar in hand, like a leash of hounds to hunt down the quarry? Ichabod Crane had a limber switch with which he "helped" his "young friends," as Dr. Birch called his pupils, "over the tall words." What work and incessant "helping" Ichabod Crane would have had in teaching German!

I have not written you of EISELDE's delightful Quartet Soirées, but have only referred to them. They have been very excellent. EICHORN, with his trusty violoncello, NOLL, with his enthusiastic violin, the elegant TIMM, the appreciative SCHARFENBERG, and others whom you know, whom we know, and whom we all like to know, have assisted in these concerts. There have been singers too: Mrs. WATSON, and a raven-haired Miss WHEELOCK, lesser birds, but sweet in their way, and who, marvellous to say, do not undertake what they cannot do. Mr. Eisfeld commenced his chamber concerts last Winter at Hope Chapel. There are two halls of that name opposite the New York Hotel—Hope Chapel the greater, and Hope Chapel the less; the latter being a low, bare, dismal room under the other, and corresponding to a vestry. It was an odd place for such select concerts. But they succeeded admirably; the choice circle of "classics" and "pedants" was always gathered together, in Hope Chapel the less—or Hopeless Chapel as it more properly looks—and this season Mr. Eisfeld has taken the Apollo rooms, whose antecedents are musically good—for there were held the first Philharmonic concerts.

He has culled for us the best of Beethoven's, Haydn's, Mozart's, Spohr's and Mendelssohn's chamber compositions, and they have been played to an audience that truly enjoyed them. Of course it is not a "Native American" audience, for all your neighbors are sure to speak German, and you mark the well-known characteristics of their features; and if you could only summon the Kellner, and order ein brocken brod and ein glas bier, you would be far away from the Apollo and lost in an anonymous Lokal. The last concert on Saturday, the 8th of May, was as good in kind as any I remember. It ranks with Jenny Lind's and the best Philharmonic. The charm of the evening was Beethoven's Septette,—whose rich, ripe, mellow character, held all the performers to sympathy of feeling not less than truth of tone. Yet sometimes that wild, impulsive violin of Noll's would break a little, like an over mettlesome horse in trotting, but scarcely ever injurious to the general effect, because it served only to sharpen your apprehension of his enthusiasm for the music. Noll and his violin always seem to me like a fiery horse and a fiery rider. They excite each other. They dart, and sweep, and run, rejoicing in themselves and in the race,—not without gentle movements, also.

How masterly this Septette is! How full of the majestic facility of genius in its prime. It varies through the different movements with a fertility of invention, and a singular clearness of expression; as if, I mean, the composer had found no difficulty in conveying his intention. There is nothing cloudy or gloomily grand, in it,—none of the misty Alpine peaks that rise defyingly along the usual range of his mountainous music. But the airs are so melodious, the movements so transparent, that it reminds you of the sunny ease of Mozart, or of his own Pastoral Symphony, although without any feeling of superficiality.

"But what is it all about?" inquired my well meaning friend Quidnunc, who has no ear for music, who, in his own words "knows nothing about music, not a bit, but is sure of what pleases him." This last, of course, he said with an air implying that whatever does not please him, is not pleasant, and that it is mere affectation, "classicality," and "pedantry," to profess pleasure in it.

What do you say to this style of remark?

I asked Quidnunc in reply, what the sunshine was all about, what the beauty of a statue or a picture was about, &c. And Quidnunc looked at me silently and sadly, as if convinced that I was, pro tempore, out of my head.

A Trio of Mendelssohn's was played upon the piano by Scharfenberg, with violin and violoncello. It was interrupted by the snapping of a string in the violoncello. But, like most of Mendelssohn's Concertos which I, at the moment, recall, it wanted the glow of genius, the permeating sense of music, rather than of science. The refinement, the feeling, the ripeness, the skill,—these I always feel in Mendelssohn, and often as in the Lieder ohne Worte, the overtures and parts of the oratorios, a beauty which is quite inexpressible. Yet, if I read upon the bill a Concerto of his, I am not kindled with expectation, but rather with curiosity. I know it will be good. But will it be irresistible? Will it bear me along with itself, or leave me, only longing to be borne, upon the bank? Don't suspect me of the slightest treachery to Mendelssohn—but I do find a good deal of his music uninteresting.

They played the Russian Hymn with Veit's variations, and it was religiously done. I have never heard a more perfect performance than the delivery of the melody. It was entirely simple, but it was pleading and pathetic beyond words. In music of a Northern inspiration there is a strange wildness, — a masculine grief, but utterly hopeless, as of old Norse Kings. You remember Landseer's Reindeer standing upon the shore and looking across the cold dark water to the snowy silence of the mountains. There is no hint of Summer or of softness in the picture, but its pathos is fascinating and profound. It is the same that there is in this Russian Hymn, and in the northern songs of Jenny Lind — which are as far from clap-trap as Vedrai Carino.

Last of all we had Haydn's Quartet in G major, which well ended this delightful series of concerts. The Adagio Religioso, so tranquil, so solemn, so sweet, was given with that feeling and fidelity of which you would be sure with these gentlemen. You can no longer pride yourself, in Boston, upon monopolizing the finest music in the finest kind. Your withers are wrung. With the Philharmonic and Eisfeld, we yield the field to none.

Beside this exquisite evening, we have had little of note in matters musical. A complimentary concert to a very deserving artist — the Contra-bassist CASOLANI — filled Niblo's saloon one evening and deployed a host of various talent. I agree with my friend of the "Musical Times," that Dodworth's Band's performance was the most pleasing. He properly calls it a serenade-band; and the mellow, liquid, consenting sweetness of the effect well justifies the name. Summer moonlights under the balconies of innumerable Queens of Beauty, are necessarily figured in imagination, as the soft, long notes of the wind instruments float out. The rest of the performance was fair. Young BRAHAM sang several of his English ballad-songs with good effect. But Madame BOUCHELLE — forgetting who had sung before her, and how — ventured upon Casta Diva. Madame Bouchelle is not equal to Casta Diva. It is a very remarkable fact, if she does not know it; and if she does, her singing it is the more remarkable. It is to be said, however, that she was disappointed in the presence of an artist who was to assist her, and was therefore obliged to substitute the Aria for the song allotted her. But it was a great error of judgment to select Casta Diva.

There was also a concert at Metropolitan Hall, to introduce the "Plus-Harp Guitar or Bewitcher." You can fancy what it was. Some Andalusian musical enthusiast — it is plain to see that — has fitted a series of additional strings to the Guitar, having the general quality of harp-strings, and the effect is a mingled sound of the two instruments. In such a hall, of course, as in the open air, it had neither richness nor power, but only a faint tinkle. The inventor, Senor Gallageos, played a dreamy, monotonous composition, of which the effect was rather that of the wind sweeping through an Eolian Harp, than of any melody. Little ADELINA PATTI, who has also just sung at the Lyceum Theatre, sang Jenny Lind's Echo-Song, and Ah! non giunge. She is only nine years old, but her cultivation is quite remarkable, and her voice, although pleasantly child-like in tone, is sweet and easily fills that great hall. It is a pity she is to sing in a theatre. She will be stung by the frenzied desire of applause, which will do much to ruin her as an artist. I never see a prodigy of this kind, who is really interesting as little Patti is, without remembering the young Mozart, and that whom the gods love, die young; or grow old, faded and forgotten, which is worse. [Editorial Correspondence.]

NEW YORK, May 19th.

Madame Otto Goldschmidt's Concert.

The charm of that voice and soul and art has not gone. It has lost nothing, but really gained in power; at least, it is more felt than ever. Metropolitan (late Tripler) Hall, last night, was thronged, as at its first opening and tuneful consecration: — a brilliant, eager, enthusiastic throng. There was perhaps a more entire, unanimous, unflagging warmth of reception, (outwardly expressed) in those last concerts in our little Melodeon. But an assembly of three or four thousand must be more heterogeneous, and comprise more coldly curious, more inappreciative auditors, than one of twelve hundred. Again, here the visible splendor and vast sweep of the hall itself comes in for too great a share in the impression of every thing performed therein; it presents indeed a brilliant scene; but too brilliant, too glaring and distracting, and finally (with the added drawback of close air and the heat of so many gas burners) fatiguing and stupifying to the musical and every other sense. It is encouraging that an artist of fine tact in such matters, has made a careful study of coloring for the interior of our new Boston Music Hall, so that it shall be at once rich, harmonious and subdued. Moreover, the great singer's lower notes were somewhat veiled by a cold which she had taken in the head, a day or two before, so that, at first, we could not always catch the completion of a low strain or phrase with all that distinctness, to which we had been used in the Lind. The higher tones, however, always come out smooth, bright and triumphant, and before the unfailing art and fervor of the singer, such an obstacle (seemingly at least) soon melts utterly away.

Now, we have named all the drawbacks, we believe, — all the things that threw any slightest shade of a shadow, doubt or chill across the heavenly-warm and luminous sphere of that glorious hour. In spite of the complaints we heard, afterwards, about the louder kind of applause not seeming to come quite up to the occasion — (hook enough, no doubt, for the wilfully critical to hang a hope upon! though the complaint really indicated that more was felt by each among the audience than could be satisfied by the combined power of applause in all;) still, this was a complete renewal of the great triumphs of Jenny Lind; — all the greater, that she is now so much more generally appreciated and understood. There was in the audience more of the quiet, thoughtfully receptive, than of the inflammatory mood; and the true artist sings to that with deeper satisfaction. To us, (and we know it was so with most of the earnest friends of music) each effort of her art last night surprised us, much as we have heard her, as a new revelation of higher and higher and hitherto unappreciated excellence. To things so perfect, as to the beauties of the earth and skies, of day and night, the soul only opens continually, the progress being in the perceiver and not in the thing perceived.

At eight o'clock Mr. EISELDT took his stand at the head of his orchestra of eighty, comprising the sixty of the noble "Philharmonic," and with the wave of his baton came the full, strong, solemn, minor chord — the key-note of general gloom and apprehension — which opens the wonderful overture to Egmont. We never heard it given with a breadth and passionate emphasis so true to this sombre and gigantic conception of Beethoven. It made a grand, cloudy background for the beautiful anticipations of the evening; — a summer cloud, big with the advent of the Queen of May and of all the melody of birds and human hearts. Signor BADIALI exerted and acquitted himself worthily of the occasion in the tender Romanza from Maria di Rudenz; his mature and manly tones never filled a hall more satisfactorily, and his style was finished, chaste and eloquent. Indeed, throughout the evening, the Signor kept free both from those stereotyped common-place cadenzas, which have so often seemed not to belong to him, as well as from the stunning detonation in which his strong lungs would sometimes indulge. It was a performance duly tempered to the hour, which was her Majesty's, the sovereign Queen of Song; it was, on his part, all we could desire.

Wild outbursts of applause at length greeted Madame GOLDSCHMIDT, as she bounded forward in white bridal attire, her head dressed with loose sprays of vivid green. Slender she seemed; but a healthy, hearty, steady joy beamed in her countenance; and she seemed the happy artist wife, with soul now doubly wedded, knowing rest no more in the ideal only. The first chords of the recitative recalled her from the public to her dramatic identity with Weber's loving, faithful Agatha, watching by moonlight for her lover: Wie nahte mir der Schlummer. These first tones sang themselves in a soft, slow, murmurous, slumbrous, unconscious manner; but how beautifully the voice became awake! how heart-felt and subdued the prayer: Leise, leise, broken by the allusion (all in harmony) to the peaceful starlight without! Then the sense of solitude, as she leans out of the window, while the breeze creeps through the pines! And the wonderful transition, when she hears his footsteps, to the rapturous and overwhelming strain of joy, alternating with a fond heart's fears, which closes one of the greatest scenes of modern romantic lyric drama! Surely she is the keeper of the true secret of that music. The end explained the beginning, which some one near us whispered he thought "tame!"

It was now Mr. BURKE's turn. "Variations on a theme of Schubert;" we feared the virtuoso-ridden and abused theme of the "Serenade;" but, to our sober joy, his violin began the deeply musical Lob der Thraenen, or "Praise of Tears," and right feelingly and exquisitely he praised them; but the first variation and the finale (after the approved solo-player's pattern) were too full of capers to bear any relation to such a theme; such variations (they were by David) are not even fantastic, they are simply bewitched by a mechanical uneasiness. Mr. Burke did full justice to his beautiful theme, and to whatever there was beautiful in the appended variations.

And now for our universal songstress in a specimen of the Italian school: the scena and aria from Beatrice di Tenda. The slow introduction, Ah! miei fedeli! was given with the full pathos and sweetness of Bellini; and in the bravura part, her voice absolutely revelled in flashing and, as it seemed, extempore intricacies and marvellous refinements of execution. We have marvelled at the matchless frolic of her art in this piece before; but this exceeded all before. O! Italian prime donne, with your everlasting conventional cadenzas and fioriture, painfully polished down to nothing, why is it that your ornaments sound never new, while her's sound never old! Your ornaments are lessons, but her's are spontaneous flashes of her soul,—delicate heat-lightnings of the warm midsummer night of inspiration. Once her voice ran, like an electric spark, through the chromatic scale; we have heard chromatic scales before; but here each note of it was brightly touched with a new and wholly individual character. Who now shall say that the singer, whose soul is informed with all the living inspirations of the German composers, is not thereby qualified to throw as much life and fervor into the test pieces of the Italian opera, as those who only know this last kind of music?

The second part was opened by Mr. GOLDSCHMIDT. The modest young pianist, whilome uniformly overshadowed and overlooked, was watched, this time, with a respectful, eager curiosity; for, to the careless world's eye, he had suddenly become a man. Why had that expansive forehead, that finely classic, thoughtful mouth, that whole face full of intellectual experience and sentiment, and whole form stamped with artistic, modest self-possession, escaped general notice until now? Real worth can bide its own time. Never before in an American concert, we can safely say, was Weber's noble Concert-Stueck (Concert-piece, or Concerto), so admirably, so perfectly played. With all the force required to suit the piano to so vast a place, there was not in it, from beginning to end, a single phrase or note in which the idea and spirit of the music were not made paramount, while the player and the instrument and the execution were unreservedly subordinated to that end. That was true Art; he felt the orchestra and the orchestra felt him, and they all felt (including the good artistic SCHARFENBERG, who turned over the pages for his friend), that here was a musical and spiritual meaning to be interpreted, through all their sympathetic co-operation, to the delight and edification of that great audience. It was warmly applauded and VON WEBER was glorified in the second, as he had been in the first part of the concert.

The duet from "The Huguenots" between Mme. GOLDSCHMIDT and Sig. BADIALI was nobly sustained in both hands. Her great dramatic energy and the unrivalled purity and volume of her voice here told remarkably; even in largeness, the soprano tones seemed equal to the baritone,—large as the sentiment they uttered, of a woman ready to die for him she loved.

Mr. EISFELD's "Concert Polonaise" was a spirited, refreshing orchestral piece. It moved on with a triumphant and intoxicating wealth of harmony, worthy to clothe the noble rhythmic outline of the Polonaise form, like a young Bacchus crushing red grapes with every step.

But now comes the climax, not of the violent dramatic excitement, but of the serene pure height of song. Was ever the disembodied, spiritual quintessence of melody passed through mortal ears into immortal souls, if it was not then in her delivery of the MOZART melody: Deh vieni, non tardar! Some of those long-drawn, heavenly receding tones were the most clarified and never-cloying sweet of sound. You drew it in, insatiably, as you would the exquisite smell of a rose pressed to the nostrils. The singer seemed to "expire into her song." This was simpler music, in one sense, than any previous piece; but into its transparent perfection all the blended resources of her art seemed to secrete themselves. The hearing of one such strain is the birth of a new ideal and a new faith in a man's head and heart.

After Sig. BADIALI's impassioned delivery of the Cavatina from Lucia, which was pertinaciously encored, the songstress closed with that song of the "Birdling," which she "yet must be singing;" and it seemed as fresh and delicious a necessity of her very nature, and as new, as if it had not been sung hundreds of times. The audience rose—satisfied,—a heartier testimony than the usual calls for more. For so vast an audience it was the most intelligent, most thoughtfully attentive we have seen, and gave the fullest proof that the great singer has converted all her critics. If further proof of that is wanted, read the notices of the Courier & Inquirer.

We remember when it was not an uncommon thing to hear JENNY LIND called a cold singer, one who lacked the fine Italian fervor and feeling in her music. We do not hear this now of Mme. GOLDSCHMIDT. We believe some people have become convinced through her that it is possible to have feeling and fervor even deeper than Verdi or Donizetti have known how to infuse into their music. What a teacher and inspirer of the deeper, holier feelings is such a voice as hers, wedded to such music as she loves! It is no idle fanaticism that studies not to lose a note of these farewell strains. It is only sad that it must end! We spoke with her yesterday about leaving America, and in less than an instant the tears filled her eyes, and she strove in words to tell that she felt much at leaving such a country. Perhaps it will not be violating confidence, to add that it is her wish to sing her "Farewell to America," as she did her "Greeting," in a song composed for the occasion by her husband, to verses written by a poet who has several times graced the columns of our Journal.

J. S. D.

P. S. We had the pleasure of taking OLE BULL by the hand this morning. He looks not much altered, and talks as eloquently and enthusiastically as he was wont to play. He gives a concert here on Saturday, with JAEEL and the GERMANIANS, and will, very likely, be in Boston in a week or two.

Prof. A. B. Marx, of Berlin.

We have seen a private letter from the learned and philosophical author of the Compositionslehre, or "Theory and Practice of Musical Composition," the first volume of which has been translated in New York and noticed in a recent number of our journal. He writes, under date of April 29th, to a German professor of music in one of our Southern cities, informing him that he has concluded a contract with Mr. Robert Cocks, of London, for the publication there of his entire work, in four volumes, in the English language. He asks his correspondent whether he deems it expedient to undertake a separate translation in and for America, but adds, in reply to his own question: "I think not; because the fourth edition of the Compositionslehre," (now preparing by the author),

"to which the London translation will adhere, contains such important improvements in respect of method, that a new translation of the third edition" (the latest one accessible to an American translator) "cannot agree with it."

Our music-teachers will be interested in the fact that Dr. Marx has another more practical work in contemplation, of which he thus writes: "As soon as I shall have finished and published the treatise on the 'Science of Music,' (which I hope will be in the summer) I shall proceed, at once, to work out my 'Method of Musical Instruction,' which—if I am not mistaken—will produce a radical reform of the present modes of teaching music. It is quite certain, that I shall issue this work (which includes all branches of musical instruction, namely, the piano, singing, composition, &c.) in German and in English at the same time. The success of this work in England and America, owing to the thoroughly practical tendency of those nations, may naturally be greater than in Germany; it may perhaps serve, in less time and with a deeper and surer basis, to further and complete the artistic culture in these lands, which by their healthy nature and their social conditions devote themselves to actual interests, and leave the ideal to the care of us poor Germans, who live and brood, by the grace of God, in an Aristophanic suspension, and have our homes like the cuckoos in the 'Clouds.'"

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

The work on the Music Hall goes on bravely. A whole army of laborers are at work; the walls have risen high above the ground, and already the skeleton forms of orchestra and balconies may be seen. The general plan of the building is now easily understood, with its various entrances and corridors. Standing in the centre one can already in imagination people the great space with familiar faces, while waiting with impatience the actual completion of the work.

Of the project for the new Theatre and Opera House we have, as yet, nothing definite to report, but hope soon to be able to present to our readers the welcome intelligence that the work is really begun with some sketches of the plan of the building and its proposed location. Meanwhile, the National Theatre, we hear, is about to be rebuilt on the old site.

As the new buildings rise, the workmen are engaged in removing the walls of the Boston Theatre, which has been perhaps, more familiarly known to the musical public under the name of the Odeon; very dear in the recollections of many lovers of music, as the place where we first heard and learned to know and love BEETHOVEN; as the scene of our initiation into the knowledge of the great works of the masters of instrumental music, where the nucleus of our own immense audiences of the lovers of instrumental music, was first gathered and instructed. It is pleasant to look back on those small beginnings, and we cannot see these walls coming to the ground without a passing word of farewell, nor move onward without a glance backwards at the pleasant recollections of a former time.

During the Summer season, we understand that the Germania Serenade Band, under their leader Mr. Schnapp, propose giving a series of afternoon promenade concerts in Union Hall. The evening out-door concerts of this little band in some of the neighboring towns last Summer, gave much pleasure to large numbers of people. Their selections of music are good and the excellence of their performance on brass instruments is well known to all concert goers in the city.

London.

THE ITALIAN OPERAS. The WAGNER war still rages, and an amusing column of advertisements of the rival houses appears in the London papers. "In place of report," says the Athenæum, "to reflect the spirit of the week, we should chronicle green-room gossip and Chancery argument. In our rival Opera-houses Law has been more listened for than Music since we wrote last." The parties are all in chancery. Instead of Casta Diva, we have Lumley's prayer for an injunction. Bills, answers and affidavits are studied instead of scores; hearings in chancery have taken the place of rehearsals, and arguments are listened to instead of Cavatinas. What may come of it we know not; "such business requires a great deal of thought, and chancery justice is so very difficult to follow." We leave them with the wards in Jarmyce—"expecting a judgment"—and wish them a safe deliverance.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. L'Italiana in Algeri was revived on the 13th of April for the debut of Mademoiselle Angri and the reentrée of Belletti. The Musical World (London) says:

"The class of opera to which L'Italiana in Algeri belongs is almost extinct. No composer of the present day attempts it, and it may safely be added that no composer of the present day, in attempting it, would be likely to succeed. For this there are substantial reasons. Singers are educated now in quite a different fashion from that which prevailed in the days of Cimarosa and Paisiello, and in the early time of Rossini. Verdi and his followers have killed the school, without substituting a better. What is chiefly demanded now in a singer is a powerful voice, and a certain amount of dramatic feeling, armed with which he at once launches into the sea of public life. The consequence is inevitable. The majority of singers are quite abroad in one of Rossini's early operas; they have neither the flexibility nor the style; either their voices are stiff and obstinate from want of the necessary training, or impaired, if not altogether destroyed, by "hallooing and singing," not of anthems, like Falstaff, but of Verdi's cavalinas and finales. We are much mistaken, however, if some day, the sort of Italian opera of which the one produced on Tuesday is so admirable an example be not restored, and the modern specimens, which have really no style whatever, altogether abandoned. Such a result would be well for all parties—for singers, who wish to preserve as long as possible the quality and freshness of their voices, more especially.

* * * * *

"Mademoiselle Angri (who experienced a flattering reception, and is a valuable acquisition to Mr. Lumley's company) is a dashing and spirited actress into the bargain. Her assumption of the part of Isabella was extremely animated, and her execution of the music in general admirable. We must blame her for introducing an air from Zelmira in the first act, since the original ('Cruda sorte') is quite as good and in much better keeping; but this was redeemed by the highly effective style in which she gave the recitative and air, 'Pensa alla patria.' (Act II.) Excepting an occasionally exaggerated manner of sliding up, as it were, to the high notes—a fault with which, though easy of correction, Mademoiselle Angri has been frequently reproached—her singing in this air left nothing to be desired. Her delivery of the recitative was large and imposing, and her flexibility in the rapid passages of the coda proved her an accomplished mistress of the florid bravura school. Without recapitulating the many other excellent points in Mademoiselle Angri's performance, we may at once pronounce her success to have been decided, and congratulate the theatre on the possession of a contralto of such eminent talent and means."

Of Belletti it speaks in terms of very high praise, and describes his reception as one of great warmth and frequency of applause.

CRUVELLI had also appeared in Norma, Il Barbiere and Fidelio. Her performance of the rôle of Norma has elicited the warmest commendation.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. Here GRISI had appeared in Norma and Valentine; we are obliged to defer a more extended notice of her appearance and that of Cruvelli, which lies somewhere perdu.

THE CONCERTS. The New Philharmonic Society, at its second concert gave a programme which presents a rather curious combination of the very latest and perhaps questionable novelties with the greatest acknowledged masterpieces. We find the C minor Symphony of Beethoven, for example, side by side with the Island of Calypso, an operatic masque by E. J. Loder. The overtures were Cherubini's to Anacreon and the Zauberflöte. Herr Reichart sang an aria of Gluck's, Nur einen Wunsch, from Iphigenie, and a Liebeslied with chorus by Gumbert. A chorus, Chant des Chérubins, by Bortniansky seems to have been considered a novelty worth producing. The composer was director of the Imperial Chapel at St. Petersburg, some twenty-five years ago, and we learn that Berlioz was much struck by the performances under his direction. A Concerto for piano forte and orchestra by H. Wylde, completes the programme. Of the performance of the Symphony the Musical World (London) says:

"M. Berlioz' reading of this extraordinary composition was the true German reading, his tempi were the true German tempi, his lights and shadows the true German lights and shadows—in other words those of Beethoven himself. We doubt, however, if Beethoven would have approved of the additions to the brass instruments, and more particularly to the doubling of the horn parts, which, in the second theme of the first movement, is equally unnecessary and obtrusive. We are aware it is the French custom, but all French customs are not necessarily good. These, however, are matters of taste. The applause that followed the symphony of Beethoven was of a description which left no room to doubt that the impression produced had been deep and genuine; it was perfectly deafening, and quite unanimous."

The performance of Loder's Island of Calypso is represented to have been "imperfect, ineffective, careless, and, at times, slovenly," though in its composition "unquestionably one of the ablest and most beautiful works that has ever proceeded from the pen of an English musician."

At the third Concert, the overtures were Mendelssohn's to the Isles of Fingal, Weber's Euryanthe, and Beethoven's Egmont. With the Berlioz symphony, Romeo and Juliet, the Athenæum seems by no means pleased, and prophesies that the interest felt in it will fall and not rise with every further performance of it. Berlioz, on the other hand, according to the News, received an overwhelming ovation, and "he has won the suffrages of our musical audiences by the magic influence of his genius. It has been a battle with professional prejudices intense intolerance, artistic ignorance and bigotry, but the victory has been for art, development and progress against the standstill purists and dogmatists."

"The charm of the evening," says the Athenæum, "was the performance of Madame PLEYEL in Weber's Concert-Stück. She is, beyond question, the queen of pianists, since, with all her power and skill, she is still feminine."

From the Chronicle, we learn that,

"Madame Pleyel's delicious nonchalant ease and superb confidence won the audience in the first half dozen bars, proving her vast power and wonderful brilliancy of fingering were in perfection. Weber's concerto is admirably adapted to exhibit the most finished pianist, and this performance satisfied the most exacting. The strength, vehemence, and coloring of the bolder portions were exquisitely relieved by the bell-like brilliancy of touch, and magical rapidity of execution in the high treble passages. Nothing more wonderful was ever achieved upon the piano forte."

Selections from Spontini's Vestale and Gluck's Armide complete this programme. The vocalists of the evening being Miss Dolby, Madame Clara Novello, Reichart and Staudigl.

THE QUARTET ASSOCIATION, composed of Messrs. Sainton, Cooper, Hill and Piatti, have introduced Cherubini to the English public as a Quartet composer, by the performance of his Quartet in E flat, in which we are told Cherubini is fresher, more vigorous and more enterprising than either Spohr or Onslow.

Elijah had been performed at the last of Mr. Hullah's Monthly Concerts and also by the Sacred Harmonic Society, and the Messiah in Exeter Hall for the Benefit of the Royal Society of Musicians.

There are multitudes of Chamber Concerts, Mdlle. SPEYER's, Mr. BEALE's and the Beethoven Quartet Society; the Royal Academy Concert and the Glee and Madrigal Union, but none of these present any features of note. Of the Amateur Society, the Athenæum says:

"This body seems to be fulfilling its mission steadily and honestly. Amateurs play—at its Concerts—not only orchestral music, but solos on the piano forte and violin in a style which bespeaks practice and understanding. Amateur Compositions are performed, at least as good as the last English professional music on which we reported."

HENRIETTA SONTAG, THE COUNTESS ROSSI. Various rumors respecting this lady's proposed visit to the United States are being industriously circulated throughout the country; various parties claim to be her agents, and to have made arrangements with the Countess and several eminent musicians who are to accompany her, in relation to "the spoils;" and various reasons are assigned for her coming; all of which—rumors, parties, agents and arrangements—are false and wholly unsubstantial. Our authority is no less a personage than Madame Sontag herself. In a recent letter to a gentleman in this city, in referring to her intended visit, and the reports concerning her engagement with this, that, and the other adventurer, she says:

"I am free yet. Mr. — has made several overtures to me, but I have not accepted them. I mean to come over to America next Fall, trusting to God, a few good friends, and the well-known generosity of the American people. I would not undertake such an enterprise were it not for the sake of my children, but for them I will undertake anything honorable, however arduous it may be."

Madame Sontag intends to embark for New York, in the latter part of August, and will arrive here early in September. — Musical World.

NEW & VALUABLE MUSIC BOOKS

RECENTLY PUBLISHED BY

OLIVER DITSON,....BOSTON.

SPHOR'S GRAND VIOLIN SCHOOL, being an exact reprint of the latest European editions, with all the author's new revisions and improvements. One volume, quarto. Price, $3.

* * * Among the many peculiar excellencies of this Violin School one is remarkable, that the Elementary Instructions do not precede the practical portion of the work as in other Schools, but are combined therewith; by this union the pupil is enabled to take the Violin in hand at the first lesson; in fact, he should and must then commence with it. The author's knowledge, as observable in his Preface, is no small addition to the truly practical distinctions of this School; his style is simple, clear, noble, and elegant, alike attractive and useful as a standard to the pupil as to the master.

CZERNY'S EXERCISES IN VELOCITY. (30 Etudes de la Vitesse), preceded by Nine New Introductory Exercises, and concluded by a New Study on Octaves, (composed expressly for this edition,) for the Piano Forte. From the Nineteenth London Edition, with Notes. By J. A. HAMILTON. In three Numbers. Price of each, 50 cents. Complete in one volume, $1.25.

* * * Calculated to develop and equalize the fingers, and to insure the utmost brilliancy and rapidity of execution.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION OF

THE SEMINARY CLASS BOOK OF MUSIC, designed for Seminaries, High Schools, Private Classes, etc., containing Elementary Instructions, Vocal Exercises, Solfege, and a copious selection of Secular and Sacred Songs, Duets and Trios. By E. L. WHITE and T. BISSELL.

* * * The above work has been before the public only one year, yet it has become a universal favorite, and is used in all parts of the Union. During the past year every inquiry has been made in order to ascertain in what way it could be improved and made fully equal to the wants of those for whom it is intended, and from suggestions thus obtained the publisher has been induced to add to and in other ways improve it. It is now pronounced to be exactly what is wanted, and as such it is offered to the public.

MUSICAL WORKS

RECENTLY PUBLISHED BY MASON & LAW,

23 Park Row, Opposite Astor House, N. York.

THE ACADEMY VOCALIST. A Collection of Vocal Music, arranged for the use of Seminaries, High Schools, Singing Classes, &c. By GEORGE F. ROOR, Professor of Music in Rutgers and Singler Institutes, the New York Institution for the Blind, &c. With a complete course of Elementary Instruction, Vocal Exercises, and Solfeggios, by LOWELL MASON.

This work is intended to supply a want long felt in our Higher Schools and Institutions. The music is arranged for three parts, and in such a manner that it may be sung exclusively by female voices or by a mixed choir. Whenever solos occur, a simple accompaniment for the Piano Forte or Melodeon has been added. The work is printed from new English type and on beautiful paper. Retail price, 62 1-2 cents.

ZUNDEL'S ORGAN BOOK. By JOHN ZUNDEL. Two Hundred and Fifty Easy Voluntaries and Interludes for the Organ, Melodeon, Seraphine, &c. With Introductory Remarks, Description of Stops, Directions for the Purchase of Organs, &c., adapting the work especially to the wants of young organists, and those who have made sufficient progress to accompany plain Psalmody on the Organ, Melodeon, or Seraphine. Retail price, $1.50.

THE GLEE HIVE. BOSTON ACADEMY OF MUSIC. A Collection of Glee and Part Songs, selected and arranged for the Musical Conventions and Teachers' Institutes of the Boston Academy of Music. By LOWELL MASON and GEORGE JAMES WEBB.

Here are Thirty-three choice, tasteful, and sprightly Glee and Part Songs, mostly new, from the best Authors, sold at an exceedingly low price. It is just the book wanted by Singing Clubs, Societies, Classes, and the Social Circle. Retail price, 38 cents.

WILDER'S SCHOOL MUSIC. A Collection of Thirty-six New and Beautiful Songs, arranged for Schools and Juvenile Classes. By L. WILDER, Teacher of Music in the Brooklyn Music Schools, &c.

This work has already been adopted in the Schools of Brooklyn, New York, &c. Retail price, 18 3-4 cents.

CANTICA LAUDIS: OR, THE AMERICAN BOOK OF CHURCH MUSIC. By LOWELL MASON, Professor in the Boston Academy of Music, Editor of the Boston Handel and Haydn Society's Collection, Carmina Sacra, and other of the most popular Music Books in the country; and GEORGE JAMES WEBB, Professor in the Boston Academy of Music, and Editor of many valuable Musical Works.

The increased satisfaction with which it was received, and the unprecedented success of this book, MASON AND WEBB'S LATEST WORK, as well as the warm commendations it has received from the Musical Profession generally, establish it as the best and most attractive collection of Church Music which even these celebrated authors have ever produced. It contains a greater amount, as well as variety, of truly beautiful new tunes, anthems, chants, and other pieces, than any similar work; besides a copious collection of the standard old tunes. The Elements of Vocal Music have been newly and most carefully prepared, and to adapt it more particularly to CHORUS and SINGING SCHOOLS, about Two Hundred Solfeggio Exercises and Progressive Lessons have been added. In addition to numerous testimonials from the press, it having been pronounced the "MOST VALUABLE BOOK OF CHURCH MUSIC EVER ISSUED," it has received from every section of the country the unqualified approbation of more than ONE HUNDRED PROFESSORS AND TEACHERS OF MUSIC. Retail price, 88 cents.

JUST PUBLISHED,

MARX'S MUSICAL COMPOSITION. The Theory and Practice of Musical Composition. By ADOLPH HERNARD MARX, Doctor of Music, &c. Translated from the third German Edition, and edited by HEARMANN S. SARONI.

A. B. MARX holds such high rank in Germany as a writer upon the subject of Musical Composition, that any recommendation of his great work to those who are at all acquainted with the musical literature of the land which is emphatically the home of music, would be superfluous. It is without a rival as a treatise upon this subject, thoroughly scientific and yet adapted to popular comprehension.

The present translation is beautifully printed in 406 octavo pages, and bound in English cloth. Retail price, $2.50.

NEW HYMN AND TUNE BOOK.

TEMPLE MELODIES. A Collection of nearly all the Standard and Popular Tunes, in connection with Five Hundred Favorite Hymns; arranged as a Hymn and Tune Book for Vestries, Social Meetings, Congregational and Family Worship, &c. By DAVID E. JONES.

This work has already been introduced, and is used with great satisfaction and profit in the vestries of many Churches and in the Congregations of some, while the publishers have received numerous recommendations from Clergymen and others. Those who love the old tunes, and who deem it a desirable object that as many as possible should unite in the singing, especially at social meetings, will find this exactly the book wanted.

* Two Editions of the Work are published—an OCTAVO EDITION, price One Dollar; a DECIMO EDITION, price Seventy-five Cents. Both Editions are the same as regards contents, PAGE FOR PAGE, and vary only in the size of type. A liberal discount will be made when ordered by the quantity for Churches, Vestries, &c.

FREDERIC CHOPIN.

BY FRANZ LISZT.

VI.

On such evenings, CHOPIN's chamber was lighted only by a few lights, which stood about his Pleyel flügel (grand piano). He was particularly partial to the instruments of this manufactory on account of their somewhat veiled, silvery tone and their easy touch, which enabled him to woo forth tones, that might be compared to the sounds of the glass-harmonica.

Around the flügel you saw a group of listeners, who bore the most distinguished names. HEINE listened, with the sympathy of a countryman, to Chopin's legends out of the mysterious land, in which too his ethereal fancy was at home. Chopin and he understood each other in every half word, in every half tone, and the musician answered to every gentle question of the poet. Near Heine sat MEYERBEER, and this master of Cyclopean tone-architecture loved to spend an hour in following, with evident satisfaction, the windings of the arabesques, which clothed the thoughts of Chopin as with a transparent veil of lace.

Farther along, sat ADOLPH NOURIT, that noble, at once passionate and ascetic artist, a strict Catholic, who in the later years of his life renounced all participation in productions of a superficial sort and, with chaste and enthusiastic reverence, served Art alone. A melancholy passion for the Beautiful undermined his existence, and already there seemed to paint itself upon his brow, that sombre shadow, which the outburst of despair always reveals to men too late, to men, who are so eager, and yet so unfit to solve the mysteries of the heart.

HILLER too was there: his spirit and his musical talent were kindred to those of Chopin, and he was one of his most faithful friends. We often assembled at his house, and while he was preparing the great works, which he afterwards put forth, he wrote piano pieces, of which the Etudes remind us as powerful sketches, in perfect drawing, of those studies of trees, in which the landscape-painters, as it were extempore, conjure up a complete little poem of light and shadow through a single tree, a single branch.

EUGENE DELACROIX sat buried in silence before the apparitions, which twittered through the air in tones. He asked himself inaudibly, what palette, what pencil, what canvass he would have to take, to lend them life in his art?

The one among us all, who seemed to be the nearest to the grave, the old NIEMCEWICZ, listened to the "Songs of History," which Chopin translated for him, who had outlived times now no more, into dramatic scenes, when, to the texts of the Polish bard, the rustle of weapons, the song of the victors, the festal hymn, the lament of the imprisoned, the ballad upon the fallen heroes, resounded under his fingers.

Apart by himself, sombre, and silent, stood MICKIEWICZ: in the features of the northern Dante it stood written, that this feeling never left him: "The salt of the stranger is bitter, and hard is the ascent of his door-steps!"

Sunk in the cushion of a sofa, sate GEORGE SAND, intently listening and gracefully enchained. She spread over this music all the glowing reflection of her genius, which possessed the rare peculiarity, only reserved to the few elect, of recognising the Beautiful under all forms of Art and Nature; that magical look, before which, in highly gifted ladies, the rind, the mask, the coarser hull falls away, so that they see the soul, that is therein enchanted, in its invisible essence, the Ideal, which the artist has imprisoned in the stream of tones or the veil of colors, in the undulations of marble, the architectural lines of stone, or in the rhythm of verse. The highest manifestation of this sense is the correctness of the impression and the certainty of the judgment. To the happy natures, which it luminously pervades, it will make superfluous the heavy burden of the science of Art, under whose pressure one makes a painful pilgrimage to the consecrated regions, which they reach at a bound; and this sense develops itself far less through search into the mysteries of science, than through intimate communion with Nature.

Even so deep a look did it require, to recognize and to appreciate Chopin's character,—a character, whose folds concealed no movement, no impulse, not dictated by the tenderest feeling of reverence and the noblest understanding of the affections of the soul. And yet never was a nature more formed, to justify perversions and strange aberrations, for his fantasy was full of fire, his feeling excitable to violence, and his bodily condition weak and sickly. Who could fathom the sufferings, which this antagonism must have produced? But he never laid them open to the gaze of others, he preserved their mystery under the impenetrable cheerfulness of a proud self-control.

His life was simple; neither adventure, nor implications, nor episodes are to be found in it. What he received and felt, what made an impression on his inner being, that was his events, to him more weighty and significant, than the changes and events out in the world. The lessons, which he continually gave, with punctuality and assiduity, were in a manner his daily work, which he performed with conscientiousness and cheerfulness. This, once done, he poured his soul out in his compositions, as other men pour it out in prayer to God. He has involved himself in no transaction, in no drama, he has knitted no tie and loosed none. He has exercised a decided influence upon no being. His will has never interfered with another's wishes, he has oppressed no spirit through the domination of his own. He has tyrannized over no heart, and laid no invader's hand upon another's fate; he sought nothing and would have scorned to beg for anything. On the other hand, he withdrew himself from all chains, all friendly connections, which might carry him away and draw him into more bustling circles. Ready to give away all, he did not give away himself. Perhaps he thought, like many proud hearts, that love and friendship are nothing, if they are not all! Perhaps—but whether it was so or was not, no one precisely knew, for he never spake of love and friendship; his most intimate friends did not press into the sanctuary, where his soul dwelt, when it withdrew itself entirely from the rest of his life.

In his conversation he appeared to interest himself only for that, which concerned others and avoided drawing them out of the circle of their personality to bring them to his own. His individuality did not challenge watchful curiosity; he pleased one too much, to allow such thoughts to occur to him. The whole of his personal character was harmonious and appeared to need no commentary. His blue eye was more spiritual than dreamy; his fine and mild smile never became bitter. The fineness and transparency of his complexion misled the eye, his blond hair was soft as silk, his nose slightly curved; his bearing and demeanor were so aristocratic, that one treated him, involuntarily, as a prince. His movements were graceful and curious, the tone of his voice always moderate, and often subdued, his form small, his organization gentle. His whole appearance reminded you of the plant convolvulus, which, on an incredibly slender stem, rocks to and fro its superbly colored calices, which have, however, such an airy texture, that the least touch tears it in pieces.

In company he showed the equal disposition, which no discomfort troubles, since it claims no interest for itself. Commonly he was cheerful; his caustic understanding easily discovered the ludicrous, even where it lay not on the surface. In the play of his features he developed, for a long time, an inexhaustible humor and often amused himself in comically improvised representation with imitating the musical formulas and the peculiar tic of many virtuosos, their movements and indeed their countenances, and that with a talent, which, in a minute, brought their whole personality before you. But, even in moments of the brightest humor he knew how, with the finest tact, to preserve the limits of decorum.

Although seldom, yet there were moments, when we surprised him deeply moved. Then we saw him become pale and white as a corpse. But even in this deepest emotion he remained collected. Then, as always, he was sparing of words about what he felt, and a minute's composure withdrew from us the secret of his inner life. He knew how, in a noble manner, to forgive, and cherished no grudge in his heart against those, who had injured him, although such wounds sank deeply into his soul and there gnawed on, in secret, after their peculiar occasion had long since vanished from his memory.

Generally reserved in his conversation, he was completely so, in all, to which any fanaticism of opinion, political or religious, attaches. Only through what he did or left undone in the narrow circle of his activity, could one judge him in this relation. His love for his country revealed itself in the direction, which his talent took, in the choice of his friendly intercourse, in the distinguished increase of scholars, in the frequent and very important services which he rendered to his countrymen; but we do not remember that he ever allowed himself to express his feelings in this connection. If he occasionally fell into conversation about political ideas, which are so warmly agitated in France, he made it his point rather to criticize them, than to advocate views of his own. Being in relations with some political celebrities of our time, he knew how to limit this relation, independently of all political agreement of opinion, to simple personal friendships.

Democracy was in his eyes an accumulation of too heterogeneous, unstable, wild and violent elements, to win his sympathy. Some twenty years ago came up the social questions and their threatening ascendancy was likened to a new inroad of barbarism. Chopin was painfully affected by what there was terrible in this comparison: he despaired of looking for the sparing of Rome from those modern Attilas, and of rescuing Art, its monuments, its customs, the entire Civilization, that elegant life of refined leisure, of which Horace sang, from their destructiveness. Moreover, he followed events from afar and a shrewdness, which one could scarcely have suspected in him, often enabled him to prophecy what better informed persons had not anticipated. Yet, when observations of this sort escaped his lips, he did not develop them, and his chance expressions first excited attention when the result had confirmed them.

Chopin was sincerely religious and attached to Catholicism; but he talked about religion even less than about politics, and he kept his faith to himself without ever making a profession of it. Consistently with all this, in his practical life he followed the maxim of a most highly distinguished man, the Marquis Jules de Noailles, who, in his old age, often said to us young men, when we disputed about opinions: "You will some day become convinced, as well as I, that it is utterly impossible to talk with every body about every thing."

How often from the steep
Of echoing hill, or thicket, we have heard
Celestial voices, to the midnight air
Alone, or responsive to each other's notes,
Singing their great Creator! Oft, in bands,
While they keep watch, or nightly rounding walk,
With glorious touch of instrumental sounds,
In full harmonic numbers joined, their songs
Divide the night and lift our thoughts to heaven!

MILTON.

Music in the past Half Century.

An Address delivered before the Harvard Musical Association, at Cochituate Hall, Boston, Dec. 22, 1851.

BY SAMUEL JENNISON, JR.

Gentlemen of the Harvard Musical Association:

At this late season, so near the expiration of the year, we shall not have forgotten that which, at its opening, was, on every hand, brought to our notice—that we were standing upon the threshold of a new half century; we have not yet ceased to affix to our journals and our epistles a date whose figures indicate the commencement, according to the common acceptance of mankind, of another long and important division of time; while a crowd of memorable musical events occurring in our own city within a few years past, some, almost within a twelve month, as, for example, the advent of pure Italian Opera; the institution, under your own auspices, upon a scale, at first so humble, and before audiences then so inconsiderable, of the public performance of the elegant Trio and Quartett at your Chamber Concerts, now become, in the hands of others not unworthy, a standard entertainment; the establishment of an association for the cultivation of instrumental music, whose weekly rehearsals are thronged with the ever increasing numbers of the admirers of classical composition; the frequent arrival upon our shores of bands of skilful performers upon all manner of instruments, helping to swell and almost wholly constituting our orchestras; with the occasional visit of some of those more distinguished artists from the Old World, who find here a New to conquer and carry captive; the not infrequent departure abroad of those personally known to us, in quest of a musical training not here to be obtained, whose names, it may be, are yet destined to distinction, and of whom already one prima donna and, at least, one pianist have risen to no small eminence; the so recent production, by one of your own number, of original and elaborate symphonies, and later still, the introduction of musical theses in the list of subjects at Exhibitions in our University; add to which, the commenced erection of an edifice which shall indeed be a Temple worthy of dedication to such an Art; worthy even of her whose thrilling notes, as when there first heard, shall forever haunt that other Temple which stands hard by:—a project, let me add, to which, long floating indistinctly before our minds, you may take a just pride in having first imparted a definite form and character, since only by that energetic action taken on the night of your last Anniversary, and by the unremitting zeal with which it was prosecuted by your Committee, could the enterprise have ever been crowned with success;—all these have tended to keep us perpetually reminded that here, at least, we have beheld breaking the dawn of a new musical era. And while others had been engaged in recording the changes, the signs of progress or decline, which were visible in the systems and establishments of the political, the scientific, or philanthropic world, it seemed not unfit, at such a time and before such an Association to attempt an examination into the comparative condition of our cherished Art, during the period now past; a subject not likely to have, and which accordingly was not found to have, attracted the attention of general writers, and yet an art, which, in the language of M. Fétis, has "radically varied more than twenty times in its constitution and in its effects, and been subjected to such a number of accessory transformations besides, as seem to have made of it wholly different arts;" and of which M. Forkel observes "that every period of ten years introduces some forms or turns of melody peculiar to itself, and which generally grow out of date before that period expires." And, gentlemen, throughout the course of preparation for this service, which, when I look over the catalogue of your members, I am fully sensible was awarded me rather in return for the original suggestion, I have been at every step, as the field of research expanded before me, persuaded that the brief hour usually allotted to a public address must necessarily be wholly insufficient for the due investigation of a subject so fertile, demanding a treatment at once historical, critical, philosophical.

It has appeared to me that the man most competent to discourse upon a subject like this, is he whose life is equal to these years past; whose days have been spent in some of those great capitals where this art is best known and most highly honored. And how could one dignify from himself the lack here of those opportunities for hearing and for study so essential to a truly intimate and thorough acquaintance with the subject proposed? For where have we lived? In no Paris, centre of civilization, "Mother of the Arts!" where, at this hour, might be collected together, in groups like those whose representations adorn your music rooms, a MEYERBEER, an HALEVY, an ADAM, an

AUBER, a BERLIOZ: in no Vienna, where, little more than a half-century ago, might have been seated beneath the same roof, HAYDN, GLUCK, PAISIELLO, SALIERI, RIGHINI, ANFOSSI, listening to the first public performance of an opera composed and conducted by MOZART! In no London, where in the time honored Abbey, slumber, side by side, HANDEL and PURCELL; where BRAHAM, like whom, as once the saying ran, was no tenor in Italy, still survives, spanning the half-century with his brilliant life of song; in no Milan, where a theatre, with whose plaudits the world's walls have rung, stands erected over the site of the Church of our Lady of the Ladder; in short in none of those European metropolises which Architecture, Painting, Music have for centuries, enriched, illustrated, glorified. We have no memories of a Catalani, a Farinelli, a Mara; we listen to no voices of a Lablache, a Mario, a Grisi, a Sontag; these visits of a Jenny Lind are but angel visits still, for their rarity as for their sweetness; we recount no prizes gained, no fames won, no splendid débuts of a La Scala or San Carlo; we have no world-renowned masters from a world-renowned Thomas School or Conservatoire; we can point to no PALESTRINA, no BACH, no PERGOLESI, no GLUCK, no WEBER, none, absolutely none, of their unfading lustre, born, living, and dying a citizen among us: only faintly, as yet, have we heard the echoes of master pieces that enchant the world; a thousand great productions yet unknown, almost unheard of in this remote, this new world of the West. And yet, praised be Heaven for those characters which communicate from mind to mind the ravishing strain as well as the breathing thought and burning word,

Though inland far we be,
Our souls have sight of that immortal sea, from whose mysterious depths have sprung such creations as the Oratorio of a HANDEL, the Opera of a MOZART, the Symphony of a BEETHOVEN. And, amid these glimpses, we pause to lament that the Spirit of Art has never been domesticated with us: that, amid the perils and privations which beset the path of our Fathers, on this night, of all others, ever present to our thoughts, side by side with those austere virtues which have rendered their names names of might, there could not have been sown the seeds of the Beautiful also with the Good; and, like the Miltons and Shakespeares, whose words dwell in our memories, and linger upon our lips, the Poets of Music, the Makers, able, at times I am tempted to say, to appeal with even ten-fold and hundred-fold power to the human heart beyond those, should not have been earlier recognized as worthy to be admitted to a place among our household gods, and to have their names also rendered familiar as household words.

And yet, gentlemen, notwithstanding the ever pressing sense of disadvantages, which might well make one distrust the correctness of any conclusions here arrived at, while they render certain the incompleteness of the performance, disadvantages which, I speak it with sincerity, have made me feel it not a little presumptuous in me to have attempted this task, permit me to add, that no moments stolen from ordinary occupations could have been spent upon a labor more congenial than that which your invitation has induced me to undertake; the preparation of the report I propose to present to you, rather than the oration to deliver.

He who investigates the history of music, cannot fail to be struck with the fact that it is, or at least has hitherto been, an eminently progressive art, and that its greatest developments have been of comparatively very recent date. That which we now denominate music is the result of the successive labors of several generations. Sculpture and Painting may well have existed in a high degree of perfection in the earliest days of civilization: since they hold communion mainly with the outward and visible forms of nature. The beautiful model existed in life or idea a thousand or two thousand years ago, as well as now. Therefore the Laocoon group, the Apollo, may well have been perfect in the days of ancient Greece; but the Symphony of a HAYDN could not have seen the light, until, in the fulness of time, the development of the science of harmony, of the capacity of instruments, of the skill of performers, had prepared the way for a HAYDN: and no argument could convince us that ancient Athens could have listened, in her agora, her streets, her groves, her Odeon, to such strains of power as swell upon our ears in our own.

Sufficient, however, has been to each generation and to each people its own music, however rude the same may be deemed by us. Every individual becomes conscious, from time to time, of progress made in the capacity to appreciate music. Do we not perhaps each remember a time when the various means which science employs to give a zest to the combinations of harmony, when suspensions, syncopations, and unresolved dissonances were an abomination, were what the Italians were wont to call scelerata, — accursed — to the, as yet, uncultivated ear?

As the individual, so the world has passed through many rude, unfashioned days: and the history of Music, while it abounds with examples of wholly or partially barbarous practices and modes of composition and execution in which men have at some time found satisfaction and taken delight, is not deficient in anecdotes corroborating the suggestions of each one's experience, that, to the untrained ear, the sweetest harmony whose touches now (to reverse the exquisite words of Lorenzo) become soft stillness and the night, may be intolerable jargon.

The terror and affright with which the fierce Algerine recoiled when he beheld pointed at him the awful bell of a huge bass horn in the hands of the French musician whom he was on the point of running through with his lance, may serve to symbolize, though somewhat extravagantly, the shudder and dislike (and it is a curious psychological fact) which the Arab is said to have experienced upon listening to the rich and copious harmonies of one of the French regimental bands which accompanied Napoleon's expedition into Egypt.

Let us, in a very brief sketch, take notice of the following facts:

Until five hundred years ago, no compositions for four parts had ever appeared. Counterpoint did not exist. The makers of melody, the trouvères, or finders, were a distinct class from the harmonists. The barbarism of successive fifths was of frequent occurrence.

In another century, counterpoint having arisen, harmony has made surprising progress. In that period was invented the canon, the first form of the round and fugue; and rests were first introduced, particularly in the Tenor, which was so called from its holding, or sustaining, the melody; the female, or soprano voice being then, as you are aware, wholly unknown.

The invention of printing music with movable types did not occur until the beginning of the succeeding, the sixteenth century. In this period arose those celebrated discussions and controversies concerning the fundamental principles of music. Disputes ran high about the diatonic division of the scale, and the mathematical relations of sounds were widely explored. "Every mathematician," says M. Fétis, "thought himself born to be a musician." The happy result of all this was the discovery by ZARLINO of temperament, the proper method of tuning the clavichord. Towards the close of that century, music was written to be sung by as many even as nine choirs at once. In the meantime, melody was lost sight of. No attention was paid to the sense of words; everything was written in fugue; and the absurdity and pedantry which prevailed in the scholastic disputations, was scarcely less conspicuous in the composer's counterpoint.

Between 1550 and 1600, instruments were first introduced into the church to play the part sung by the voice. Just before the close of that century, in 1594, occurred that memorable event which infused into music a new life, when was brought upon the stage, the precursor of the long line of musical drama, "The Death of Eurydice!"

About this period, too, creeps in the "audacious innovation," as it was esteemed, "of the use of the sensible note," so called. MONTEVERDE dares to place together the fourth, fifth, and seventh; a collocation, which leads the mind to the ensuing chord, and which at once gave rise to genuine and regular modulation. The distinction between the major and minor modes was then also marked out.

Arriving at the commencement of the seventeenth century, we find music beginning to acquire more lightness and buoyancy, and new combinations and varieties of measure produced. Then it was that the Neapolitan school became celebrated under LEO, DURANTE, PORFORA, SCARLATTI, by whom and their successors were originated nearly all the ordinary forms of music; airs with variations, rondeaux, the aria with chorus, scenas, trios, quartettes and finales. It was not until this so late period that thorough or continued bass, signifying a bass running throughout the music, began to be used, becoming the peculiar labor of the organist's left hand. At this period, we should not omit to mention, were produced those difficult organ compositions, which, even now, challenge the skill of the most expert performers upon that instrument. Down to this period, the gamut, notwithstanding MONTEVERDE's discovery, was still limited to six notes. No writer treated of the gamut of seven notes until one LAMBERT in 1680.

At the close of the seventeenth, and beginning of the eighteenth centuries, oratorios had begun to acquire importance: and about the same time, GASPARI, the predecessor of SCARLATTI, CORDICELLI, and CLEMENTI, first formed the principles of fingering the harpsichord.

Towards the middle of the last century, the Trio and Quartett have received great improvement, and the Symphony takes its origin: at first composed for four violin parts, viola and bass; afterwards extended to admit the wind instruments, and now brought to the highest perfection by the successive labors of MARTINI, HAYDN, MOZART, and BEETHOVEN, who are thought by some to have occupied the ground so completely, as to render it not merely hazardous, but presumptuous, for any to attempt to follow them into this, their peculiar territory; a criticism, however, of which, vast as their works are, another fifty years may perhaps have developed the mistake.

Only a hundred years have elapsed, since, in France, a hitherto unregarded country, the Italian composers, LEO and DURANTE, found admirers. The struggle of their successor LULLI, with the old French composer RAMEAU, which ended in the Italian being compelled to quit the field, was followed by the entire reform of the Grand Opera by GLUCK: the history of whose yet more violent struggles for superiority with PICCINI forms one of the most curious chapters in the annals of the Art.

M. Fétis concludes the sketch of the past condition of music, prefacing the first volume of his Musical Biography, published in 1830, and from which we have derived most of the foregoing facts, with an allusion to the immense number of methods for all kinds of instruments, musical biographies, bibliographies, journals, critical reviews, pamphlets, &c., forming, as he says, a repertory of musical literature so extensive, that there exists none like it for any other art or science whatever; to which we may add that the contributions of the learned author himself have been among the most unceasing and valuable; and that the number, then so large, has increased, in probably accelerated ratio, since the time when he penned those concluding lines.

The remark may strike with surprise many of those accustomed to revel in the luxurious strains of the present day, the frequenters of the Concert-room, the admirers of the modern Opera, that, critically speaking, while composers have multiplied, while instruments of music have increased in capacity, and performers in skill, while the art, in its details, has progressed with such rapidity, and its resources have been carried to so unlimited extent, while one, at least, of its great forms, the Symphony, has sprung up almost within the memory of living men, Music has been thought, in its tone and character, to have experienced, since the day of HANDEL, a decline. And, difficult as it may be at first to admit this conclusion, yet if we will endeavor to abstract the modern music from the associations that cluster about it, and present it, distinct and isolated, before our minds, we may find ourselves led to concur in an opinion which older and sager judges, with great confidence, express.

In the literary world we have not infrequently heard it asked, where are now the profoundness of learning, the concentration of thought, the fulness of meaning, the energy and vigor, the breadth and grandeur, which were manifest in the pages of the old writers; which have made us so often feel that a few paragraphs of some of those we might name, were more suggestive than a volume of many a modern author?

May we not observe that something, in like manner, has faded from music? Has she not, also, in shaking off old conventionalisms and pedantries, become divested of some of her pristine energy and vitality? Does not the sentiment occasionally force itself upon us, that there is a degree of compactness and solidity in the music of the past, sought generally in vain in that of the present time; just as many an old mansion, with a century of storm and wind upon its head, appears to give promise of longer duration than the frailer and more hurried erections of the day.

But I cannot illustrate this better than by giving the results of the observation of Dr. Crotch, who, in his Lectures, divides music into three different styles,—the Sublime, the Beautiful, and the Ornamental; each of the first two being of a higher order than that which succeeds it. The era of the first was peculiarly that of BACH and HANDEL; the second is represented by HAYDN and MOZART; the third, by ROSSINI and his successors. These various styles, traceable, through more or less intermixture, along the century past, he compares to the different phases of the Dramatic Art, as they arose in Greece: first was Tragedy, then came Comedy, which finally degenerated to Farce; or, to the Orders of Architecture,—the Doric, the Ionic, and the Corinthian: and he calls attention to the fact that the superabundance of ornament, the delicate tracery, &c., were the sure indication of decline in the architectural Art.

The philosophy of this decline we cannot stop to examine at all minutely. The circumstances of our time require, more than ever before, that every one should become cosmopolite; that he should devote a portion of his attention to many things rather than confine his study, as in former days, exclusively to one, or a few. Hence, generally, a less deep devotion to the labor of study; hence, greater superficiality.

The facility of intercommunication between countries, has, it may be, tended to enervate music from the much wider infusion, than ever before, of a sort of Parisian gaiety, fashion, luxury, which have tinged the morals and manners of all nations. Music cannot but undergo a transformation of some sort, when city and country become blended, when France penetrates into the remote recesses of Europe; when Russian, Hungarian, Polander, Italian, take up their abode in strange capitals: just as it happened in the Twelfth century, when the Crusaders, returning from the East, with the grouped notes, trills, appoggiaturas, and graces of the countries they had left, brought about one of the most remarkable epochs in the annals of European music.

A further cause of the growth of the modern character of music may perhaps be found in the history during the early part of the century, of that portion of Europe, where Art had its home. In WEBER'S "Life of a Composer," one of two personages engaged in conversation thus addresses the other:

"The epoch in which we live, fruitful in excitement, has subjected us to the two rigid task-masters, death or pleasure. Overwhelmed by the horrors of war, and rendered familiar with every species of misery, men have betaken themselves to the more coarse and exciting pleasures of art, as means of relief against the pressure of evil. The theatre has been made a raree show; the restless mind, impatient of the calm and quiet enjoyment which the master-pieces of art afford, seeks relief and excitement in splendid scenery, broad humor, melodies calculated to tickle the ear, harmonies of the most stormy kind. We become accustomed in daily life to the strong and stimulating."

Thus it seems not improbable that the taste of a people might have become vitiated, and nations have striven to forget their woes and their defeats in the exciting and brilliant, as an individual might seek to drown his sorrows in the bowl. It might be curious to learn how far those stormy times had an influence in fashioning the genius of BEETHOVEN, as they did in giving direction to that of JEAN PAUL, between whose great spirits, notwithstanding the denial of M. SCHINDLER, there has always seemed to me to exist an unusual resemblance. The dreams of battle fields, and Visions of Annihilation, with their infinite horrors and pathos of the one, and the Heroic Symphony, with its mournful Funeral March, of the other, were, confessedly, alike the result of Napoleon's living on earth.

But whatever the cause, the fact is one which has attracted attention; and one which, without finding it necessary to indulge in any undue lamentation, while what has been still lives with us, we may be forced to admit. With the decay of the sentiment of reverence every where forced upon our notice, the solemn, the severe, the serious, have lost their prestige. The time demands celerity, brilliancy; it is impatient of all that, requiring thought and study, would retard its hasty march; and it has become a question of grave import whether men will return to imitate very largely the examples which former ages have set them; whether the world will hereafter rear up scholars so erudite, thinkers so profound, musicians so thorough, as some that have been and gone; whether a FARINELLI can ever again be fanned to toil on, for nine long years, in the continuous practice of nothing but the vocal scale, with so unshaken confidence in the teachings of an old PORPORA.

THE ORCHESTRA.

FROM THE GERMAN.

The world is but a huge Orchestra,
And we therein musicians be,
And she who stirs our human feelings,
Is our sweet sister, Harmony.
The great men, standing high above us,
Shall the Conductor's part fulfill,
While we, poor devils, scrape and fiddle
As best we can, some well, some ill.

The poor man's Tempo is Andante,
Allegro suits the rich man well,
And in the great man's Maestoso,
Our piping notes the music swell.
But many a one doth vainly fiddle;
Nor clear, nor tunelessly plays he,
And therefore must for life, contented,
An humble bellows-blower be.

The dread, or dislike, which some of the Reformers had of instrumental music is nicely hit off by Burney, in an anecdote which he gives of the visit of Sir Joseph Banks and Dr. Solander to Iceland in 1773. A musical instrument, somewhat similar to a violin, called a longspier and played upon with a bow was presented to them. It was a long time before they could find a person wicked enough to play upon it before them—the Icelanders had learned psalmody and the hate of instruments from the Reformers. But at length a man was found, who, after being fortified by a few glasses of gin, ventured, in secret, to play a psalm tune!—Bird's Gleanings from the History of Music.

[Editorial Correspondence.]

NEW YORK, Saturday, May 22.

MADAME OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT's last concert but one took place last evening. Metropolitan Hall was as crowded as before, and there now reigned (inside at least) the real, deep satisfaction of music, glorified in such delivery, in place of the much dissatisfaction resulting from the eager rush for tickets, whereby multitudes became the prey of speculators. No one less anticipated, or more regretted this, than Mr. and Madame Goldschmidt, and Mr. G., as if his artist cares in the matter were not enough for one man, has resolved to superintend in person, this morning, the sale of tickets for the farewell concert, and use all possible precautions to prevent individuals from buying up large numbers. Of course, such being the demand and such the press of time, these good efforts will be only partially availing.

This concert was distinguished by its number of new pieces. The star of the hour first revealed itself in the purest height of its heaven; it was as when, watching the sky while day mellowed into evening, we discern the first star so serenely, boldly shining almost at the zenith. It was in that lofty, lovely air in Mendelssohn's "Elijah": Hear ye, Israel, that the first vibrations of that spiritual voice came out over the multitudinous sea of listeners. Hear ye! Was it not as if the tones of some sister and beloved of mankind, full of heavenly assurance, pleaded with us, reminding us of pure heights of harmony and peace and God above all this selfish din and discord? We know not when her voice has ever been to us more perfect; it seems as if the infallibility of those upper notes of hers were but an outward correspondence of her soul's sure reliance in all high endeavor; — the higher, the surer. Yes! and we have heard her say, "the little troubles are the only real discouragements in this life." Like many a great soul, she finds in these, her cross. From the sweet, sisterly pleading of this first little, truly Mendelssohnian, melody, which seems to proceed out of the remotest inmost centre of sweet, calm life, (we hardly know whether from without or within us), her transition to the recitative: Thus saith the Lord, was most impressively distinct and noble; it seemed as if it must have re-assured and re-vitalized a whole nation in slavery, to have heard the sublime energy of the communication: "I, I am he that comforteth; be not afraid," &c.; we never listened to such prophet-like, or rather angel-like delivery; we thought of the most religious climaxes of the patriotic Hungarian orator, sublimated into pure music, into the universal speech, the medium of purely universal and eternal interests. Possibly this was but a passing pleasure with the frivolous and self-satisfied; but what earnest soul — and all such are sufferers — did not feel stronger last night after listening to those strains of musical eloquence — for it was something more and different from song!

What can we say of her Ah! non giunge, but that it was the same graceful, gushing, sparkling, exhaustless fountain of joy and rapture, that her voice always makes of it? Each listener caught his part of the profuse sprinkling of sunshiny melody, and every face was radiant, as every heart was happy. There was no resisting such a demand as broke forth for a repetition, and (as formerly) she bounded forward and alit, like a bird on a swinging spray, upon the same long trill, without instruments, which formed her only re-introduction to the first strain of the melody.

There was great curiosity, of course, to hear her, for the first time, sing Mozart's bewitching Batti, batti. She gave it with perhaps less archness than Bosio, nor did she attempt, being alone, to act it out. But, not the less perfectly for all that, did she give voice to all that Mozart meant by its delicious and insinuating melody. It did not appeal to the superficial applausive faculties, and did not "bring the house down" very tremendously, but sank, never to be forgotten, into the luxurious quiet of the soul. We do not believe that we shall find ourselves disenchanted of Bosio's Zerlina, though this Zerlina even pleaded far more musically and more Mozart-like.

Meyerbeer's "Gypsy Song," the most simply brilliant of all her songs — even now it hummt, und schwirrt, und singt, und klingt in every bewitched fibre of our memory — was more brilliant and more irresistible than ever. The voice leaped and revelled, like a "chartered libertine," throughout the exhilarating atmosphere of the whole realm of tone, and, as if by the sudden prompting of a full and (if it could be said of her) unwonted sense of power, it rose at the end, like a strong, full-volumed jet-d'eau, to the key note (E flat) in the extra octave, or as they say, in alt. Was there ever heard so bright, so full, so strong and rich a tone of human voice at that height? The Gipsy Song was ecstatically applauded and repeated.

She closed the evening, as usual, with a brace of characteristic popular melodies. "Home, sweet Home" was surcharged in every tone with the emotion of a full heart, which knows the meaning and the worth of home, and yet, as is infallibly the way with her, it never passed the boundary of common-place and sickly sentimentality.

Fitly the feast of melody died away, — like the warm, deep, purple, sunset calm after a gorgeous summer day, — in the prolonged, mysterious mountain echo of those low horn tones, through which her voice droops so slowly, semi-tone after semi-tone, into a mere far-off, faintest murmur and, as it were, dis-embodied spirit of a sound, in that little Swedish "Mountaineer's Song." How it held every listening faculty in suspense, and waked imagination in the most prosaic hearer! and when the voice, that had so long floated off, came home to its key note, as her hands swept slowly over and descended on the closing chord on the piano, what a sweet shock of surprise it was to find that there had not been a hair's-breadth of swerving from the pitch!

A point of great interest in this concert was the original Concerto by Mr. GOLDSCHMIDT, for piano forte with orchestra. It was truly a success, being listened to with a sustained unanimity of attention to the end, and applauded very warmly. Although he had been obliged to cut down his composition to make it short enough to venture before so large an audience, it nevertheless impressed us as a work in the true classic form and spirit. It had merit in it; it developed with an increasing breadth and sense of power as it went on. The instrumentation was especially rich and impressive; and the large, crescendo manner of the orchestral symphonic passages, when the piano forte was silent, never disappointed in the climax. If there was any weakness, it was perhaps the want of a little more positive theme in the opening (andante), but the treatment, the development was full of dignity and power, and revealed profound acquaintance with the best manner of Mendelssohn and Schumann. The Allegro (there were only two movements) displayed the graceful facility and fine fire of the pianist in a sparkling, limpid, rapid melody, that multiplied itself through pleasing transformations, not unlike, in its general character, to the Allegro finale theme to Mendelssohn's G minor concerto.

The orchestra performed two capital pieces. First the overture to La Vestale, by Spontini, — a music wholly unknown in this country, but which, judging from this overture and from a most lofty, heavenly aria from it, which we heard Mme. Goldschmidt sing in private, as well as from its high rank in Europe, ought to be as familiar among us, to say the least, as Norma or Ernani; and then the Saltarello from Mendelssohn's fourth Symphony. M. APPY played a violin solo with all that refined sweetness and truth of tone, and pathos of expression, which we remember to have heard from him in Boston. Sig. BADIALI once more "refreshed his laurels" in a couple of romances by Mercadante. And must our next letter chronicle the last in America of this pure, glorious revelation of "the art divine"!

NEW YORK, May 25.

The Farewell Concert.

Castle Garden, last night, presented a spectacle, the like of which we hardly hope again to witness in our mortal life. Think of seven thousand faces, lit with sad enthusiasm, looking from every part of every circle of the vast area and gallery, so brilliantly illuminated, turned all to one focus, to greet and to enjoy, for the last time, face to face and audibly, the presence and the almost more than mortal music, of a woman who, in eighteen months, by the mere divine right of goodness and of a matchless voice conscientiously trained to perfect obedience to the highest inspirations of Art, has established a sort of moral and ideal empire in the hearts of this whole people, rude and cultivated. We believe no other human being could have drawn together all the elements of such a magnificent occasion, and blended all in such a pure enthusiasm. We doubt if it has ever had a parallel among the popular triumphs of Art. We could not help half fancying that it foreshadowed the supremacy of Woman, in the peaceful, broadly catholic and all-conciliating sphere of Art, the most human of all human occupations, whereas Man's supremacy has been in statesmanship and mere material interests. Men, to be sure, have been and are poets, painters and composers, hitherto, far more effectually than woman, but all this comes of the feminine element, which tempers even our male clay.

Well, we will not indulge in speculation, but go back to Castle Garden. The evening, after a sultry day, was wet with frequent showers, as if in sympathy with the, at once rich and melancholy, occasion. How vividly we recalled in contrast that first night of JENNY LIND in America, and all those six first nights in Castle Garden, when, through wondering crowds of a whole city, poured out for her welcome, and in the golden glow of a superb sunset, we passed in to the magical old castle of light and song, and with souls steeped with beauty again passed out, mingling with the human tide up Broadway, under the glorious moonlight, as if the whole world were keeping festival! The programme too, for this time, was in its great features, a reminiscence of that first one, making up by the charm of association for what it wanted in novelty and classical selections, as compared with the two preceding. We love Castle Garden; it is a better music hall, at all events for JENNY'S voice, (and so she esteems it, and so did M. BENEDICT,) than Tripler Hall. And it displays an audience, in full sight of each other, and brings all eyes to a common focus, and makes the general aspect musical, as no hall, built parallelogram-wise after alleged acoustic laws, can do. Here then was the most fitting place, where the largest number, representing the whole population of loyal subjects could best await the last appearance of the dear and sovereign Queen of Song.

She, as if in honor of the occasion and of the land that she was leaving, (we may add, too, with a noble trust in the great public and entire disregard of the ungrateful slanders kept up through the week by certain New York papers, which outrageously charged to the designs of Mr. Goldschmidt the speculation in tickets, which, however much to be regretted, was indeed unavoidable, so long as there were plenty of people ready to buy at prices so much higher than those originally set upon them)—she, led forward amid deafening plaudits, appeared dressed in bridal magnificence, surpassing any previous occasion. She seemed as if disinterestedly merging herself in the full splendor of the popular heart's ideal of her. It was no personal end which she had before her to accomplish, but the high representative mission of a royal priestess of the Beautiful and True. Call this enthusiasm,—we should sadly suspect ourselves if we were not enthusiastic, and we should grossly insult that vast audience that sat around us, did we not take it at its word.

How Casta Diva was sung we cannot undertake to tell in words. It was a piece dignified enough to open the occasion (after Cherubini's overture to Les deux Journées, and BADIALI's air from I Puritani), and quite in character with her and her serious tuncful office that night. It was identified with the first impression of her voice in this country; and it was the test piece with the French and Italian-opera-spoiled critics, who then carped at her interpretation of it, but which has since vindicated her Italian method above them all. Like the breeze in the pine woods, the first low, full tones crept sweetly, solemnly over the hearts of the listening multitude, rising and swelling into fuller and heavenlier power, and taking deeper and deeper possession of the audience, holding them spell-bound in perfect attentiveness and perfect unity of feeling, as if it were the "spirit of God moving over the face of the waters." Casta Diva was a new music, fraught with more beauty and more meaning to us than we had ever credited to the concert-hacknied aria before. In the elaborate, rapid melody of the outburst of human passion, which succeeded, her voice rioted in a new profusion of brilliant, and sometimes extempore embellishment, triumph upon triumph of execution, a perpetual surprise to the delighted ear, yet always true to the essential spirit of the music, as it is her instinct always to elude mere hacknied figures and cadenzas.

Mme. GOLDSCHMIDT was followed by her husband in the last movement of Mendelssohn's Concerto in G. minor. We suppose it is too much to expect the popular feeling to be just in such a case; she reigned an idol in the people's hearts, and they are naturally slow to recognize the full claim to any man, especially one not already occupying a large place in the zodiac of popular admiration, to be that idol's mate and equal for the rest of life. As a man and an artist, OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT is of the fine and delicately intellectual order; he must be known near to; he is not made for the popular idol, not a giant to impress at first sight and afar off, like Ole Bull; but he is made to be prized and loved by all who in any real sense have met him, and he possesses the artist character in a rare degree of purity and power. He appeared pale, care-worn and agitated; yet, ungrateful instrument as the piano is, in Castle Garden, of all places, he gave a noble rendering of that brilliant finale of Mendelssohn's, compromising nought to cheap effect, and in some points of accent, ad libitum, retardation, &c., interpreting it somewhat differently from JAELE or HATTON. With the hearty applause of much the larger portion of the audience, there were mingled some signs of indifference, and even some few malignant, mean-souled hisses, to the shame of an American audience. This, be it observed, was before he played. His proper bearing, and his performance, impossible as it was to appreciate it there, restored the disaffected to their self-respect, apparently, and there was something like enthusiasm when his next turn came, to play Thalberg's Tarantella.

Why shall we speak—for the tenth time at least—of Madame GOLDSCHMIDT's remaining pieces; of her exquisite archness in the Rossini duet, Per piacere, from the "Turk in Italy," in which BADIALI's ponderosity labored in comparison with the refined buffo elasticity of BELLETTI; of the Trio with flutes from the "Camp of Silesia," a charming genre piece of musical poetry, say what you will—of her "Comin' thro' the Rye," the most sunshiny, flashing frolic of melodious gayety and archness, ever improvised upon an old theme even by her; or of the Swedish "Echo Song," from which we did not find one particle of charm worn off? We turn back for a moment to give credit to Sig. BADIALI for Largo al factotum (though the misfortune with this grave and excellent baritone is, that he is no factotum,) and to regret that the programme was disfigured by one specimen of the most commonplace and clap-trap sort of overtures, namely the overture to Zampa. (But it did us good, so much do we admire the logic of character, to hear the man behind us in the crowd, who had before said, "What a mistake Jenny made in getting married," and that, "as for Goldschmidt, he was nothing," now exclaim of Zampa: "Ah! that's great!")

But there must be an end to all good things! So felt that brilliant audience, more and more soberly, as the swift hours passed. And so felt the great singer, and she must simply utter it and end it gracefully and feelingly, in a fitting strain to fitting words. In the same spot, where, standing eighteen months ago, she sang her "Greeting" to America, she now sang her "Farewell." The poem, which we give below, was as beautiful as could well be in the limitations of the case; and the music by Mr. GOLDSCHMIDT, though not of the most popular and taking character, was truly beautiful and worthy to embalm the farewell of the noble Muse and benefactress, whom he takes away from us to be his wife. It was sung with feeling and received with feeling, with tearful eyes and silence, rather than with tumultuous farewell plaudits. Long lingered many eyes where she departed, and long stayed many, talking over in groups their pleasure and their loss, and the great hall slowly emptied and this great ideal episode in our young national existence,—the maiden greeting of JENNY LIND, the triumphal career of the unrivalled artist, and the artistic farewell of Jenny and Otto Goldschmidt—was ended and of the past, save as it has sown seeds of beauty in our souls!

FAREWELL TO AMERICA.

BY C. P. CRANCH.

Young land of hope—fair Western Star!
Whose light I hailed from climes afar—
I leave thee now—but twine for thee
One parting wreath of melody.
O take this offering of the heart
From one who feels 'tis sad to part.

And if it be that strains of mine
Have glided from my heart to thine,
My voice was but the breeze that swept
The spirit chords that in thee slept.
The music was not all my own—
Thou gavest back the answering tone.

Farewell—when parted from thy shore,
Long absent scenes return once more;
Where'er the wanderer's home may be,
Still, still with memory turn to thee!
Bright Freedom's clime—I feel thy spell,
But I must say Farewell—Farewell!

The happy couple positively sail in the Atlantic on Saturday—the day that this will reach our readers. They hope to be soon in Switzerland and pass a genial next winter in the sunny garden of Italy.

THE DUSSELDORF GALLERY still attracts crowds of admiring visitors. "The Fairies" of Steubrick seems still to be the centre of attraction, the universal object of admiration. The magnificent NAPOLEON of Paul de la Roche (once seen, never forgotten) is, we regret to learn, to be removed this week. The Gallery is to be enlarged by the addition of a large number of pictures after the first of June.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

Of the OPERA HOUSE we have no later news; but in New York, we see that a similar project of building a new opera house is entertained; to be erected on the north-east corner of Fourteenth Street and Irving Place, 204 feet on Fourteenth Street, and 122 feet on Irving Place. The building is to accommodate from 4,000 to 5,000 persons, and the price of admission to no part of the house is to exceed one dollar. The yearly rent is to secure seven per cent. upon each share, and there are to be seventy performances, or opera-nights, every year. Each subscriber is to have one of the best seats for every share of $1,000, the choice of seats among the stockholders to be decided by lot. The building is not to cost more than $200,000, and no money is to be collected from subscribers until one hundred and fifty shares are subscribed; some $50,000 being already subscribed.—And we find an account of the plan of the proposed Opera House in Philadelphia, which is to seat five thousand persons, not only comfortably, but luxuriously. Shall New York and Philadelphia have such opera houses and Boston have none?

NEW ORGAN. A noble specimen of this noblest of all instruments may now be seen at the factory of Messrs. W. B. D. SIMMONS & Co., in Causeway Street, which has been built for the Williams Hall in Washington St. It is built upon the German plan, the compass of keys being from CC to G, and the pedals from CCC to D. We have a full description of its contents, but can give only the following recapitulation of its stops:—

Registers to Great Organ,	15
Choir "	10
Swell "	14
for Couples, etc.	9
" " Pedal Organ,	4

Whole number of Registers, 52

We notice some new stops in this instrument, viz: in the Choir Organ, the Fagotto (from CC to middle C, 24 pipes); in the Swell, the Double Trumpet; and in the Pedal Organ the Ophicleide and Harmonica (16 feet from CCC to D, 27 pipes.)

The Organ is to be placed in a recess formed in the Hall for its reception. The extreme dimensions of the screen which is to cover the Organ, are as follows: 35 feet high, 24 feet wide, 16 feet deep, including projecting key-boards.

We had the pleasure of hearing the accomplished organist of the Mt. Vernon church perform upon this noble instrument, and feel confident that it will add to the already high reputation of Messrs. Simmons & Co. as organ builders. It will remain for some time in their factory, as the Hall is not yet ready to receive it; and we would recommend all interested in the organ to visit their rooms. Being without a case, it affords a good opportunity to examine the curious and complicated mechanism of the interior of a large organ.

A pious monk has given, in a moment of inspiration, a description of the organ in Latin verse, thus translated:

"Twelve pair of bellows ranged in stately row,
Are join'd above, and fourteen more below;
These the full force of seventy men require,
Who ceaseless toil, and plentifully perspire;
Each aiding each, till all the wind be prest
In the close confines of the incumbent chest,
On which four hundred pipes in order rise,
To bellow forth the blast that chest supplies."

MUSIC FOR THE MILLION. When shall we have music for the People? Music that all who will may hear, without money and without price; free to all ears, as the sparkling fountain on the Common is, to all eyes. Some ten years ago, the City Government, if we recollect rightly, made an appropriation for the purpose of engaging a military band to play on the Common one or two evenings every week during the Summer. Perhaps it was the liberality of individual subscriptions that provided this great enjoyment for the thirsting spirit of the people; no matter how it was done; the thing was done; and the crowds of delighted listeners that surrounded the musicians that Summer, were a sufficient proof how much it was needed, how gratefully it was received, how highly it was enjoyed and appreciated. How much better to give the public money for such a purpose than to squander it (as is done every year) in a useless display of fireworks, in this burning of villainous saltpetre, which astonishes the eyes of the spectators barely for a couple of hours, and lights them home not a whit wiser or happier than when they came! Compare this with the lasting pleasure that might be given to those who pass their days in hot workshops, to the mechanics, the seamstresses, the operatives of every class, men, women and children; a pleasure, innocent, elevating and cheering.

We have operas and concerts, in their season, of every description, for the enjoyment of those who can afford to pay for such a relaxation. But, how many there are among us to whom it is impossible to devote even the smallest sum for such a purpose, who yet would enjoy, beyond conception, the pleasure that might, in this way, be given. In Europe, it is almost universally the custom for the military bands in the great cities to play frequently in public, for the pleasure of the people; and the same custom prevails here in the cities of Montreal and Quebec, where the great bands of the regiments play, once a week at least, in the finest possible manner in some public place, throughout the Summer, and the people of every class attend in crowds to listen. Why cannot the people of Boston enjoy such a privilege as well as the inhabitants of the Canadian cities? The experiment tried here some years ago, to which we referred above, was very successful, and was followed in several of the neighboring towns. Why shall it not be tried again? We have the musicians who are competent to perform in a manner not dreamed of at that time; and an immense advance has been made in musical knowledge, in the love of music during these ten years. Why shall not all share in this pleasure? The expense would be but small, and the money necessary to carry it into effect could be easily raised. In some of the neighboring towns last Summer the plan was tried with eminent success. We heard the Germania Serenade Band give several evening concerts on this plan. The music, we need not say, was of a much higher order than what we formerly heard. The day of Wood Up and the Hero's Quickstep has gone by, and the finest selections from operatic and other standard music may now, with the means at our command, be made familiar to all. Shall Boston be behind Cambridge and Brookline? Who will give? Will the City Fathers see to it?

NEWBURYPORT. We are glad to see that the good examples set by the Cambridge Musical Association, by the Newton Musical Association, and by the new Society in Watertown is followed in other places. We hear of a musical society in Fitchburg, organized last winter; and now a correspondent writes us that, "In Newburyport a Musical Fund Society is forming, with the view of having a series of eight vocal and instrumental concerts next winter; the expenses to be defrayed by a monthly subscription, taken up through the Summer. This society has been organized by Messrs. R. E. Mosely and E. Griffin. We are glad to see this new city, 'the city of schools,' keeping up, in the march of musical refinement, with her sisters of larger growth; the good taste of her citizens has been evinced by the engagement of the Germania Musical Society and Mendelssohn Quintet Club for a series of concerts, during the past two seasons."

Paris.

A friend in Paris, under date of May 16th, writes us: "Just at this moment there is rather a dearth in the musical market; all the artists having taken flight for London since the beginning of the season. Concerts, which have been most abundant, have nearly ceased; the Italian Opera House is closed, and at the Grand Opera, Halévy's opera of the Juif Errant shuts out all possibility of having anything better for some time to come. I have been once to hear it, and do not feel very anxious to have the strength of my tympani so tried again. It is the first time in my life that I have listened to an opera in five acts, without hearing some two or three "morceaux" of a superior order. In this case, I really do not think my musical sensibilities were awakened to the presence of a single striking idea. It is a sad thing to see a man so thoroughly versed in the science of his art as to be able to develop trivialities, for so many hours, without once moving his audience by the creation of even a pleasing melody. The mass of brass instruments used upon several occasions is positively terrific; so much so that a man of some wit in Paris, observing some repairs being made upon the outer walls of the Opera House, declared that M. Halévy must have treated them as Joshua did the walls of Jericho. The Grand Opera in Paris has become a place of scenic decorations. The administration care little for the quality of the music, or the excellence of the libretto provided that there is a chance for magnificent scenery, and a gorgeous ballet. Music has become the despised handmaiden of scene painters, and ballet dancers."

CONSECUTIVE FIFTHS. During a walk which I took with Beethoven, I was talking to him of two consecutive fifths, which occur in one of the earliest violin quartets in C minor; and which, to my surprise, sound most harmoniously. Beethoven did not know what I meant, and would not believe that they could be fifths. He soon produced a piece of music paper, which he was in the habit of carrying with him, and I wrote down the passage with its four parts. When I had thus proved myself to be right, he said, "Well, and who forbids them?" Not knowing what to make of this question, I was silent, and he repeated it several times, until I at length replied, in great amazement, "Why, it is one of the very first rules." He, however, still repeated his question, and I answered, "Marpurg, Kirnberger, Fux, &c. &c. In fact, all theorists." "Well, then, I permit them," was his final answer.

NEW & VALUABLE MUSIC BOOKS

RECENTLY PUBLISHED BY

OLIVER DITSON, . . . BOSTON.

SPOHR'S GRAND VIOLIN SCHOOL, being an exact reprint of the latest European editions, with all the author's new revisions and improvements. One volume, quarto. Price, $3.

* Among the many peculiar excellencies of this Violin School one is remarkable, that the Elementary Instructions do not precede the practical portion of the work as in other Schools, but are combined therewith; by this union the pupil is enabled to take the Violin in hand at the first lesson; in fact, he should and must then commence with it. The author's knowledge, as observable in his Preface, is no small addition to the truly practical distinctions of this School; his style is simple, clear, noble, and elegant, alike attractive and useful as a standard to the pupil as to the master.

Czerny's Exercises in Velocity. (30 Etudes de la Vitesse), preceded by Nine New Introductory Exercises, and concluded by a New Study on Octaves, (composed expressly for this edition,) for the Piano Forte. From the Nineteenth London Edition, with Notes. By J. A. HAMILTON. In three Numbers. Price of each, 50 cents. Complete in one volume, $1.25.

* Calculated to develop and equalize the fingers, and to insure the utmost brilliancy and rapidity of execution.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION OF
The Seminary Class Book of Music, designed for Seminaries, High Schools, Private Classes, etc., containing Elementary Instructions, Vocal Exercises, Solfegeios, and a copious selection of Secular and Sacred Songs, Duets and Trios. By E. L. WHITE and T. BISSELL.

* The above work has been before the public only one year, yet it has become a universal favorite, and is used in all parts of the Union. During the past year every inquiry has been made in order to ascertain in what way it could be improved and made fully equal to the wants of those for whom it is intended, and from suggestions thus obtained the publisher has been induced to add to and in other ways improve it. It is now pronounced to be exactly what is wanted, and as such it is offered to the public.

☞ The above books can be obtained in large or small quantities of the publisher, 115 Washington St., and of music dealers and booksellers generally throughout the United States and Canada. 7 tf

DAVIDSON'S Illustrated Libretto-Books of the Opera.

CANTICA LAUDIS: OR, THE AMERICAN BOOK OF CHURCH MUSIC. By LOWELL MASON, Professor in the Boston Academy of Music, Editor of the Boston Handel and Haydn Society's Collection, Carmina Sacra, and other of the most popular Music Books in the country; and GEORGE JAMES WEBB, Professor in the Boston Academy of Music, and Editor of many valuable Musical Works.

The increased satisfaction with which it was received, and the unprecedented success of this book, MASON AND WEBB'S LATEST WORK, as well as the warm commendations it has received from the Musical Profession generally, establish it as the best and most attractive collection of Church Music which even these celebrated authors have ever produced. It contains a greater amount, as well as variety, of truly beautiful new tunes, anthems, chants, and other pieces, than any similar work; besides a copious collection of the standard old tunes. The Elements of Vocal Music have been newly and most carefully prepared, and to adapt it more particularly to CHORUS AND SINGING SCHOOLS, about Two Hundred Solfegio Exercises and Progressive Lessons have been added. In addition to numerous testimonials from the press, it having been pronounced the "MOST VALUABLE BOOK OF CHURCH MUSIC EVER ISSUED," it has received from every section of the country the unqualified approbation of more than ONE HUNDRED PROFESSORS AND TEACHERS OF MUSIC. Retail price, 88 cents.

JUST PUBLISHED,

MARX'S MUSICAL COMPOSITION. The Theory and Practice of Musical Composition. By ADOLPH BEARNARD MARX, Doctor of Music, &c. Translated from the third German Edition, and edited by HERMANN S. SARONI.

A. B. MARX holds such high rank in Germany as a writer upon the subject of Musical Composition, that any recommendation of his great work to those who are at all acquainted with the musical literature of the land which is emphatically the home of music, would be superfluous. It is without a rival as a treatise upon this subject, thoroughly scientific and yet adapted to popular comprehension.

The present translation is beautifully printed in 406 octavo pages, and bound in English cloth. Retail price, $2.50.

NEW HYMN AND TUNE BOOK.

TEMPLE MELODIES. A Collection of nearly all the Standard and Popular Tunes, in connection with Five Hundred Favorite Hymns; arranged as a Hymn and Tune Book for Vestries, Social Meetings, Congregational and Family Worship, &c. By DARIUS E. JONES.

This work has already been introduced, and is used with great satisfaction and profit in the vestries of many Churches and in the Congregations of some, while the publishers have received numerous recommendations from Clergymen and others. Those who love the old tunes, and who deem it a desirable object that as many as possible should unite in the singing, especially at social meetings, will find this exactly the book wanted.

FREDERIC CHOPIN.

BY FRANZ LISZT.

VII.

In one case only did CHOPIN renounce his premeditated silence and his usual neutrality: and that was when the question turned on Art. Then under no circumstances did he keep back his conviction and his judgment. Here he felt his weight as a master, and he left no doubt about the way in which he viewed questions that properly belonged to the sphere of his competency. For several years he advocated his views and opinions with impassioned zeal; afterwards, when the triumph of his ideas lessened the interest of his rôle, he sought no farther opportunity to appear anew as the standard-bearer of a party.

In the year 1832, scarcely after his arrival in Paris, it is well known that a new school was formed in Music as in Literature; young talents shook off the yoke of the old forms, and the political fermentation of the first years of the July revolution passed over into questions of Literature and Art. The Romantic style was the order of the day, and men contended for and against with passionate party spirit. While one class did not admit that it was possible to write differently from what had been written, the other demanded that the artist should be free in the choice of the form for his thoughts and feelings, inasmuch as the true rule of form consists in the harmony of the same with what it has to express.

The most gifted, able and intrepid representative of the New Musical School was BERLIOZ. CHOPIN went with him decidedly; but if he was one of those, who most strenuously insisted on emancipation from the traditional formulas, still he was equally resolute in rejecting those shouts of the market-place and other monstrosities, which would only have introduced new abuses in the place of the old. Here too he thoroughly maintained his independence. The boldnesses in his compositions he surrounded with so much grace, proportion and fundamental science, that the admiration they excited fully justified him in having trusted only his own genius. His deep studies, his habit of well-considered labor, the reverence for classic beauty, in which he had been brought up, guaranteed him against all danger of squandering his powers in groping about and experimenting, as it has been the fate of many disciples of the new ideas.

If Chopin withdrew himself, as we have seen, from the whirlpool of society, he clung on the other hand with so much the greater heartiness to his family and to the acquaintances of his youth. He stood in uninterrupted connection with his relatives; especially dear to him was his sister LOUISE, whose spirit and ways of feeling were most kindred to his own. She has several times made the journey from Warsaw to Paris, to visit him, and she too was his constant nurse in the last three months of his life.

CHOPIN was born at Zelazowa-Wola in Warsaw in the year 1810. His own recollection of his boyhood related chiefly to a gift from the CATALANI, a gold watch with the inscription: "1820. Madame Catalani to Frederic Chopin aged ten years."

The years of his childhood offer nothing especially remarkable. He was frailly built by nature, and the anxious attention of his friends was directed above all to his health. He grew up among patterns of domestic virtues and religious observances, and had the example of simplicity, activity, piety and refined culture before his eyes. In his ninth year he received instruction in music, and soon after he was placed under the charge of a passionate worshipper of SEBASTIAN BACH, by the name of ZIWINA, who for many years conducted the musical studies of the boy in the good old thorough manner. His parents, (his mother was a Pole, his father a Frenchman,) lived in limited circumstances and indeed never thought of building hopes upon a brilliant virtuosity in their son, but kept him to the earnest and conscientious study of Music, so that he might become a competent and skilful teacher.

Through the magnanimous patronage of Prince Anton Radziwill—the same, who has shown his artistic capacity by his compositions to Goethe's "Faust"—Chopin was admitted rather early to one of the high schools of Warsaw. But the prince did not stop there; he provided for the complete education of the boy, in whom he had discerned a remarkable talent, and obviated, through the mediation of a friend of the family, Anton Korzuehowski, all the necessities involved in the education of an artist. At the school Chopin made the acquaintance of the sons of Prince Borsy Czetywytynski; their mother, who loved and practiced music with a true feeling for the art, conceived a great sympathy for the young artist, and in her saloons he had first an opportunity to know the select and brilliant circles of the higher society, in which Warsaw was at that time so rich. Soft, full of feeling, fine in every sense, the features of his face had in his sixteenth year an ideal beauty, of which it might have been said, that it belonged to no determined age or sex.

Into this first period of his youth falls his attachment to a young maiden, who all her life has thought of him with loving devotion. The storm, which tore him far away from his home, severed this first love and robbed the exile of a fond and faithful wife, as well as of his fatherland. Never in his after years was there for him the bliss of such a tie as he dreamed of then. His beloved kept his memory sacred, and clung with filial affection to his parents; nor would Chopin's father permit that the portrait of his Frederic, which she had drawn in their days of hope, should ever be replaced by another however more artistically perfect.

When he had finished his schooling and had learned, through the study of Harmony with Joseph Elsner, the difficult art of being severe with himself, his parents wished him to travel, in order to hear great performances of important musical works. With this view Chopin visited some cities in Germany, in which however he never stayed more than a short time. In the year 1830 he had just left Warsaw again with a similar purpose, when the revolution of the 29th of November broke out.

He saw himself compelled to remain in Vienna, where he performed in some concerts, without however making the impression, which he had a right to expect. He left Vienna with the intention of going to London; still he desired to stop some time in Paris; he had his passport visé-ed to England "via Paris," and this word contained his whole future. Long years after, when he had become naturalized and settled down in France, he used often to say, laughingly: "I am only here on my passage through."

Shortly after his arrival in Paris he gave several concerts and was heard by the higher society and by the young artists equally with admiration. I still remember very well his first appearance in the saloon of M. Pleyel, where the ever reiterated applause could not satisfy our surprise and enthusiasm at a talent, which revealed a new phase in the poesy of musical art and developed such felicitous innovations in form.

Chopin did not allow himself to be dazzled nor intoxicated by his triumphs; he bore them off without pride, but at the same time without false modesty. All his countrymen, who were then in Paris, prepared the most hearty and appreciating reception for him, and from that time forward he was constantly welcome in the house of prince Czartoryski, the Countess Plater, lady Von Komar and her daughter, the Countess Delphine Potocka. This latter lady was in beauty, intellect and grace one of the most admired queens of society; to her he has dedicated his second Concerto, the one before alluded to, with the beautiful Adagio. At a later time he associated especially with his countrymen, and this too had some influence on his musical occupations. He continued in fact by this means in a sort of musical correspondence with his fatherland; they brought him new songs and poems to Paris, and furnished with his melodies these flew home again and quickly became generally known and loved, without anybody knowing the composer's name. As the number of these melodies had increased considerably, he thought at last of collecting and publishing them. But he was not destined to realize this thought, and so his Songs have remained lost and scattered flowers, whose fragrance only here and there salutes a wanderer, whom chance has led into the distant regions where they still grow. We have heard some songs in Poland which are ascribed to him and which are worthy of him too; but who can venture to undertake an accurate separation of the productions of his muse from those of the spirit of the people?

But evidently Chopin is a tone-poet, who by his compositions has lent an individual expression to the poetic sense, the poetic way of feeling of a people in a given period. His music does not fit either of the two great frames, which are distinguished by the names of German and Italian music. But that national coloring was with him by no means a thing purposely sought for: he did not make it a priori his ideal; perhaps he would himself have wondered, had you called him a national composer. As with the genuine national poets, so in his music the peculiar national spirit pervaded the creation without forethought and without the consciousness of the creator. And this spirit resides not merely in the form and rhythm of the Polonaises, Mazourkas, &c.; but one and the same feeling runs in a thousand ways through all his works, Concertos, Scherzos, Preludes, Etudes and especially Nottornos. Thoroughly subjective, Chopin has breathed into all his tone-creations one and the same life, his own inmost and most individual life, so that in all a unity of character prevails, an exclusive mode of feeling, out of which their beauties, and indeed their weaknesses and defects too, flow.

This very definitely pronounced peculiarity of Chopin could not be without influence on his judgment in Art, on his partialities and aversions in his views about the works of the greatest masters. In fact he only sought in them what was kindred to his own nature. What came near to this, pleased him; but to whatever was remote from this, he scarcely allowed justice. He could not go outside of himself, and the greatest beauties and the greatest merit passed for nothing with him, if they contradicted one side or another of his æsthetic comprehension. As great an admiration as he cherished for BEETHOVEN, yet certain portions of his works appeared to him too rough-hewn; their build was for him too athletic, the passion in them seemed to him too sickly, the rage too impetuous, and thundering; to him the lion's marrow in this giant's limbs was too coarse a stuff, and the seraphic, Raphael-like profiles, which emerge amid the violent creations of this spirit, became frequently almost painful through the cutting contrast.

In some of the melodies of FRANZ SCHUBERT he recognized the full charm, but unwillingly he listened to those, whose outlines (to his ear at least) were too sharp, in which the feeling lies as it were bare and naked, and where you (so to speak) hear the limbs crack under the rack of pain. Everything immoderate and rude repulsed him; everything that approached the style of the new French melodrama, was martyrdom to him. If he was partial to the Romantic, yet he hated all insane excess, all startling and shudder-exciting effects. Even Shakspeare he accepted only with strong reservation, just as he once said with regard to Franz Schubert, that the sublime became disfigured, the moment that the common-place or trivial succeeded it. He despised the narrow fetters of the old form, the stiff symmetry of a bird-cage; but it was to soar like a lark into the air, and not to creep through the hollows of the woods and listen to the howling and roaring of the wild beasts, or to make through the sandy desert paths, which the treacherous wind ironically covers up again behind the desperate traveller.

All the free and sparkling flow of the Italian music, as unsought as it is unlearned, pleased him quite as little as that which in the German bears the stamp of a power, of which he recognized the strength, but not the elevation. Among the composers of the former period he valued and played HUMMEL most, and MOZART was to him the ideal type of musical poetry, since he more seldom than all others condescended to overstep the bounds, which separate the excellent from the common. And yet his abhorrence of the common-place and his pure nature found even in "Don Juan," that immortal masterpiece, passages, whose presence he lamented; his reverence for Mozart was not thereby lessened, but as it were saddened; he could go so far as to forget what he did not like, but to become reconciled to it was to him impossible.

How much Chopin regarded Art as his most sacred calling, how proud he was that heaven had appointed him to this vocation, and with what a religious piety he looked upon himself as a priest of the same, was proved in his dying hour by a provision of his last will. He, who among the first artists of his time had given the fewest concerts, nevertheless ordered on his death-bed, that he should be buried in the dress he used to wear in his public concerts. As he associated his love for art and his faith in it with the thought of immortality, so he again testified by a dumb symbol, when he laid himself down in the tomb, to the conviction that had elevated and made beautiful his life.

Music in the past Half Century.

An Address delivered before the Harvard Musical Association, at Copley Hall, Boston, Dec. 22, 1851.

BY SAMUEL JENNISON, JR.

Turn now for a moment to the creations of BACH and HANDEL. Recall those massive organ fugues of the former, the ponderous chorusses of the latter; and where do you behold such perfect models of pure harmony, finished modulation unconnected with words, as in those fugues so infinitely to be enjoyed, if one will but study to fathom them; or as in those yet sublimer harmonies which it was the fortunate lot of the latter to ally to the most inspired of words? For Handel had the singular fortune to seize upon a theme (I speak now of the Messiah) to which, for all that is most tender, most holy, most lofty, no other could be equal. That great and conspicuous name of that incomprehensible Being, the light of the whole Christian world, seems to have set the stamp of its own greatness upon, and hallowed, the work.

MILTON and HANDEL: they are ever and peculiarly associated in our minds, as having occupied respectively the highest ground in poetry and in music. Theirs is a similar dignity and sublimity. All the suggestive materials in a world's history, real or mythological, a ten years conflict around the walls of Troy, with pagan deities for allies, all the voyages of the pious Æneas, all the crusades which supplied a Tasso's invention, the discovery of a new world, the downfall of Jerusalem, which had filled the mind of Coleridge, the journey of Dante through the realms of darkness and of Paradise, all yield in grandeur to, and some are paltry and insignificant beside, that great theme "Of man's first disobedience and the fruit

Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
Brought death into the world and all our woes."

So it always seems to me to be with HANDEL and the Messiah: and so the subjects which other composers have found, The Creation, Palestine, David, Elijah, St. Paul, even the death of Jesus, the Mount of Olives, the Last Judgment, majestic as they may be, appear clothed in less glory than this. What can so take hold upon all affections as those words of cheering, of pathos, or of praise, "Comfort ye my people," "He shall feed his flock," "He was despised," "For thou didst not leave," "I know that my Redeemer liveth," "For the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth," &c. We may well conceive the feeling with which the composer replied to the prelate, who, on learning his design, proposed to furnish him with words: "How," said HANDEL, "does he think that he can give me a better text than prophets and apostles filled with the Holy Spirit?" and we may conceive the inspiration which fired his soul as he wrote, and of which he said he could give no account, but, such was his exaltation, in the words of St. Paul: "Whether I was in or out of the body, I know not."

The aspiration of HANDEL, as of MILTON, was answered. What in them was dark became illumined; what was low became raised and supported so that they did, indeed, rise to the height of their great argument. And this has been recognized by the greatest of those, whose names and works have shed a lustre upon the musical world in past days. Therefore it was that BACH said, "He is the only one whom I should like to see before I die, and who I should like to be if I were not BACH." And therefore did MOZART on hearing these words modestly add, "And I would say the same, if I could have a voice where they are heard."

Therefore it was that the great GLUCK, bidding his English visitor follow him to his room, said, "I will introduce you to one whom, all my life, I have made my study, and endeavored to imitate;" and, pointing to the full length portrait, added, "There, Sir, is the portrait of the inspired master of our art; when I open my eyes in the morning, I look upon him with reverential awe, and acknowledge him as such, and the highest praise is due to your country for having honored him."

Therefore it was that HAYDN must weep like a child, overwhelmed with the sublime strains in Westminster Abbey.

Therefore it was that BEETHOVEN in his last moments, on receiving a copy of his works, exclaimed: "Das ist die Wahre!" "That is the True!" styling him the greatest Composer that ever lived. "I cannot," says a writer quoted in the Life of BEETHOVEN, "describe to you with what pathos, and I am inclined to say, with what sublimity of language, he spoke of the Messiah of this immortal genius. Every one of us was moved when he said: 'I would uncover my head, and kneel down on his tomb.'" And at another time, you will remember he said of him: "Handel is the unequalled master of all masters. Go, turn to him and learn, with few means, how to produce great effects."

Therefore it was that worthy custom arose, continued in England to this day, when, by a simultaneous impulse, following the example of their king, the vast audience rose from their seats when those magnificent Hallelujahs burst upon their astonished ears.

Pardon me if I have been betrayed into quoting at unnecessary length these various opinions. Do you say HANDEL needs no eulogy? Yet do we not need to have our memories refreshed as to the estimation in which he was held by those who in our estimation stand highest? Is there not occasion for the fear that, notwithstanding all the professions of regard for him, in the deluge of modern productions, and in the press of modern composers, the surpassing excellence of HANDEL may be forgotten, and by reason of a few quaintnesses and old fashions in him, his wonderful greatness be neglected till it become traditional and talked of, rather than seen and felt.

The apprehension would surely not be an unwarrantable one, if a class of critics should spring up to maintain, as one young American is related to have done, that even BEETHOVEN is but an indifferent composer; DONIZETTI the only genuine master!

If then in that grandeur of style, if in those lofty and powerful HANDELIAN and BACHIAN attributes (so to speak), attributes which it is easier to feel than describe, we seem to observe a decline, what a change has not melody undergone! How much less truthful and natural her character than that she once bore! Upon how slender a framework are many of the modern airs constructed! how slight the theme, the subject, which serves for the basis of many modern cavatins, in comparison with that of the simple old songs! Do we not observe now a large infusion of an unhealthy, romantic element, pervading all forms of music, betokening rather sentimentality than sentiment; leaving with us often the impression that it is but shallow, superficially meretricious, with all its pretension, meaningless as the interminable mi moro! oh ciel! ahimé! pietà! of the Opera—the transformation of the innocent village maiden into the languishing belle of the town.

Even take the Casta Diva, divest it of the charm of a Jenny Lind's vocalization, cast off that wrapping of elegant floriture, anatomize the melody and see how slight its foundation.

You will readily comprehend my meaning, if you do not admit the correctness of my proposition, when I refer you to such songs as HANDEL'S "Love in her eyes sits playing"; to HAYDN'S Canzonet, "The season comes when first we met," or "O tuneful voice," with its delicious accompaniment, scarcely inferior to "Adelaide." Go back to almost any song of SHIELD and STORACE, charming melodists of England: bring to mind "Tell her I love her," "The streamlet that flowed round her cot," "Down by the river there grows a green willow": remember the music of Moore's melodies; look at all those airs which MOZART could throw off with so proverbial facility; think of the Agnus Dei in the first Mass; of Batti, batti, and Vedrai carino, it is almost impertinent to remind you;—then think if you might not hunt over endless sheets upon the shelves of music stores, before finding any imbued with a sweetness so chaste and charming as those and others you may recall; songs containing in themselves so living a germ, such a core of pure and refined melody as those which from our boyhood we have sung a thousand times, yet scarce grown weary: which needed no support of shifting harmonies and kaleidoscopic modulation. How many of those of the present day, alluring, fascinating though they be, in comparison with such as I have named, soon pall upon the ear! How little do they wear! How quickly does the appetite

—— "Sicken and so die;"

till we exclaim,

no more!

It does not please me as it did before.

Examine, finally, the stock of modern church tunes. How undeniably deficient are they by scores and hundreds in that beauty and expressiveness which once lifted the heart of the worshipper to the very gates, indeed, of heaven.

It is not to be denied that there are occasionally memorable instances of melodious invention in some of the later composers; but take a glance from MOZART, for instance, downward through ROSSINI to DONIZETTI and VERDI, and is it altogether with a silly prejudice that we cast our eyes back upon the days when embellishment was not so needed to direct attention from the meagreness of the theme; when the ear had not yet become so addicted to the use of stimulants, as to disdain the plainer fare which afforded gratification sufficiently vivid and nourishment far more wholesome?

Will MOZART in future days remain in high repute, or will the DONIZETTIS retain their ascendancy, and extend their empire? Is the world's progress towards greater purity of morals, or towards sensuality and licentiousness?

Among recent changes in the character of musical compositions, none are more apparent than those discoverable in pieces for the piano forte, an instrument which has become, and deservedly so, the most popular and extensively cultivated of all.

Where is now the Sonata, that finished, elegant composition, with its three or four varied movements, each complete in well ordered beauty?

This form of composition, created by BACH and HAYDN, adorned and embellished by the varied genius of PLEYEL, KOZELUCH, CLEMENTI, MOZART, and so forth down to BEETHOVEN, and deemed by them worthy to perpetuate their unfading beauties, is a form now almost extinct, except in its broader arrangement for various instruments, in Trio, Quartett and Symphony. As for the Toccata, the occasional title of piano forte compositions within fifty years, the word itself requires a reference to the Musical Vocabulary. The word Sonata was originally applied only to pieces da suonare, "to sound," in other words for wind instruments, while Toccata, from toccare, to touch, was a term given to compositions for instruments with keys. In place of these you now find in the music stores an endless variety of Capricci, Divertissements, Romances, Sketches, Serenades, Nocturnes, Songs without words, Airs with variations, Andantes, and Adagio "religieuses" and "sentimentales," Souvenirs of all manner of places, people and things, Fantasias, for the most part founded on favorite themes from favorite Operas—as if to originate a pleasing subject were beyond the power of the writer,—and intended to dazzle and amaze with their difficulties, rather than to charm with their sweetness or sentiment.

While the demand for novelty and brilliancy in this class of music, (where it is perhaps more observable than in any other) has led manufacturers to discover various methods of improving the action of the Piano Forte, the superior mechanism, on the other hand, giving a great elasticity of touch is of itself sufficient to suggest, if it does not even demand more rapid performance.

The names of the crowd of fashionable composers half a century ago, or just beyond, setting aside always the Haydns and Mozarts, have well nigh sunk into oblivion, if here they have ever even been heard of. NICOLAI, STERKEL, STAES, EICHNER, VANHALL, SCHROEDER SCHOBERT, BOCCHERINI were thought in their time to exhibit various degrees of elegance, polished melody, rich harmony, spirit, science, or pathos: but the modern performer turns from them all for the most part as unprofitable and insipid. To CLEMENTI, it should not be forgotten, is however to be awarded the palm for unsurpassed elegance and beauty. To him BEETHOVEN assigned the foremost rank, saying that they who thoroughly studied the works of CLEMENTI, at the same time rendered themselves acquainted with MOZART and others, while the converse was not the fact. The most recent school of Piano Forte composition, and which has sprung up in the period we treat of, is well characterized by a writer in the Westminster Review of some twelve or more years ago as the Marvellous School: it comprises THALBERG, HENSELT, CHOPIN, LISZT and so on. Its peculiarity is so well known, as to need no particular description. Let me however observe, that the student of this school, besides rendering himself familiar with all ordinary difficulties of execution, will find it well nigh indispensable also to acquire an acquaintance with every key in which music can be written. Such signatures as five flats were once used but rarely, were brought forth only on great occasions: Mr. Gardner thinks BEETHOVEN enters it only "for tragic purposes." But now WEBER's "Invitation to the Dance," once the ne plus ultra of a young amateur's ambition, is but simple in its key as in its general structure. A brilliant Set of Waltzes by THALBERG, published some years since in this city; together with the Sonata, op. 27, of Beethoven, upon F sharp minor, one of the most strikingly plaintive of all of that composer; the Marcia Funebre in Sonata, on the minor of A flat, which brings into requisition the flat C, are the most readily occurring illustrations of the importance of becoming familiarized with what were once the insuperable difficulties of the signatures of six or seven flats or sharps. And after the researches of modern piano forte composers into the piquant harmonies, and sometimes startlingly and intensely pathetic and appealing tones our beautiful Grand Pianos in those wild keys give out, we smile at the days when the simple key of F with one flat, was that beyond which the composer scarce ventured; when that key alone filled the four hundred folio pages of the Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth. The habit of conquering difficulties very naturally creates a craving for new and greater difficulties to be overcome; and to excel in manual dexterity has become the chief ambition of the pianist. Hence there has been a constant tendency to originate only compositions which should dazzle and bewilder for the great degree of skill required to execute them; and we have now thousands of such pieces, whose performance would have been as great a cause of amazement and incredulity to the musical world of former days, as the propulsion of matter by steam, or transmission of messages by electricity.

Yet how much further can this be carried? There must be ere long a limit to this velocity; for even if the hand could be trained to unlimited capacity, as easily as demisemiquavers of quadruple or quintuple rapidity can be written for it, we may safely assert that the ear at least can never become trained to such delicacy and acuteness as to appreciate or follow, much less to derive gratification from more headlong rates of speed. It is a common saying, that beyond a certain range of the thermometer we are unable to appreciate the intensity of heat or cold; so if you extended the key-board of the piano an octave or two in either direction, you would gain nothing; and so for a performer to increase the rapidity of his playing much beyond what has been attained, would be as futile, so far as the gratification of the listener is concerned, as for the exhibitor of a panorama to unroll his cylinders with the speed of a locomotive, and expect the spectators to enjoy his picture.

This prodigious education of the hand cannot, however, be without its effect. Piano forte music will not go back to the baldness of the earlier days, and the result may be developments in some form or other which we cannot anticipate.

The Cantabile or singing style has of late obtained great attention in piano forte composition. And as a substitute for the too often rapid Airs with Variations, which once monopolized the time of the student of that instrument, for the creation of an elegant taste, such works as the "Lieder ohne Worte" of MENDELSSOHN and others must be regarded as of high value. In modern pianos of best quality much regard seems to be had to the production of a tender and expressive singing tone. It was in fact the search for this which gave rise to the invention of striking the strings with hammers instead of quills.

In the department of Opera, what age can have been so lavish of its wealth? The Italian Opera! What hosts of delicious associations does not the name call up, even with us, of whom but little more than ten years since we read in an article in the North American Review, that the tastes and habits of our people were so averse to this species of entertainment that it could never in all probability find great favor among us; yet whose absence or too long delay now produces a void which attests the rapidly growing demand and need. Time would fail to enumerate the many works which have contributed so much to the pleasure of the world: the solitary one of BEETHOVEN, the multitudes of that galaxy of WEBER, ROSSINI, BELLINI, DONIZETTI, MEYERBEER, AUBER, MERCADANTE, PACINI, VERDI, RICCI, BALFE, and the like, affording what a fund of brilliant fancies, harmonious combinations, imposing effects!

Of the origin of the Rossinian style an anecdote is on record, which seems to deserve transcribing.

It is said that in 1814, at Milan, the composer first met with VELLUTI, a singer of eminence, who was fond of displaying the beauty and flexibility of his voice. Upon the second rehearsal of the "Aurelians in Palmyra," then about to be produced, the singer began to exhibit some of his graces, which the maestro with much delight applauded. Upon a subsequent repetition, however, the beauty of the cantilena was entirely lost in the luxuriance of ornament thrown around it. ROSSINI scarcely recognized his own music; and, aware that every one imitated the favorite VELLUTI, and believing that there would be no more simple melody, since, the fashion once introduced, every vocalist would add whatever embellishments his own taste, uncultivated or otherwise, might suggest, he resolved, perhaps not without a wise design, "to take into his own hands the guidance and management of these inevitable graces: he would not leave room for a single appoggiatura: but the ornaments should form an integral part of the music and be all written down in the score."

Another anecdote which, if well founded, would indicate that the celebrity of ROSSINI for having thus originated a new school, came near being disputed by another resident of the same city, is to the effect that one PETINI, a painter of no small genius, who also gave promise of becoming a musician of eminence and whose musical compositions were thought not a little to resemble his illustrious contemporary, after having heard the "Pietra del Paragone" of the latter at La Scala, was observed to become silent and melancholy: and when, a few days after, being found diligently at work at his easel, he was asked why no longer traces of music were to be found about him, he replied: "Ah! you see I have abandoned music: there can be but one composer in that style, and he, ROSSINI, was born a year before me."

If it be true that this rival had the genius asserted, it was a foolish whim which deprived the world of another candidate for musical fame. For there are clearly no two composers of decided celebrity whose works do not bear as distinct marks of individuality, of idiosyncrasy, as are found in the verses of different poets, or the pictures of different painters.

MIDNIGHT WIND.

BY C. P. CRANCH.

Wind of cloudy, bleak November,
Falling, rising through the night,
As I watch each dying ember
By my lamp's low softened light,
Sadly, vaguely I remember
Hours of sorrow and delight.

Rushing through the midnight dreary,
Thou art like a spirit's sigh,
Mourning o'er some land of Faery
He had known in infancy—
So I muse till I am weary—
Would the wind would pause and die!

Cease, O memory, to taunt me
With the far off scent of flowers—
Cease, O midnight wind, to haunt me
With the ghosts of buried hours—
Hope, draw near and disenchant me, Brightest of Angelic Powers!

Grisi in Norma.

The rentrée of Grisi is always a festival for the habitués of the Italian Opera. Her Norma—the Norma of Pasta—majestic, passionate and terrible, is one of those efforts which time and experience have matured into perfection. Even where the voice fails—that voice which for eighteen years, without intermission, has moved and enchanted us—the spirit within makes up for every physical deficiency, the soul shines through the face, and speaks with a force that is irresistible. It has become a platitude to write that "Grisi's voice is still fresh and strong and sonorous," or that "Grisi's energy is unimpaired." Season after season it has been written; nor is it easy to guess at the period when it shall cease to be true. Warmed by the enthusiastic reception accorded her on Thursday night, the great singer and greater actress, having safely passed the ordeal of the cavatina ("Casta Diva"), always, with Grisi, the bridge which conducts from uncertainty to triumph, threw herself into the part with all her power, and her "Ah non tremare, o perfido," was given with an impetuosity that made poor Pollio look aghast, and electrified the audience. . . . The curtain fell amidst the loudest applause, and a general recall for Grisi, who came forward with Signor Tamberlik.

The second act, even more than the first, brings out the powers of Grisi as a tragic actress. The scene with the children, in which the feelings of the mother prevail over the strong desire of vengeance; that in which Norma first summons the Druid warriors to arms, and afterwards confesses herself the priestess who has sacrificed her vows; the interview with Pollio, where she alternately supplicates and menaces the traitorous proconsul; and last, not least, the petition to Oroveso, "Deh! non voleri viltine," when Norma, regardless of her approaching fate, thinks only of her children, were not less impressive than on former occasions. In short, the Norma of Grisi retains in full force those salient qualities to which it owes its reputation as one of the most remarkable performances of the operatic stage.—London Musical World.

OLE BULL.

The announcement of a concert in Boston again by the gifted and eccentric Norwegian, after an absence of eight years or more, could not fail to excite a good deal of interest. Eight years ago he came to America, the pioneer of the other world-renowned virtuosos, into this wild wilderness musical taste. Then he bewitched thousands in all our cities by much that was musically genuine, but also by much that pertained, properly to the personal peculiarities of the man, while our musical ignorance set it all down to the musician, the composer, the artist. Indeed there were amusing instances of simplicity in that first enthusiasm about OLE BULL, which can scarcely occur again: thus, when before playing he laid his ear close to his violin, in the very ordinary act of satisfying himself that the strings were properly tuned, the admirers would exclaim: "How he listened to his instrument, as if it had a soul in it and a secret to impart to him, before he commenced," &c. &c. These manifestations of infant marvellousness belong to the past; as a people, we have gained some musical experience within this eight years' interim; we have heard artists, of instrument and voice; we have above all had our attention drawn and held to the intrinsic and enduring charm of great musical compositions; we have wondered at the blazing rockets of mere performers and virtuosos, till all such pleasures palled upon us, and we can never make up such enthusiastic audiences for any solo-player under heaven as we once could.

And yet, looking back, those very instances of semi-musical enthusiasm, at which we smile, proved one thing. They proved that Ole Bull did somehow work upon the imaginations of his hearers, and predispose them to the marvellous; that there was a vein of wild poetry in his nature, which exhibited itself in his music as in all his ways, and which touched the poetic chords in the popular breast. There was no denying the rare magnetism of the man. He had the look and air of genius, its simplicity and thoughtfulness, its sensitive delicacy and rugged strength (as shown in his noble physical build), its childlike cordiality and manly pride. The personality of the man, as conveyed through his music, was what interested everybody; of the music itself, (at all events so far as it laid claim to the character of composition), only very few could judge, and those few were perhaps too exclusively "classical" in their prepossessions, too easily bewildered by any departure from regularity of form, from the established architectural models of musical composition. But now this familiarity with classic form and unity in music has ceased to be confined in our concert audiences to the very few; it has got to be somewhat common, and if it take the form of pedantry in some, in the most it is a sincere and unavoidable and, we may add, a delighted conviction that the real inspiration of genius is what makes forms and consecrates them for ages as models, only not in too strict and unyielding a sense; and that the fugue, the sonata, &c., are not arbitrary moulds, but do exist in nature; and that the most logical of all things, the most subject to an internal law of unity and proportion, is that principle, wayward as it may sometimes seem, which we call Genius. The greatest instances of both, of perfectness and regularity of form (in other words, learning), and of spontaneous native genius, are the Handels, Mozarts, Beethovens, and so on, the very names which head the so-called "classics" of the art. Hence it was inevitable that with our more familiarity with such great masters, we should grow less excitable to the wonderful feats of virtuosity and to rhapsodical and disconnected improvisations, more expressive of intensely restless private moods than of great, steadily unfolding thought.

In re-appearing now, therefore, before a New York or a Boston audience, Ole Bull cannot expect the same enthusiasm as in his first visit. Our whole delight in music has become a calmer and more intellectual matter. Our interest is more in composers than in players; more in orchestras and great choral combinations than in solo-playing; more in enduring musical products than in the most eloquent and skilful utterance through any instrument of merely individual moods. If Ole Bull, in spite of this change (we call it growth) in the public taste, can still produce half the impression that he did eight years ago, it is proof of some rare quality of force in the man. If he can do it playing his own compositions and in spite of the disposition there now is to measure these by the standard of the great works with which we have grown familiar, it is still more proof that there is more of the soul of music in him, than has found outward shape; for it is an absolute fact that most cultivated music-lovers do not like his compositions as such, but find them disjointed, fragmentary, confusing, and oftentimes of a tendency again and again proved false in art, namely, the tendency to attempt descriptions, pictures, narratives of historical scenes and events through tones—a thing in itself so impracticable that the composer finds himself, in spite of himself, in order to get along at all, reduced to cheap expedients of effect that are below himself, to sudden starts and contrasts, orchestral crashes, the introduction and mingling of hacknied popular melodies, and generally the employment of the charm of association, instead of the direct power of music.

We have to confess ourselves, individually, not fond of this kind of thing. We are wearied and confused by any music, however strongly tinged with any national or individual spirit, however expressive in detail, however skilful in execution, and original or bold in its resort to means, or intense in feeling, if it do not at the same time impress us by its unity as a whole, by its development from first to last of one or more pregnant themes. As compositions, therefore, we do not get reconciled to what Ole Bull seems most fond of playing. Perhaps we do not fully seize his idea; and perhaps, too, this is the very fault with his music, that it is too purely subjective, and can never as music convey the author's feeling to another, without the aid of all his own natural language, magnetism, &c., along with the music. Of this Ole Bull does possess a great deal, for he does interest exceedingly the greater portion, and in not a few cases the most cultivated and appreciating individuals of the audience before whom he plays.

The true thing to be said of him is what has been said by many critics, that he is not to be judged by the usual standards; that his genius (and he has genius) is exceptional, intensely individual in all its forms and methods; that he belongs to the very extreme of the Romantic, as distinguished from the Classical School in art; that he makes use of the violin and the orchestra, in short of music, simply and mainly to impress his own personal moods, his own personal experience, upon his audiences. You go to hear and feel Ole Bull, rather than to hear and feel his music. It is eminently a personal matter.

We do not wonder that some very strict classicists set their faces against him altogether. But a humbug he certainly is not. That is a word very cheaply used. However one may quarrel with Ole Bull's style of music, it is a very genuine, very real, very earnest thing with him; it is that very evidence of earnestness, that look of intelligent absorption in it, that searching of every tone for its utmost of expression, which constitutes much of his hold upon his hearers. He is not a mere mechanician with the bow, not a mere routine variation player. He stands there as if he believed in his music, as if he were making his religious confession of faith. He does it all as if he improvised it, and though oft repeated, still his passages preserve that style.

Considered simply as to executive power, he seems, after hearing so many good violinists for years past, to exceed them all:—always excepting however HENRI VIEUXTEMPS. The breadth and richness of his tone; his power of swelling and attenuating the volume of the single tone; his firm, free use of double stops, making the effect of quartet parts sometimes through a considerable passage; his inimitable cantabile, carried sometimes, we must confess, to a too Italian opera-like excess of lachrimosity; and above all the perfection of his staccato:—all these things are the wonder and delight of musicians, as well as of the crowd.

In his first piece on Wednesday evening, his Concerto in A major, he displayed great command of orchestral combinations; and though the piece was very long and full of sudden changes and surprises, starting many themes and as suddenly abandoning them, still there was a certain wild charm about it all, which one has only to be in the right mood, to enjoy it richly. His Verbena de San Juan, upon an even slenderer thread, strings together several pleasant Spanish melodies, and breathes as warm a Southern atmosphere, as the Concerto was wild and Northern. Here too you felt the poetic impressibility of the man. His "Mother's Prayer" was always a favorite, and we never enjoy him so much as in his slow pathetic movements, though we cannot exempt him from the very charge we make against the Italian singers, that of occasional exaggeration of pathos. His "Carnival of Venice" is to us the boldest, most brilliant, most richly humorous of all the many Carnivals that have been sung to us on strings; nothing better shows his marvels of execution.

Ole Bull was welcomed very warmly, and the applause was frequent and earnest throughout the evening. The enthusiasm was perhaps hardly up to the standard, which he knew of old; but that, as we have shown, could not be possibly again in any concert here, where the individual performer was the central and the sole attraction. He has shown his true appreciation in attaching to himself the "GERMANIANS" for his orchestra. We doubt if any other band in the country could do justice to his music, and so precisely humor all the peculiarities of his strangely ad libitum and tempo rubato style of playing, These old friends, too, had a right hearty welcome back, and it seemed as if their overtures (to Nabucco and Struensee) were more admirably played than ever. And ALFRED JÄELL! who was not happy once more to hear him, and enjoy the liquid purity of his unrivalled touch, not only in some of his usual modern concert pieces, but in the deep, contemplative Andante of Mendelssohn, followed by the fairy-like Capriccio (that old midsummer's dream again dreamed over, and still new—how it haunted the happy Felix all his life!) After this he tossed a pretty bon-hon to the ladies in the shape of a Galop, styled the "Belles of Boston."

OLE BULL's second concert in Boston will take place to-night. He will have the same valuable assistance. We have not seen the programme, but why will he not give us at least one snatch of melody from MOZART, of whom we know him to be a profound and sincere worshipper? Our audiences, after a whole winter of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, &c., in symphony and quartet and sonata, are naturally slow to digest an entire programme of the concert-giver's own composing, though he be ever so great a genius.

MR. GOLDSCHMIDT. A romantic paragraph, credited to The New York Musical World, is going the rounds of the papers, to the effect that Mr. Goldschmidt is the son of a wealthy banker in Hamburg. It is entirely untrue. Although his family name is that of bankers well known upon the continent, Mr. Goldschmidt is the son of a merchant of moderate means, and has made his way entirely by his own merits and efforts. Before coming to this country, he enjoyed an enviable reputation as an artist in his native city, and, to some extent, in Germany, and his situation was so agreeable to his tastes, that it was not until after direct and personal solicitation from Mlle Jenny Lind that he concluded to visit the United States, where, as he had none of the ad captandum talent which is sure of popularity, he had no very glowing vision of success. In every best sense of the word, Mr. Goldschmidt is a gentleman,—a man of so unusual cultivation in art and literature, and of so genial character and manner, that the warmest friends of Jenny Lind could have wished her no fairer fortune than to become Madame Otto Goldschmidt.

The above, from the N. York Tribune, which we know to be strictly true, has saved us the trouble of exposing, as we had intended, the excessive knowingness, by which very enterprising musical, as well as other newspapers, sometimes try to excite the admiration of the curious.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

We call attention to the advertisement of the GERMANIA SERENADE BAND. Their plan of summer afternoon concerts is just the thing, so long as we have not yet the conveniences for music in the open air; and the pecuniary cost of the entertainment is really "next to nothing." We have always listened to their brass instrument performances with great pleasure, and now they make up quite a little orchestra besides, embracing some of our very best musicians.

New York.

A new wave of musical excitement is already beginning to rise here, in the daily expectation of ALRONI, who, it appears, was to sail on the 26th ult. in the Hermann, instead of on the 17th, as was falsely rumored.

The PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY gave their last public rehearsal last Saturday afternoon. SCHUMANN's Second Symphony was the main feature.

We were present the other day at a private matinée musicale, of a very classic character, where a parlor full of amateurs listened to the entire Sephora of Beethoven, played in the original form, with wind and string instruments. There was also a string Quartet by Haydn, a Trio (for piano, violin and cello) by Beethoven, and another by Mendelssohn.—Why are not these things more common among music-loving families who possess the means?

A concert is announced for Monday evening in Metropolitan Hall, by one Signor C. BASSINI, who, it would seem, is a "distinguished violinist," though he appears unheralded. He is to be assisted by Madame DE VRIES, Signora VIETTI, Signor ARDITI, and Monsieur MIQUEL. The last named gentleman we lately heard in private; he is an excellent violoncellist in classical as well as brilliant concert music; a composer too in both forms, and a member of the Conservatoire in Paris.

We have received the following, which speaks for itself. We can only say, it is right that they who did a good thing should have the credit of it; and that the Serenade was really a good one, our own ears testified. It was an awkward thing to manage,—a whole orchestra in Broadway, at 1 o'clock in the morning; but rarely have we heard Mendelssohn's Nocturne more beautifully played.

NEW YORK, May 31, 1852.

DEAR SIR,—Having seen several erroneous statements regarding the farewell serenade, given to Madame Goldschmidt on Friday night, (28th inst.,) I beg leave to state, that said serenade was given by the American Musical Fund Society, the orchestra consisting, with few exceptions, of members of the Philharmonic and Musical Fund Societies. In addition to the pieces, performed by this orchestra, Mr. Dodworth and his excellent Band, who had kindly volunteered their service, played "a Duet from Semiramide," and "Home, sweet home." The Germania Musical Society took no share whatever in the Serenade. The whole party was accompanied by about two hundred firemen, who, on invitation, had consented to assist in this farewell demonstration to a lady to whom the members of the Musical Fund Society, as well as those of the fire department are so much indebted.

The pieces, played by the orchestra, were as follows: 1. Hail Columbia and Yankee Doodle; 2. Nocturno, from Midsummer Night's Dream; 3. Jubilee Overture, by Weber; 4. Wedding March, from Midsummer Night's Dream.

If you will please to insert the above in your paper, you will confer a great favor upon your obedient servant,
JOHN C. SCHERFF,
Secretary A. M. F. S.

PARODI, with the aid of STRAKOSCH and his lady, (late Signorina PATTI) has been delighting the Philadelphians with concerts. Her last in America takes place this week.

Madame ANNA BISHOP is at Charleston. She has visited thirty or forty towns and cities on her "farewell musical tour" West and South, and given 120 concerts, and is expected to close the whole in a dramatic concert in New York by the end of this month.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. Crivelli's Norma is thus spoken of by the Musical World:

"Crivelli adheres, and will we hope adhere, to her own original conception of the opening portion of the opera. She preserved the same haughty elevation, the same priestess-like isolation from her companions, to which we referred, with an expression of concurrence in her reading, when she first appeared in Norma. . . . As a mere vocalist, Crivelli has long attained a position, enviable indeed, but one which, had she remained only a vocalist, we should have spared ourselves the pain of doing much more than registering, and so leaving. It is as a lyric artist, in the best sense of the word, that we desire to judge her, and it is as a lyric artist that, if we appreciate her aright, she would desire to be judged. Hence, in recurring to her personations, having once or more often reported a feat of voice, done justice to a masterly progress on the ascending scale, or recorded a long-held note, we have cared less to preserve a series of 'acoustic observations,' than to remark how a fine and complete conception is retouched and heightened. Crivelli's position is independent of musical notation."

Her Rosina, we learn from the same source, was one of the most brilliant performances ever witnessed. Her singing throughout, delicious, and at times, perfectly startling from its novelty and electric force. The Morning Chronicle says:

"Crivelli's Rosina is one of the most charming of her personations, and displays to great advantage the rich fund of vis comica which she possesses. Her exquisite delivering of the celebrated aria d'entrata is one of the most perfect specimens of execution ever heard on the lyric stage."

Besides these roles, she had appeared in Leonora (Fidelio), which is called her grandest achievement, and may be classed with any performance of the modern lyric stage. In a histrionic point of view, it is simple, chaste, grand and natural; and, in the singing exquisitely beautiful.

The Cenerentola has been produced at this establishment, in which Mdlle. ANGRI appears to have made a decided hit, which is the more surprising and creditable to her, as it has been a part so exclusively monopolized by Albini, that no other singer has of late ventured to undertake it. Her conception of the character exhibited a refreshing simplicity and naïveté, while her execution of the music was uniformly excellent. She was well supported by Lablache, as Don Magnifico, and by Belletti and Calzorari as Don Ramiro and Dandini. The opera was repeated with undiminished success.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. Meyerbeer's grand opera, the Huguenots, was brought out on May 1, with the usual splendor, to a crowded and brilliant audience, including the Queen and Prince Albert. On this occasion MARIO made his first appearance for the season. We find in the Musical World the following notice of him.

"Viewed as a whole, Mario's dramatic personification of Raoul has lost none of its vigor and romantic beauty. Full of tenderness and passion, where tenderness and passion are required, lofty and noble in the heroic incidents, it is as complete and striking a picture of the chivalrous Protestant gentleman of France in the sixteenth century, as painter could draw or poet imagine. The great musical 'points,' however, which Meyerbeer has placed at the disposal of the singer, did not come out on Saturday night as we have heard them formerly, when Mario could and would outshine all competition. Whether, being 'out of sorts,' as we have already hinted, the 'physique' refused to obey the impulse from within, or whether, as some suspect, and we should regret to believe, the strength and bloom of the most perfect tenor voice of the age are on the decline, we cannot undertake to decide."

But if Mario was "out of sorts," Grisi was not, and came to the rescue right gallantly. The same authority says: "Grisi never played Valentine so finely as on Saturday night, never acted so earnestly, and never sang the music with more fire and energy. She did not allow a single point to escape that was likely to sustain the interest of the audience and prevent the excitement from subsiding into apathy." Herr Formés sustained the part of Marcel, the brave, rough and bigoted old Huguenot soldier, one of the most striking and original conceptions in the whole range of operatic creation. He dressed and looked the character to perfection, and in several passages, including the famous "Piff paff" song, created a prodigious sensation. Castellan, Mdlle. Seguin, and Polonini also appeared. The opera was repeated the following Tuesday, when Mario sang with all his pristine grace and vigor. Don Giovanni was brought out May 6 not very satisfactorily. Ronconi as the Don is admitted on all hands to have made a complete failure. Says the Gazette: "He felt his incompetence from beginning to end, and went through the performance, like Atlas with a world on his shoulders." Marini was the Leporello of the occasion. Grisi, Castellan, and Tamberlik also appeared.

MDLLE. WAGNER. The controversy between Messrs. Lumley and Gye, with reference to this lady has at length been decided in favor of the former, who has obtained from the Vice Chancellor a permanent injunction, prohibiting Mdlle. Wagner from singing in any theatre except her Majesty's or under his direction. Had the decision of the court been otherwise, it is said that Lumley would have been, as regards financial matters, in a desperate condition. He has only CRIVELLI to rely upon as an offset to the overwhelming display of talent at the rival House, and too frequent appearances are said to be exhausting her powers. Meanwhile the Londoners are amusing themselves with a rumor that Madame GOLDSCHMIDT has offered her services to Lumley for eight nights, to enable him to make up for immense pecuniary losses during the season.

THE CONCERTS. These appear to be as numerous and well attended as ever, and as usual include performances by the first artists of the day. At the Philharmonic, Mendelssohn's Sinfonia in A, long neglected, has finally conquered public indifference and become an established favorite, equally popular with the Pastorale, the C minor, or the Jupiter. The performance of this great work by the orchestra, under Mr. Costa's direction, is pronounced to have been nearly faultless. Beethoven's Symphony in B flat, a Double Quartet by Spohr, Macfarren's Overture to Don Quixote and one by Romberg, with vocal music by Herr Formés and Miss Pynce completed the programme. The old Society seems to be as popular and well supported as ever and does not yield an inch to its vigorous young rival.

FERDINAND HILLER, the fellow student and successor of Mendelssohn in the direction of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipzig, gave a musical matinée to his friends on May 6, at which selections from his works were performed. Mr. Hiller, who is known as one of the most accomplished musicians in Europe, was assisted by Joachim, who has the violin, by Piatti on the violoncello, and by the celebrated Mlle. Clauss. The whole performance was an intellectual treat of the highest order.—EMILE PRUDENT. This distinguished pianist, not the least shining of that galaxy of great musicians now congregated in London, has given his first concert to a crowded and appreciative audience. He played two morceaux with orchestral accompaniments and two solos, his own compositions, and his success was as complete as it was well deserved. He is pronounced an almost unrivalled pianist in what is called the "romantic school." A fine orchestra, conducted by Hector Berlioz, assisted. Jetty Treffz and Reichart were the vocalists.—Mr. AGUILAR, a talented composer and pianist, gave his annual concert on May 5th, assisted by a picked orchestra, comprising the most eminent instrumentalists of the Italian Operas, and by such singers as Madame Novello, Jetty Treffz, Formés and Reichart.—Mr. BRINLEY RICHARDS, another accomplished pianist, has given the first of a series of concerts, chiefly of instrumental music, comprising selections from the classics.—BRAHAM. This veteran singer apparently gains in favor with his audiences as he approaches the verge of life, and his recent appearance at the London Wednesday Concerts was hailed with renewed applause. He was supported by Jetty Treffz, Herr Staudigl and other eminent talent.—M. Billet's last concert of the series of six, and Mr. Neate's last soirée are spoken of with high commendation. The programmes presented were excellent, and the performances of the highest order of merit. Herr Jansa's second soirée and the concert of the Beethoven Quartet also receive high praise.

Paris.

The French Musical Journals are much taken up in the criticism of Le Juif Errant. La France Musicale republishes an article written by the editor immediately after the first performance of this new opera, which, it says, "does not entirely satisfy those who regard as an enemy every critic whose enthusiasm will not go to the full extent of pronouncing at once every new opera, whatever it may be, which is represented at the Académie Nationale de Musique, to be a chef d'œuvre." Since the first representation it has undergone considerable changes; has been cut down in length, and the noise of the instruments has been much abated. The article referred to begins thus: "We have seen and heard so much and so many things in the new Babel that has just been presented to us at the opera, that we have a kind of vertigo in the head. Good God! What machinery, what admirable scenery, what rich and picturesque costumes, what a dazzling mise en scène! What a glorious thing for the musician to serve as an accessory in the spectacle of this scene which draws all the attention and absorbs every beholder! It is only necessary to display these magnificent decorations, these formidable paintings which call into play all the art of perspective; the public would come of its own accord, and the Opera could thus be spared the expense of orchestra and singers! In truth it is an odious system, and most deplorable for music. You go in to hear the composition of a master, and coming out, the bewildered crowd, fascinated by the magnificence of the stage, speaks only of what it has seen; it forgets the musician. Was ROSSINI obliged, in order to captivate the crowd, to have recourse to the seductions of painting, the pawing of horses? Did he need diabolical fireworks with troops of green nuns; the abysses of hell, the sun and moon throned majestically in the clouds, or instruments of copper, whose clang is even more stunning than the chains of hell? Perhaps we shall be told: Give us another ROSSINI. It is not our concern. We would have music without artifice, with true melody, with light inspiration, tender and passionate, with poetry of the heart, with real emotion in the sentiments which the characters are to express. Whence came the power of ancient art! From the ideal which inspired the musicians. Did Greece know anything of this balderdash of science that is now dragged upon the stage and into the orchestra as giving a title to applause! Music has become material; it is no longer in heaven, in the enchanted realms of space, that our modern Promethei seek to steal the sacred fire of poetry. Their leaden wings cannot lift them above the earth; their psalmic chants sound only of lamentations; the problem is resolved how to compose dramatic music without ideas. Mathematics and algebra have replaced invention and hold the place of Genius."

M. FETIS père in the Gazette Musicale in a long article, takes the other side and gives high praise to the Juif Errant. He finds "melody in abundance which always bears the stamp of distinction"; and prophecies for the opera a success which shall be universal and of long duration. He says further: "The execution has contributed not a little to their success from the very first representation. Madame TEDESCO (who took the part of Theodora), one of the principal in the opera, has performed it as an artist of the finest talent. Her voice—whose rare compass unites the low tones of a vigorous contralto with the high notes of a soprano, is perfectly homogeneous and of a single register. Her vocalization indicates study of the best schools of singing; her style is elevated, her conception is active and full of passion; and her grand manner of terminating phrases shows that she is self-possessed and understands how to regulate the spontaneity of her inspirations. Sufficiently dramatic, she represents well her character, without falling into the exaggerations of stage effect. In this particular she has a great advantage over Mlle. ALBONI, who, in all operas, is only a very fine Concert-singer. Madame TEDESCO seems to me destined to be the great resource of the administration of the opera.

Concerts seem to be the rage in Paris not less than in London. In the list of concert givers we find the names of Alary, Offenbach, Gerdaldy, Gouffé, Louis Lee, Mulder, Stamaty and Lotto. In a notice of a concert by Lotto, who is a young prodigy of a violinist ten years old, the France Musicale discourses thus profoundly of BACH: "Madame Massart executed a concerto of Bach, with quintet accompaniment. This Concerto is nothing more than a fugue in disguise. Ever since the beginning of the winter, the fugues of Bach have persecuted us with an implacable animosity which we can only compare to the ennui which we experience from his superannuated harmonies, his anticipated tunes, his chopping and monotonous notes. This time, the fugue did wisely to come in company with the charming Madame Massart. We are sure that, if we had not been detained by the clear and brilliant execution of the virtuose, we should have executed ourselves a preliminary fugue which would have lasted up to the present time, so much does this old times music dismay and chagrin us."

SPOHR'S GRAND VIOLIN SCHOOL, being an exact reprint of the latest European editions, with all the author's new revisions and improvements. One volume, quarto. Price, $3.

* Among the many peculiar excellencies of this Violin School one is remarkable, that the Elementary Instructions do not precede the practical portion of the work as in other Schools, but are combined therewith; by this union the pupil is enabled to take the Violin in hand at the first lesson; in fact, he should and must then commence with it. The author's knowledge, as observable in his Preface, is no small addition to the truly practical distinctions of this School; his style is simple, clear, noble, and elegant, alike attractive and useful as a standard to the pupil as to the master.

Czerny's Exercises in Velocity. (30 Etudes de la Vitesse,) preceded by Nine New Introductory Exercises, and concluded by a New Study on Octaves, (composed expressly for this edition,) for the Piano Forte. From the Nineteenth London Edition, with Notes. By J. A. HAMILTON. In three Numbers. Price of each, 50 cents. Complete in one volume, $1.25.

* Calculated to develop and equalize the fingers, and to insure the utmost brilliancy and rapidity of execution.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION OF The Seminary Class Book of Music, designed for Seminaries, High Schools, Private Classes, etc., containing Elementary Instructions, Vocal Exercises, Solfegios, and a copious selection of Secular and Sacred Songs, Duets and Trios. By E. L. WHITE and T. DISSELL.

* The above work has been before the public only one year, yet it has become a universal favorite, and is used in all parts of the Union. During the past year every inquiry has been made in order to ascertain in what way it could be improved and made fully equal to the wants of those for whom it is intended, and from suggestions thus obtained the publisher has been induced to add to and in other ways improve it. It is now pronounced to be exactly what is wanted, and as such it is offered to the public.

The above books can be obtained in large or small quantities of the publisher, 115 Washington St., and of music dealers and booksellers generally throughout the United States and Canada. 7 tf

FREDERIC CHOPIN.

BY FRANZ LISZT.

VIII.

In the year 1836 GEORGE SAND had published not only her Indiana, Valentine and Jacques, but also the Lelia, that poem, of which she afterwards said: "If I am sorry that I wrote it, it is only because I cannot write it again. Since I once more find myself in a similar mood of mind, it would be a great relief to my heart, could I commence this work again anew."* In fact the water-coloring of romance must have seemed very flat to her, after she had guided the chisel and hammer of the sculptor and made those half colossal statues, modelled those great lines, those broad half-surfaces, those contorted muscles, which in their monumental repose still exercise a seductive power that makes one dizzy, and which, if we look long at them, move us painfully, as if, reversing the Pygmalion miracle, the loving artist had imprisoned a live Galatea, in the full tide of bliss and love, in stone, and stifled her breath and stiffened her blood, in order to perpetuate her beauty. When nature is thus transformed into a work of art, love is not added to our admiration, but on the contrary we sadly realize how love can be transformed into admiration.

About that time George Sand heard a friend of Chopin, one of those musicians, who had most joyfully received him on his arrival in Paris, frequently speak of this extraordinary artist. She heard how more than his talent, how his poetic spirit was renowned; she became acquainted with his compositions and admired their love-inspired grace. The richness of feeling in these poems, the outpourings of a heart full of nobleness in such exalted tones, made a deep impression on her. Some countrymen of Chopin spoke to her of the women of their nation with an enthusiasm, at that time considerably heightened by the fresh recollection of the exalting sacrifices, which so many noble Polish ladies had made in the last war. She discerned through these descriptions and through the poetic effusions of the Polish artist the ideal of a love, which took the forms of a worship of Woman. She dreamed, that here, guarantied against all dependence and safe from all oppression, her part would rise to the fairy power of a Peri, that higher nature friendly to mankind.

She was no stranger in the regions of the supernatural world; nature seemed before her, as before a favored daughter, to have unloosed her zone, revealing to her all the charms, the humor, the graceful freaks of beauty. The same glance which could embrace the largest proportions, did not scorn to trace the play of colors on the wings of a butterfly and to study the marvellous web, which the fern spreads like a canopy over the woodberries; she loved to hear the murmur of the brook, to listen to the chirp of the cricket on the stubble field and to follow the maliciously beckoning dance of the jack-o'-lantern over the marshes and damp grass of the meadows. In her slumber she was visited by those "unknown friends out of that land of fantasy, in which our actual life seems like a half-vanished dream"; she played with the images of the legend and knew every secret of the spirit-world.

She was eager to become acquainted with the mortal, who had winged his way up to those fields, "which words cannot describe, but which must exist somewhere on earth or on one of those planets, whose light we love to contemplate in the woods, when the moon is sinking,"—that artist, whose love, whose longing drew him away over the clouds, into the azure regions, after an Impossible. But ah! there too are suns extinguished, the noblest constellations of the Pleiads vanish, stars fall like gleaming dew-drops into a Nothing, whose abyss we do not know; and if the soul loses itself in the contemplation of these savannahs of the æther, this blue Sahara with its circling oases, it gradually sinks into a melancholy mood, which is neither frightened away again by inspiration nor by wonder.

Had George Sand a presentiment of this incurable melancholy, which finally gets possession of every imagination, that wastes itself in the pursuit of dreams, the reality whereof exists not in this world? Had she anticipated the shape, which in such imaginative natures is at length assumed by the highest attachment and the most perfect self-surrender, sentiments to them synonymous with the word love? How shall one seize the secret of these self-concentrated characters, which close upon themselves as suddenly, as those flowers, which shut their cups before the least unfriendly breath, only to open them again in the rays of a propitious sun? Such natures have been called "rich through exclusiveness," in opposition to those "rich through overflowing fullness." "If they meet and attract one another, yet can they not pass into one another; one of the two must consume the other and leave nothing but its ashes." Yes truly! those are such natures as the frailly constituted artist, to whose memory these lines are dedicated; they go down, consuming themselves, since they will and can live only the one life, that answers to the demands of their Ideal.

Chopin seemed at first to have a certain shrinking from this lady, who was so prominent above all others and like a Delphic priestess uttered so much, which others might not utter. He avoided, he postponed meeting her. George Sand knew not, suspected not this sylph-like fear; she approached him, and her look soon dissipated the prejudice, which he till then had obstinately cherished against literary women.

In the autumn of the year 1837 he became subject to attacks of a malady, which from that time left him scarcely more than half his vital energy. Alarming symptoms showed themselves and compelled him to travel to the south, to escape the severe winter air. Madame Sand, who was always so watchful and sympathizing for the afflictions of her friends, would not allow him to travel alone, since his situation demanded so much care and nursing, and she resolved to accompany him. They selected the isle of Majorca for their place of abode, because there the sea air, together with the mild climate, is very beneficial to weak lungs. Although he had so serious an attack at his departure, that his friends hardly expected to see him again, yet he survived there a long and painful sickness and his health became so far

Was it the climate alone, that called him back to life? Did not life enchain him by its highest charm? Perhaps he only remained in life, because he willed to live; for who knows where the rights of the will over our bodies leave off, where the dominion of the soul over matter ceases? All the rays of fortune fell upon Chopin at this period together, and as, when the sun's rays are united in the focus of a crystal, this fragile hearth kindles a flame that has nothing earthly, so was his life rekindled by those rays and then shone the brightest. There in solitude, washed on all sides by the blue waves of the Mediterranean, overshadowed by citron trees, he inhaled the air, for which natures, that here below have no home, feel an eternal home-sickness, — the air of that dreamed of land, so easily discovered in spite of all reality and of all hindrance, if two seek it, — the air of that home of the Ideal, whither one would fain take with him all that is fair and dear to him, and say like Mignon: Dahin, dahin lass uns ziehn!

During the whole time of his sickness Madame Sand never for a moment left the bed-side of the man, who loved her until death and with a fervor, that did not lose its strength when its joy was departed, and even then continued faithful to itself, when it had become painful; "for it seems, as if the declining nature of the tone-poet had consumed itself in the focus of admiration for that woman. Others seek happiness in their affections; when they no longer find it there, the affections themselves gradually disappear. So it is with almost all: but he loved for love's sake. No suffering could turn him from it. His love could pass after the intoxication of delight into the phase of sorrow; but grow cold it could not. The moment of becoming cold would have been the ceasing of the heart to beat, for his love had become his life."

In fact Madame Sand had become a super-earthly being for Chopin, who had chased away the shadows of death from his bed. She cherished him with that all-anticipating, fond care, which is oftentimes more healing than the remedies prescribed by the physician's art. All the while she knew nothing of fatigue, of exhaustion, of ennui; neither her powers, nor her spirit surrendered before the task. At length the malady abated and "the presentiment of death, which gnawed at Chopin's heart and undermined all tranquil satisfaction, gradually moved further off: the cheerful, amiable spirit of his friend put to flight the gloomy thoughts, the dark foreboding, and rekindled his spiritual life." Joy stepped into the place of cloudy anxieties with the victorious uprising of a beautiful day, which dawns on the horizon after a gloomy night of terrors.

The recollection of the days, which he had spent upon the isle of Majorca, remained in Chopin's heart like the memory of an ecstatic bliss, such as fate vouchsafes but once to its most favored one. In later years he always spoke of this period with deep emotion and thankfulness, as of a benefaction equivalent to the happiness of a lifetime, and without any hope that it could ever be possible to find a like blessedness on earth: "The world had no joys more after this."

The glorious countries, which the poetess and the musician wandered through together, made however a sharper impression on the fancy of the former. The beauties of nature had their effect, to be sure, on Chopin: his soul was moved by them and felt in harmony with their enchantment, but without intellectually analyzing it. As a genuine musician he contented himself with seizing and spiritualizing the impression of the feeling from the pictures that he saw, and he turned his attention not so much to the plastic part, to the picturesque exterior, which belonged not to his art.

After 1840 his health declined by steady intermissions. The weeks, which he spent every summer on the Nohant estate, he counted for several years as his best moments. There he worked with satisfaction and every year brought several compositions back with him: but the winter always increased his sufferings. It became difficult, and soon impossible, for him to move about. In the winter of 1846-7 he could scarcely walk any more, and he could not go up stairs without painful strictures in the chest: from this time forward he respite his life only by the greatest forethought and carefulness.

In the opening of the spring of 1847 he grew worse from day to day, and he became so sick, that they despaired of his recovery. He spoke during this sickness frequently and almost with exclusive partiality of the Sand, without bitterness and without reproach. Tears came into his eyes at the mention of her name, and the recollection of past days was to him a painful consolation.

In spite of the diversions, by which his friends sought to turn him from the subject, he always came back to it, as if he wanted to destroy life by the recollection of the feeling, which had made life beautiful, and to stifle himself in this deadly aroma. In vain they tried to remove his thoughts from this object; he kept continually speaking of it — and when he spoke of it no longer, did he not continue to think of it? It was as if he would have sucked in this poison, that he might not have to breathe it too long.

Would that in the limited number of days that were meted out to him, he could have been spared the bitter pang, that set a goal to them! As a tender and at the same time fiery soul, which needed much however for its inward contentment in its fine feeling and its sensibility to impressions ungenial to his nature, he could have satisfied himself only among the shining forms, which his creative art evoked, and with the noble pain of living for his fatherland, to which he had given a place of refuge in his breast. But he became a further victim, and a noble and exalted victim of that momentary attractive power of two natures striving in opposite directions, which in their sudden meeting feel a surprising charm, which they take for a lasting feeling, and raise to the level of this feeling hopes and promises, which they can never realize. At the vanishing of the dream, that one of the two natures, which is the tenderest and most full of feeling, the most absolute in its hopes and inclinations, and to which it is impossible to transfer these, will be the one to wilt and crumble away. Fearful power of the most beautiful and noble gifts of man! How often they drag after them the torch of desolation, like the horses of the sun, when the unheeding hand of Phaeton gives them loose reins!

(To be concluded in our next.)

MEMORIES.

FROM TENNYSON'S "PRINCESS."

Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean,
Tears from the depth of some divine despair
Rise in the heart and gather to the eyes,
In looking on the happy autumn fields,
And thinking of the days that are no more.

Fresh as the first beam glittering on a sail,
That brings our friends up from the underworld,
Sad as the last which reddens over one
That sinks with all we love below the verge;
So sad, so fresh, the days that are no more.

Ah, sad and strange, as in dark summer dawns
The earliest pipe of half-awaken'd birds
To dying ears, when unto dying eyes
The casement slowly grows a glimmering square;
So sad, so strange, the days that are no more.

Dear as remember'd kisses after death,
And sweet as those by hopeless fancy feign'd
On lips that are for others; deep as love,
Deep as first love, and wild with all regret;
O death in life, the days that are no more.

How to Play a Grand Flute Solo.

Every concert-goer will see the point of C. Sharp's advice to his friend on the eve of playing a grand Flute Concerto Solo. We find it in an old London paper:

My advice to Mr. P.

My dear Phunniwistl, as soon as your turn arrives you will of course keep the audience waiting some little time in expectation — it does them good, whets the appetite, and makes them envious: stay until they get tolerably fidgetty, and then make your appearance. Now mind! a grand Concerto always begins with a row — or else it cannot be grand; so tell your friend who "just scored it" for you, not to spare the brass. Well then, you commence with a crash, key of C, all the instruments starting in unison. Now the strain moves onward, Andante maestoso, you stauding watching your music, with your flute cast negligently into the hollow of your arm, and your head as gracefully on one side, as you can manage to get it. Having told your friend on what popular air you have composed your concerto, or fantasia, he will, if he be a clever fellow, touch upon it a little during the introduction, while you occasionally, only occasionally, mind me — will put the flute to your lips, and play a bar or two of it, just to show the folks you could play the introduction, if it was not "infra dig," and you happened to be in the humor; however, let that pass. The orchestra are reaching a climax, climbing, climbing, and bearing your flute on the top of their accumulated harmony, until you all come together upon another crash, more stupendous, if possible, than the first. Dominant seventh upon C, you holding the tip-toppermost B flat. The crash over, the orchestra is silent, leaving you floating in the air with your aforesaid B flat, a long, liquid, melting, streamy note, which you hold out as long as you can without endangering the wind pipe, or getting too red in the face. Then come scattering and tumbling down as fast as possible, with all sorts of skips and hops, quirps and quirks, and trills, and the various other beauties of which the instrument is so susceptible, until you settle somewhere about the middle of the lower octave, upon a serious, right down, hearty shake; which pump out there, as long as your strength lasts; then suddenly pitch it up an octave higher, and then, if you can, an octave higher still, and then drop gradually, and gently, and sweetly, by a chromatic passage, down again into the tune.

Now as to this tune, I will suppose you have chosen one of the most popular airs of the day — "Polly put the kettle on," for instance — for in composing either a fantasia, or concerto, it is not essentially necessary that the air, any more than the scoring for the orchestra, should be bonâ fide your own work. "Polly put the kettle on," will make an excellent theme, and from the rarity with which it is heard in a concert room, will doubtless be the more strikingly effective. Therefore, "Polly put the kettle on." Having finished the favorite air with two cadenzas, the second longer than the first, and the first too long for any thing, the orchestra will take it up, and play it once through. That being well over, you gather up your features into a look of fierce determination, and come at once to the scratch; you set off almost by yourself, with a something that can be "better felt than described;" something wonderfully and terrifically difficult; something prestissimo, of course, full of awful skips from the lowest note to the highest, and corresponding dives down again, mingled with chromatic runs, and relieved by occasional groups of triplets and sextets, and other lets and tets, and whatever those divisions of time are called by which the performer is directed to play innumerable hemi-demi-semi-quavers in the time of one whole one; and then you wind up the variation, if it may be so styled, with a sky-rocketty sort of a rush, from the lowest C of the instrument, inconceivably wonderful, and there will ensue a sort of struggle between the audience and the orchestra, the former making the windows rattle with their plaudits, the latter trying to be heard in "Polly put the kettle on"—which it repeats as if on purpose to show how extremely original, and unlike the air, the variation really was.

Here a pause of some little duration must intervene. Then do you commence; but under far different circumstances; your countenance must have lost its joyous gaiety, and have assumed a sombre, lacrymose expression (if you could put on rouge, and then contrive, in turning your head round towards the orchestra, to rub it off with your pocket handkerchief, it would have a capital effect;) the flute must be raised slowly and sadly to the lips, while a low, tremulous, sorrowful note will announce to the expectant audience the commencement of the Adagio con molto espressione. Now, to perform an adagio, or compose an adagio, is generally held to be a very difficult piece of business; but in this case, nothing will be easier. Your adagio will simply consist of "Polly put the kettle on,"—played in a style of eloquent despondency, slow and hopeless, save that you relieve your mind at every other bar by a strenuous shake, or now and then a prodigious flight of notes, as if too much grief had made you crazy; and then for the conclusion, you must touch the heart in a series of pathetic appeals perfectly irresistible, get up to the top B flat again, shake it gently, then whine down two or three-half tones, and give some other note a shake, and go on whining, and shaking, and sighing, and dying, till all the audience have closed their eyes to hide the nascent tear and it would evidently be dangerous to add to their distress.

Grief is dry. You must, therefore, have something particularly spruce and spirited in store, wherewith to dispel the gloom you have communicated. The Rondo Finale! This time the air may be given in six-eight measure, just by way of showing your musical invention and research. Extended arpeggios, runs, rushes, rattles and screams; with a second edition of the first variation, together with the air played in three parts—that is to say—heard first in the upper regions, with a "phit," "phit," "phit," then down at the bottom with a "burr," and lastly in the middle passage, bobbling away in the form of an accompaniment. So you will proceed with a "phit," "hurr," "bobble," "bobble," "hurr," "phit," setting at last into a brilliant close, which to render positively triumphant, give them one more tremendous chromatic scramble over the whole compass of the instrument, (in two parts if possible,) and then, my dear Phunniwistl, will you come off with flying colors indeed. Then will the electrified audience stamp, shout and rave, with delight. Then will you make your modest retiring bow, and descending into the room, shake hands with your pupils, who, by a previous arrangement, crowd to congratulate you.

Yours, sincerely, C. SHARP.

Do not judge a composition on a first hearing; what pleases you at once, is not always the best. Masters would be studied. Much will become clear to you for the first time in your old age.—Robert Schumann's Musical Life-Maxims.

Music in the past Half Century.

An Address delivered before the Harvard Musical Association, at Cochituate Hall, Boston, Dec. 22, 1851.

BY SAMUEL JENNISON, JR.

On the other hand, the comparative rarity in the musical world of the more lofty species of composition, the Oratorio, is evidence, it appears to me, not only of the greater demand for the diversions of the Opera, but also of the comparative infrequency of the necessary inspiration and science to produce that style of work. A few great productions, however, exist, amid the multiplicity of pieces for the theatre, which show that the impressions of the earlier masters are not yet wholly effaced; and the "Mount of Olives," the "Last Judgment," "The Death of Jesus," "The Palestine," the "Elijah," and "St. Paul," of BEETHOVEN, SPOHR, SCHNEIDER, DR. CROTCH and MENDELSSOHN, with a few others, are specimens of mighty works that have been done in our day. It often seems to me that if one should doubt the superiority of the masters of Oratorio above the greater part of the producers of modern secular musical drama, he need but ask of himself the question: could ROSSINI, could DONIZETTI, have created the "Hallelujah Chorus," "Be not afraid," "The Heavens are telling?" That prayer in "Moses in Egypt," given with the full force of the powerful chorus and orchestra of an Italian troupe, is, it is true, grand and effective; but is it not also true, that in comparison with such chorusses it might have been, so far as the structure is concerned, the production of a tyro?

Indeed, the extent of learning of the German masters we of this generation may almost despair of attaining, when we read the severe criticism which BEETHOVEN, regardless of rules as he was, applied to ROSSINI, after examining the score of The Barber of Seville; "He might have made a good musician, if his master had oftener given him a flogging."

Upon the subject of Musical instruments, and their employment, called Instrumentation—the means by which we derive so large a portion of our enjoyment, and which would seem to demand some notice,—in addition to the very brief allusion time will permit me here to make, let me refer you to two chapters in a small volume translated from the French of M. Fétis for the Boston Academy of Music, and published in this city, about ten years since, entitled "Music Explained," or to its original in your Library, and to the entertaining pages of Mr. Gardner's "Music of Nature."

As for the instruments:—the Oboe no longer retains the eminence it once enjoyed as the haut bois or high wood in the band, having yielded to the flute and piccolo. The flute, which in its earliest days yielded not a little delight with its solitary brass key, to be pressed by the little finger of the right hand, has long dropped the appellation of German flute, which it once bore to indicate the country from which it reoriginated, and now with its load of showy, silver keys, increased from four even to the number of seventeen, has extended its compass downward from its former limit of D, to C, B flat, and in some instances even to A below the staff; and in the form of Böhm and Diatonic, seems destined to admit of a yet greater rapidity of fingering, and to acquire an improved capacity of expression. It is a circumstance worth remarking, and indicating no doubt the inferior estimation in which this instrument has been held by the best writers, that of all the sonatas for the piano-forte, of MOZART and BEETHOVEN, none, I believe, are found, intended for the accompaniment of the flute, while arrangements for the violin are most frequently, and for other instruments occasionally, met with. The flute, in short, as has been acknowledged, still remains unworthy of the rank of a concerto instrument.

The clarinet, which fifty years ago, soon after its introduction, was thought so warlike in its tones, that Napoleon's regimental bands were provided with large numbers of them, to which a prominent place was assigned, has now quite disappeared from the street. The imperfections of this instrument, so valuable in the orchestra, have not yet been overcome; and such is still the falsity of its tones, the performer may be observed to substitute from time to time a second and a third, based upon a different key-note, in the place of that he has been holding.

The serpent has gone quite out of date.

The horn and the trumpet, both introduced into the orchestra within less than a hundred years, have since our boyhood altered their simple appearance by a variety of added valves, tubes, or crooks; and their species have become so numerous under the names of post horn, Sax horn, valve trumpet, corneopon, tuba, opibicleide, &c., that of the distinctions between them few have a distinct idea beyond the dealers and virtuosos themselves. The extensive addition of keys to all this class of wind instruments,—a peculiar feature of the last half century,—while it has enlarged greatly their capacity, has to a considerable extent modified, and at times impaired the original tone; although imparting occasionally a brilliancy which did not formerly belong to them.

The contrabasso, which used to be played with but three strings, is now found in the orchestra with a fourth; and, all unwieldy as it is, has been, in late years, in the hands of a BOTTESINI, made to perform with astonishing success the part of a solo instrument.

The pianoforte, with its more extended key board, has arrived at the boundaries, in both high and low notes, beyond which sounds cease to be capable of discrimination to any practical purpose by the ear.

The last of the performers in London, upon the old viol-da-gamba, the strict bass viol, Charles Frederic Abel, died a short time before the commencement of the present century. Its successor, the violoncello, was, according to the import of its name, the diminutive of the old violone, the largest of the viol family, which was mounted with seven strings, had frets upon its finger board, was supported upon a pedestal when played, and was the precursor of the modern contrabasso, or double-bass. A monster instrument of this species, to which the contrabasso bore the same relation which the violoncello does to that, was added during the last half century, but was soon found to be of no practical value.

The violin alone of all instruments still preserves the same size, shape and number of strings it bore many generations ago; and a Stradivarius, an Amati, a Steiner, a Guarnerius, with the age of two or two and a half centuries upon it, is not only an enviable but a valuable possession.*

Those familiar with this instrument will appreciate the prodigious progress made in playing, since the time of Lulli, one hundred years ago, when the conductor of the orchestra, watching for C in alt (which is reached by extending the little finger,) like a breaker ahead, would cry out a caution to the performers — "Gar l' Ut!" "Look out for the C!" Or since the time of Cramer, the English virtuoso, who, advertising the performance of a Solo at a certain concert, gave notice that "on this occasion only he will reach harmonic E; a feat never performed before." "To reach D, on the third position," writes one, "producing anything in the shape of tone, was in those days considered a miracle; and to bring forth another hitherto unknown sound, harmonic E, was too much; the human mind could scarcely give credit to it."

The Organ; behold it as it was in its infancy, centuries ago, the rudest, most frightful of instruments; the object of its but ten or occasionally fifteen keys merely to accompany with the same note the voice of the singer of plain chant; when each key, three, four, and even five inches in width, required the whole force of the clenched hand to press it down; when to the discordant shriek of brass pipes incapable of soft expression, was added the noise of some twenty or twenty-five pair of bellows, set in motion by the hands of twice or thrice as many strong men.

The Organ; costliest, most majestic of instruments, "whose diapasons," says an old English divine, "could they but articulate, would repeat no text of the Bible, without dignity and reverence;" behold it now in all the grandeur of its dimensions, in the chaste simplicity of its undecorated, or the magnificence of its decorated exterior; listen to it in the soft sweetness of its Dulciana, Flute, Cremona, Clarabella, or the thundering might which bursts forth in thunder tones from its triple banks, on those sonorous words, "Wonderful, Counsellor," and behold there what the ingenuity of man hath wrought, and acknowledge it, in the words of M. Fétis, "one of the noblest inventions of the human mind."

If within this period no fundamentally new modes of producing sound have been discovered, there have appeared such multitudes of new combinations of the old, in a variety of instruments for which names must be obtained, that the inventors have been put to all imaginable shifts to find suitable appellatives.

What numberless compounds of classic words that could be pressed into the service of music! With Melodeon, Harmonica, and Seraphina, all are familiar. But how shall one venture to enumerate Harmonium, Orchestrion, Celestina, Baruchordon, Euphon, Electro-euphon, and Polyplecton, Edophone, Concertina, Glycibarisono, Eumelia, Aëol-harmonica, Eoline, and Eolodion; Aerophone, Terpodion, Kaliffkongon, and the like, which by no means complete the list of those produced within or nearly within the half century?

What may be the final result of the tendency to combine the properties of various instruments, a tendency more familiarly illustrated in the Attachments, so called, to the piano forte, Aëolian, Dolce Campana &c., we cannot pretend to foresee. Questionable as the success of these experiments may still be deemed, it is probable that after the prejudices which usually attend upon the introduction of novelties are laid aside, large additions to the resources of harmony may be eventually acknowledged.

For the Euharmonic Organ, which demands more particular mention, — a revival in name at least, and somewhat in character, of an instrument invented several years ago, the merits of which then created, as this, from its recent exhibition in our city has done, considerable discussion, — nothing less is claimed by its friends than that it will bring about a complete revolution in the science of harmony. They would fain persuade us that the world has hitherto been in a darkness upon which this invention is destined to throw a new and marvellous light.

* Within a very short time, however, an improvement in the violin has been invented in New York, by which, it is said, a common instrument of even the cheapest kind can be made to produce a tone scarcely inferior to that of a favorite Cremona.

Upon so startling a proposition we will dwell no longer than to say, that it seems extremely doubtful whether an attempt to introduce a new system of harmony must not, with that of establishing a new method of phonetic spelling, or of musical notation, of which the recent instances are by no means the only ones, simply have its short day and be forgotten; or whether there are such genuine advantages in the radical changes proposed, that at some future day under the reign of a new order of harmony, the delights of music may have become so intensified that the misuse of the sharpened G for the flat A, and vice versa, will be torture to the ear, and the musical antiquarian, handling our instruments, which make no distinction between these and similar tones, will class us too among the barbarians of a bygone age.

For my own part, when I remember how many a novelty of apparent value and importance, comes to the surface of this ever seething caldron of Time, only to be again submerged and hidden in oblivion, I do not see how any can place confidence in the success of the most promising invention of this nature; and on the other hand, when we remember the acknowledged mysteries of the musical scale, the unsolved problems in musical mathematics, possibly herein in some way awaiting their final elucidation, and when we consider what ages the world and the Art have yet before them, we may well refrain from venturing an unfavorable prediction.

BOSTON, JUNE 12, 1852.

ERRATA. In that portion of Mr. Jennison's excellent address on "Music in the past Half Century," which we gave last week, the word "rapid" was printed for "vapid," and "superficially" for "superficial." Several other inaccuracies, which crept in, will be accounted for by the absence of the writer, owing to which the paper did not receive his revision.

MR. E. F. BAUCKE is authorized to obtain new subscribers for this Journal in the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and to receive the subscription money of the same in advance.

ALBONI.

The great contralto — greatest in the world, with whom no one is ever compared, unless it be ANGRI — arrived in New York on Monday in the Hermann, accompanied by Signori ROVIÈRE and SANGIOVANNI. We have no knowledge of her intended movements in this country, but presume that she will soon be heard in concerts, although much has been said of a certain, indolent, luxurious temperament, which, with independence of spirit and of fortune, may lead her to be in no very hot haste to commence her triumphs just before the dog days. We have seen it intimated that Mr. Niblo is perhaps somehow in the secret of her movements.

Of her past career we have time to glean only a few particulars, at third or fourth hand.

MARIETTA ALBONI was born at Cesena, in 1826, of very honorable parents, and received an excellent education. At the age of eleven she took lessons in music of the celebrated Maestro Baglioli. Eight years after she entered the Lyceum of Bologna, when Rossini was its director. Her first debut was at Milan, in the great theatre of La Scala, where she continued to sing during four seasons. She then sang three engagements at Vienna, and made her mark, like all the first class Italian artists, in St. Petersburg. She left that city in 1845 for Germany, after which time she made no engagements with managers, but sang, as her mood prompted, in the principal cities, sharing in London the triumphs of Grisi, Mario and Tamburini, until she came to Paris, where the rapture of her admirers had no precedent, both at the Italian and Grand Opera houses.

Recently she has been exciting great enthusiasm in Belgium. And her last public appearance was in Paris, on the 13th of May, at a grand solemnity in the theatre of the Palace of Versailles, at which Louis Napoleon assisted. She was the great star of the occasion and astonished and delighted everybody by her singing. The theatre was superbly illuminated, and all the musical authorities of Paris were present. RACHEL, the great tragedian, however, had too much patriotic pride, which could not influence Alboni, being a foreigner. The director of the Grand Opera made propositions to her to sing in Halevy's new opera, Le Juif Errant, and offered to produce expressly for her a piece of Balfe's: Manon l'Escaut, the "cheval de bataille," as it has been called, of Malibran. But she had concluded all the preliminary arrangements for a trip to America.

We have not heard Alboni, but the "Howadji" has, who writes thus in the Tribune:

"Marietta Alboni is about twenty-six years of age, — has great emboupoint, — used to keep her hair clipped short and hanging in her neck, when we heard her two or three years since in Europe — has remarkable self-possession and almost indifference of manner upon the stage, of which Steffanone constantly reminded us, and achieves her glowing triumphs more by the splendor of her voice and her exquisite management of it than by any dramatic genius, in which she is deficient. Her voice is the purest, richest, fullest and sweetest contralto. The limited repertoire for such a voice has induced Alboni, who is singularly restless, with all her languor of temperament, to undertake many parts not strictly within her range; but so remarkable is her voice, so delicious to hear under any circumstances, that we believe she has achieved a success in every part she has undertaken. Two years since, while Paris and the foreign musical world were electrified by the new opera of Meyerbeer, The Prophete, and by the triumph of Viardot, in the rôle of Fides, Alboni, who had never sung in French, (an ordeal from which the most accomplished Italian and German artists shrink before a Paris audience,) quietly studied the part, and upon the departure of Viardot, — amid the doubts, fears, uncertainties, and nervous hopes on the part of her friends, who mistrusted that she was periling her fame — Alboni appeared at the Grand Opera, sang the part in French, and with such success that the feuilletons of all the journals were frantic next morning, in their efforts to discover a word expressive enough to describe a triumph so unexpected and entire. We had the pleasure of seeing her a few evenings afterward, in this Opera, and although we could not share the enthusiasm of the critics for the performance as a whole, because it requires remarkable dramatic power, yet we enjoyed to the utmost, as always before, the wonderful voice with which she illustrated the elaborate music of Meyerbeer. In Rossini's music, in his brilliant finales and scenas, like the Non più mesta, Alboni is wonderful. Her voice pours out of her mouth without the slightest effort, and with irresistible effect, and gushes through the glittering floriture of that style with a sparkling facility which is most fascinating.

'And her voice's music, call it the well's bubbling, the bird's warble.'

The Brindisi, from Lucrezia Borgia, known as the Drinking-song, is another of her exquisite bits of vocalization. She used often to sing it between the acts at the Italian Opera in Paris, and it always excited unmingled enthusiasm.

"The quality of her voice is so sympathetic, that every one, whether he knows or cares anything for music or not, will be pleased as by a delicious sensation, and we shall not be at all surprised if she excites more enthusiasm at her concerts than did Madame Goldschmidt.

"We say this, not having heard her for two years."

OLE BULL'S SECOND CONCERT, last Saturday evening, though not quite so fully attended, was more enthusiastic than the first. Indeed in these times an audience of nine hundred or a thousand, at the dollar price, for a purely instrumental concert, and out of the season, may be considered great success in Boston. The day is past, as we have said before, when solo-playing, even of the most extraordinary and the best appointed in the way of orchestral surroundings, can charm crowds as it once charmed.

Each part was opened by the GERMANIANS with an exquisite fairy overture, exquisitely played: the first, that to "Oberon" — Oberon's Wunder-horn — by Weber, and the second, that to the "Midsommer Night's Dream," by Mendelssohn, — a music, which has now become a quite familiar and delightful part of our existence; we could no more afford not to know it, than we could not to know our Shakespeare.

Ole Bull's pieces, with one exception, were to our taste of the most interesting in his repertoire. Especially so the first piece: Cantabile Doloroso and Rondo Giocoso, in which there was more form and unity of spirit, and a less fatiguing length of restless, shifting, zig-zag wanderings and surprises, than in many of his singularly moody and fantastic compositions. The themes were beautiful and developed with all the beauty of execution and warmth of feeling, which he knows how to throw into whatsoever musical idea he would illustrate. His second piece: "To the Memory of Washington" was much less to our taste, setting out on a false tack, which always has proved fatal to the artist in every department of Art, — namely, with the design of giving an imitative representation, through tones, of a historical period, of a great national struggle, — and forced, in order to get along with it, to resort to mere association, by introducing hacknied patriotic tunes, as Yankee Doodle, piped and screamed alternately with strains of "God save the King," amid discordant tremolos and battle storms of the whole orchestra. Really these seemed very cheap and melodramatic effects. But there was one saving point in it, and that was the magnificent manner in which "Hail Columbia" was harmonized for the orchestra; it made us feel that we have one old national tune with music in it; and we are indebted to Ole Bull for so grandly bringing out its majesty and beauty. Almost equally did we admire his own self-accompanied eloquent version of the same on his violin, preluding to the fuller illustration of the orchestra.

His third piece was as strange in music as in title: "Sounds from Old Norway: Tunes from the Old Mountains, infused through the mighty War Skaldes, in the Independent Spirits or the Young Mountains." We confess to having enjoyed it not a little; it was full of wild, poetic, northern imagination; and though vague as the misty shapes of Ossian, it had the magnetic fascination of genius. In this Ole Bull seemed altogether himself; we are sure, no other violinist could have made anything of his notes; but in his hands it became a natural language of a strong, deep, earnest soul — a kind of wild wind-harp of his intensely feeling, ardent, liberty-loving nature. His Polacca Guerriera is a piece of as decided character as any that he has been in the habit of performing, and still in a great measure justifies some slight notes we made of it eight years ago, to which we now refer from curiosity:

It has a unity and a theme which is easily traced through. The orchestral parts are rich and grand. As they open with the drum-beat and prompt answering chords, he seems a hero at the head of his army, on the eve of a glorious moral conflict, inspired and inspiring all with his great purpose. Then in a thoughtful Andante the violin discourses to itself, as if the hero were reviewing his purpose, communing with his soul to see if it were strong, and committing himself to the great Source of strength; suddenly he awakes from his meditation and with a sweep of the bow, launches the whole orchestra again into the wild battle march; after which follows the animated movement called "Polacca," whose long labyrinth of variations we will not be so idle as to follow with the pen.

In nothing however did he give us so much unalloyed pleasure, on Saturday evening, as in his self-accompanied playing of the "Last Rose of Summer," in answer to an encore. It was exquisitely, feelingly beautiful. And this is one of his greatest arts, which he possesses, so far as we know, beyond all other violinists, — this of "double-stopping" so as to give a full quartet effect; he makes each of the four parts firm and individual, and the middle parts move about like the "figural harmony" in good organ music. His prelude to the melody, too, was full of character.

ALFRED JAEHL played his "Notturmo" and "Carnival" with the usual infallible success, and what was more interesting and more new, Thalberg's beautiful fantasia on themes from Don Juan; a piece of extreme difficulty, but of most perfect grace and symmetry, or it would not be Thalberg. The principal theme is the "Serenade," with Mozart's airy, guitar-like accompaniment. In this the song part was given by the thumb and fore-finger of the right hand, the other three fingers keeping up the arpeggio accompaniment, leaving the left hand wholly free for the bass and full chords. Then the left hand took the melody, while the accompaniment in the right, very rapid, displayed Jaell's astonishing facility in octaves. The frequent allusions afterwards, with every possible surprise of modulation, to the "Minuet," are very skilful, and the whole is wrought up to great unity and completeness of effect. It was one of Jaell's most finished and facile performances, and we agree with his Providence critic, that it was high time that he should be treating his audiences to new pieces. His acquaintance with the best piano forte authors is very extensive, and why should he always give the "Carnival," the "Rigolette," &c.?

Why do we turn away in sadness from one of Ole Bull's concerts! We have had our imagination excited, at least by fits; gleams of real, deeply expressive beauty have ever and anon arrested us; the unmistakable evidences of genius were there: — yet we have missed more than we found; yet the permanent impression is of disappointment. Shall so much genius, so much feeling, so much masterly executive skill and energy, never be embodied in artistic forms of beauty, that shall last! The more he repeats the charm of these fantastic, wild improvisations, the more do we call on him to realize the promise of his nature by becoming a creator, a composer. Or do we ask too much! Are we demanding a Bach's fugue of the wind-harp!

An Opera House in Boston.

We know not how we are to interpret the silence, that has succeeded to the first announcement of a determined plan, on a very ample scale, and on the part of energetic, able men, to supply at once the want our city feels for a first-class Theatre and Opera House. It may be that the cause is slumbering, or it may be that the silence only indicates the certainty and security of the active measures that are in train. We trust, the latter. At all events, if only on the principle that "Necessity is the mother of invention," we believe that the way and means to such a theatre must soon be found; for that the inward and the outward necessity abundantly exist, no lover of music and dramatic art in Boston can for a moment doubt. There is an inward necessity, that this love in a large part of the community should be gratified, unless the interest of late years shown in fine lyrical and other musical performances was all a dream, a passing whim or fashion. A real love of music must build to itself buildings and draw to itself performers. And as to the outward necessity, it seems as if fate had interposed to hasten the climax of the long felt inadequacy of our outward arrangements for such entertainments, by burning down the old theatres, and levelling the "Old Drury" before the encroaching sea of commerce, that now holds all the lower portions of the town submerged.

The initiatory meeting at the Revere House, the character of the movers and the arguments put forth, the Committee charged with shaping out and carrying out the design, and the subscription paper emanating from that Committee (bating the impracticable provision entitling shareholders to free seats), were all such as to impress the community that the thing was really taken up in earnest and would be accomplished. Of course there were many questions about which minds and interests would differ, touching the plan, the size, the locality, the costliness, &c., of the proposed building. Not the least important and least difficult of these questions is that of location; and it is on this point only that we wish at present to offer some suggestions, or to strengthen some that have been already made.

In the subscription paper referred to it is provided that the site shall be determined by a three-fourths vote of the stockholders. There can be no objection to this, if the committee appointed to recommend locations be wisely constituted. At the original meeting the view most urged was the commercial; that it was for the business interests of Boston that visitors from the West and South should find worthy entertainment of an artistic character in our city, &c. The argument was sound, and as the meeting was composed in great part of active merchants, the committee naturally was of that stamp; yet with the shrewd common sense of that class a resolution was adopted, authorizing them to add to their own number. This was doubtless with a view to enable them to call in the aid and advice of musical men, artists, men of taste, &c.; and we have since learned with satisfaction that one gentleman, who is no less ardent as a lover of music than enterprising as a merchant, has been joined to the committee. This is as it should be; for in the long run the real love and taste for art in the community should have more to say as to the eligibility of this or that site for its theatres, than any merely commercial considerations. For instance, the commercial preference might be for the crowded business haunts, the neighborhood of the largest hotels, and so on; whereas the preference of art-lovers (true to the suggestion of the committee in the Transcript, "that all those evil elements, which have given theatres an ill name with so many estimable persons," should "be carefully excluded") would be for the more respectable, quiet, well-aired, elegant regions of the city.

We know not what localities are contemplated or available; but there are a few general desiderata, which we trust in any case will have their due weight with the Committee, so far as compatible with the means of the Corporation.

1. Let the location be one that shall best accommodate the largest number, both of the city and suburban populations. For, after all, it cannot be transient commercial or other visitors mainly, that will compose the audiences. And it has been justly urged, that the real centre of the city (as to habitations) is continually moving toward the south end.

2. Let it be, by all means, retired from rattling pavements, and so far as possible from the sound of church bells.

3. Let it have as many approaches as possible, and from opposite directions. Comfort and convenience in entering and leaving the house, relief from crowds and the disorderliness thereof, and from the necessity of long waiting for carriages, — also the advantage to the city of having unobstructed streets, are among the considerations which make this of prime importance.

4. Let the site be, as far as possible, an airy and healthful one; for if the building is to be upon the scale indicated by some of the rumors, it is destined to create and satisfy the taste for daylight entertainments in the summer. We know Castle Garden has contributed to keep artists more permanently in New York; and we have only to imagine open windows to perceive the importance both of good air and of retirement from noise. At all events, the pleasanter and more refined the quarter in which such a theatre stands, the less attraction will it hold out to disorderly rowdiness, and the less will it partake of the vicious atmosphere too sure to hang about such places, when in low or merely business quarters of the town. Let the outward environment correspond somewhat to the refined character of the entertainment within.

Local.

The "MUSIC HALL ASSOCIATION" held its Annual Meeting on Wednesday last. Reports were made by the President, Treasurer and Architect, all of a satisfactory character. The building will be ready for occupancy in November next, as will be seen by advertisement in another column.

The following gentlemen were elected Directors for the ensuing year; viz: Charles P. Curtis, Jonas Chickering, B. D. Greene, Charles H. Mills, R. E. Apthorp, J. B. Upham and George Derby.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. At the annual meeting, May 31st, the following officers were chosen, viz: — Silas P. Merriam, President; John Dodd, Vice President; I. L. Fairbanks, Secretary; Matthew S. Parker, Treasurer; Thomas B. Frothingham, O. J. Faxon, C. P. Adams, John A. Nowall, H. L. Hazelton, John F. Payson, John H. Pray, George Hews, I. Haskell Long, Trustees.

At the annual meeting of the MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY, held at Cochituate Hall on Monday evening, the following officers for the ensuing year were elected, viz: President, Gen. B. Franklin Edmands; Vice President, Geo. A. Lord; Secretary, Wm. Rogers, Esq.; Assistant do., Isaac D. Brewer; Treasurer, Alden Speare; Librarian, Gilbert Clark; Directors, Geo. Kurtz, Sidney A. Stetson, J. A. Plummer, Charles H. Allen and Lyman B. Neston.

OLE BULL, ALFRED JAEEL and the GERMANIANS left town yesterday for Montreal. Great is the pleasure in store for the Canadians, who have just been delighted with Mrs. BOSTWICK and extra-enthusiastic about CATHERINE HAYES.

New York.

MADAME THILLON is still the "Enchantress" at Niblo's, while at the Astor Place Opera House to Donizetti's heroines and heroes have succeeded Donetti's troupe of monkeys.

BASSINI'S CONCERT is favorably noticed on all hands. Says the Tribune:

"Bassini is much more than an ordinary violinist. His tone is remarkably sweet and pure — we have rarely heard a sweeter — and a delicate musical feeling characterizes all his performances. He played the slow movement of Vieuxtemp's Fantasia, in which the melody was announced with graceful and simple pathos, and the entire modesty of the artist inclined every listener to sympathetic attention. As a resident musician among us, Signor Bassini would be an invaluable acquisition.

NATIVE COMPOSERS. The N. Y. Harmonic Society will produce Mr. Abbott's Oratorio, "The Waldenses," on Wednesday evening at the Tabernacle. Mr. G. F. Bristow will conduct, and Mr. G. H. Curtis preside at the organ.

Mr. Bristow, we understand, has nearly completed an English Opera, the libretto of which is founded upon Irving's "Rip Van Winkle."

THE THIRD GRAND GERMAN FESTIVAL.—The great gathering of the German Glee Clubs is coming off this year in this city. The various circles of singers from other cities, numbering, it is estimated, more than six hundred persons, will be received here on the evening of the 19th inst., by a torch-light procession, and the next day a grand sacred concert will be given at Metropolitan Hall.

On Monday, the 21st, the day procession takes place, and in the evening the vocal and instrumental festival, which will be a great musical occasion. Over twelve hundred male voices will participate in the glees and choruses.

On the 22d, a pic-nic is to be celebrated in the spacious grounds already leased by the New York Society, on the Bloomingdale road, opposite Stryker's Bay. Such a festival as this, having never been witnessed in this metropolis, will be the means of drawing thousands of visitors to the city, and of diffusing much excitement among the lovers of music.—Tribune.

London.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The fourth concert, May 12th, drew an immense crowd to Exeter Hall, and seems to have fairly established the popularity of Beethoven's strange and hitherto half-doubted Choral Symphony, his ninth and last. He wrote it for the old London Philharmonic, which after one or two trials consigned it to the shelf. Years after the death of the composer, Moscheles had it taken down and studied again for one of the concerts. Still all but the very few pronounced it the weakest of the nine. Then Costa succeeded to the direction, under whom it was produced in 1847, and again once or twice since; but what could he do with a single rehearsal! Even in Germany and Paris it is seldom, if ever brought out. It was once attempted in New York, in Castle Garden, by an extempore monster orchestra, on a sort of Beethoven birthday festival; it was confused enough of course, but even as it was we shall not forget the vague but strong impression of its grandeur.

But now at last in London, if we may trust the Musical World, its day has come. With Berlioz for conductor, with seven rehearsals, in a great hall, "it was executed in presence of a vast crowd, a medley of amateurs, musicians, and individuals with no claim to be called either, in such a manner as to create an excitement almost unparalleled within the walls of a concert room." The critic continues:

"That the ninth symphony is a musical illustration of Schiller's Ode to Joy—that the first three movements are orchestral, and the finale choral and orchestral—that it is the longest and profoundest work of Beethoven—that it is the most difficult piece of music composed by any of the great masters—these and other matters are familiar to all who interest themselves in music. Our business is with Wednesday night's performance, which, take it all in all, was the greatest triumph hitherto achieved by the New Philharmonic Society. M. Berlioz, who was warmly welcomed, was evidently resolved to do his utmost. The time of the Allegro was indicated to a nicety, and amidst all its extraordinary combinations, its exciting crescendos, and overwhelming climaxes, the majesty, which is the prevalent characteristic of the movement, was never once lost sight of. The Scherzo was equally well timed, and the Trio, for the first time in our remembrance, played as fast as it should be. Long as is this extraordinary movement (more than twice the length of any other of the same character,) it was felt to be brief by the audience, who, charmed by its originality, and the admirable decision with which it was executed, burst into an absolute uproar of cheers at the conclusion, and it was some time before M. Berlioz could proceed with the Adagio, the more tranquil beauty of which, however, soon created a different kind of feeling, and substituted a pleasing repose for an uncontrollable excitement. Thus far, the execution of the symphony was beyond criticism. No band and conductor ever did themselves more credit by a masterly and complete performance of an elaborate and highly-colored work. The choral finale—the almost insuperable solo parts in which were sustained with commendable zeal by Madame Clara Novello, Miss Williams, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Staudigl—left something to be desired, although, at the same time, it came much nearer to the mark than on any previous occasion. The instrumental opening brought out the force of the stringed instruments, the basses especially, with tremendous effect. M. Berlioz very properly took the recitatives in tempo giusto, without which it is impossible they can go well. The solo for the bass, "Welcome ye" and the quartet, "Sweet content," were not exactly what they might have been had the accompaniments been more subdued. In the tenor solo, "O, thou bright fire," with accompaniments à la marcia, with the side drum, cymbals, and triangle, the want of a real piano was still more strongly felt; Mr. Reeves, with all his voice, could scarcely make himself heard. The chorus, for the most part, were admirably correct and effective, and in the chorus in D, with the florid orchestral accompaniments (following the instrumental fugue that grows out of the tenor solo,) their power was remarkable. Even in the two final choruses, where the orchestral accompaniments reach the last degree of force and fulness, they sang with a vigor that nothing could abate. The enormous rapidity with which the concluding movements were taken, did not once endanger the steadiness and precision of the execution. The end of the symphony was followed by a volley of applause that made the walls of the building "echo again;" and homage having been paid to the mighty genius of Beethoven, a just tribute was accorded to M. Berlioz, who was recalled into the orchestra, and received in a manner which showed that the audience appreciated his services at their proper value."

But Chorley, in the Athenæum, was not so well satisfied with the instrumental movements. He had heard them "executed with as much spirit, expression, and more precision and proportion at the Old Philharmonic." But the choral part, he confesses, was never so well done in England.

The next great feature in this concert was the performance of Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto (endeared to us through Hatton, Jaell and Goldschmidt) by WILHELMINA CLAUS. The English critics fully echo in their own way all the praises of her, which we have quoted from time to time from the French. Says the Musical World:

"Mademoiselle Claus plays even better with the orchestra than in trios, or mere solos. The vigor and precision of her execution are astonishing—her self-possession is not less so, and these lesser qualities are elevated by a feeling which is the offspring of poetry and intellect. The manner in which Mademoiselle Claus performed the slow movement was in the highest degree expressive; her touch in the piano passages was delicacy itself. We never heard a more genuine and unaffected reading of this beautiful movement, or a neater, more sparkling, and wholly satisfactory execution of the finale, which Mademoiselle Claus dashed off with a rapidity that recalled to many present the unequalled performances of Mendelssohn. No success could be more complete—none better deserved. Mademoiselle Claus was applauded again and again, encored in the slow movement, and unanimously summoned, at the end of the concerto, to be newly fêted by the audience. We have said that Mademoiselle Claus was "a genius," and she has forced us to reiterate this opinion with a double confidence in its truth."

The second part was conducted by Dr. Wylde, and consisted, besides the concerto, of his own new Scena: "The Knight of Leon," sung with great spirit by Simms Reeves and much applauded; of the overture to Der Freyschutz; of Handel's "O, ruddier than a cherry!" in which Herr Staudigl was encored; and "the gorgeous 'Wedding March' sounded the retreat of the audience with great pomp and ceremony."

OLD PHILHARMONIC. The fifth concert took place on the 17th. Chorus and orchestra are said to have done wonders in Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night, the chorus of guards and people exciting a furor. Mlle. CLAUS appeared here also in Beethoven's Concerto in E flat. The other pieces were Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A; Weber's overture to Euryanthe; and the finale to the first act of Cherubini's Les Deux Journées. The New Philharmonic announced the same Symphony for the 28th.

MADAME PLEYEL, after exciting the Dublinites to the highest pitch, gave her first grand morning concert at Hanover Square Rooms, May 20th, assisted by Jetty Treffz, Miss Dolby, Staudigl, &c. Of the audience one critic says:

"It might have been called a congress of pianists, such was the number assembled to hear their queen of executants, who played Beethoven's Concerto in C minor, Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, beside Liszt's railroad express of digital difficulties and queer compound of passage eccentricities in his arrangements of the subjects of the skating scene from Le Prophète, and his charming piece from Les Soirées Musicales of Rossini. In spite of indifferent accompaniment, her genius, her vast and unapproachable powers of execution, her mental, refined and poetic gifts, her wondrous aggregate of all the requirements to constitute the grand pianiste of the age, never stood forth more triumphantly. The delicacy and elasticity of touch in the slow movement of the G minor, and the prodigious pace at which the finale was taken, will not easily be forgotten by her excited listeners. It was not merely steadiness and solidity, but it was the absolute singing of the instrument in her hands; the mind and heart seemed to be at her finger's ends. Such nerve and vigor combined with ease and elegance, have never been associated in any other player."

At ELLA'S MUSICAL UNION, on the 18th, Savori, Piatti and the pianist Charles Hallé, &c., performed duets, quartets, quintets, solos, classic and romantic, by Haydn, Beethoven, Spohr, Mendelssohn and Chopin.

At the fourth and last of LUCAS' MUSICAL EVENINGS, Herr Schaffer, a rising pianist from Munich, appeared; and at the fifth BEETHOVEN QUARTET MEETING, Ferdinand Hiller, the friend of Chopin, played some of his own very numerous compositions.

—But each week's report from London is a perfect wilderness of all forms of chamber concerts. As well try to enumerate the qualities of each particular nest of song-birds in the June woods and orchards, as to keep the run of them. The Illustrated News says, with a heavy sigh: "This has been a trying week for the musical critics, who have been daily called upon to attend divers grand morning and evening concerts, classical meetings, matinées and soirées musicales, sometimes two or three in a day."

Our charming Bosio had arrived in London, for the first time, and was announced to sing at the Royal Italian Opera, in I Puritani, on the 27th, but was prevented by "severe indisposition."

MR. JULES BENEDICT had returned to London for the season, in deep affliction, having buried his wife in Italy. Soon after he left the United States, it will be remembered, his son was killed upon a railroad. Mr. B. is to conduct the Norwich festival, as usual, in the autumn. When shall we see his book of travels in America, from which we translated a fine passage lately out of a French paper?

HENRI VIEUXTEMPS, having left St. Petersburg, was expected in London about the first of June. He was to make London and Paris his head-quarters. — ERNST was finding "metal more attractive" in Switzerland.

OPERA. At the Royal Italian the most notable representations during the last month have been Il Flauto Magico, with Castellani as Pamina, and Mlle Zerr as the Queen of the Night, in which, says the Athenæum, "she excited more than the olden wonder and applause by her little rococo squeaks in altissimo. These, however, are Mozart's fault, not hers." Mario and Ronconi also took part, the latter as the bird-boy. — Lucia, with Mlle. Zerr, Herr Ander, and Sig. Bartolini, a new baritone. — La Juive, by Halévy, which "in spite of much controversy still keeps its place in all the great theatres of France and Germany." It was produced with great splendor at Covent Garden for the introduction of the tenor M. Gucymard.

At Her Majesty's they have had Ernani with Crivelli, who is abused by the Athenæum, but greatly praised by all the others, and Belletti as Don Sylva (!) — Madame Lagrange, a new prima donna, has made great success in Lucia. — Act the Second of the Wagner drama has reached its finale, the injunction being again confirmed. A meeting of the patrons of the theatre had been held to raise a subscription for keeping it open to the end of the season, and in support of Mr. Lumley as manager. One paper says, they resolved to send a strong deputation of nobles and gentry to wait on Madame GOLDSCHMIDT, as soon as she should land, and implore her to sing.

ORATORIOS. Mr. George Lake's Daniel was produced at Exeter Hall on the 21st. Also Mendelssohn's 55th Psalm, and Weber's "Praise of Jehovah," — all for the first time. — The committee of the Birmingham Festival have resolved to invite Jenny Lind Goldschmidt to sing, and in case she declines, Mlle. Wagner.

GERMAN PLAYS. A German company are giving in London a series of the best German dramas of Goethe, Schiller and others. Among others "Egmont," with Beethoven's music.

A "Finale" to Mendelssohn's unfinished opera, Loreley, has been published in London. Chorley praises it in exalted terms. He describes the closing Allegro as "tremendous" and says, "we could not name the prima donna to whom it could be entrusted, with the exception of Madame Otto Goldschmidt, for whose remarkable voice it was obviously written."

FREDERIC CHOPIN.

BY FRANZ LISZT.

(Concluded.)

IX.

During this sickness (in 1847) his recovery was for several days despaired of. Herr GUTMANN, his most important pupil and the friend whom he most loved to see about him in his latter years, gave him the greatest proofs of attachment by his self-sacrificing attentions. Chopin had become so used to him, that he often anxiously inquired of the princess Czartoryska, who visited him daily and who more than once scarce hoped to find him living: "whether Gutmann was not to be had? whether he could not perhaps take care of him still longer? for his presence was the most dear to him."

Nevertheless he was once more saved, but in this point of his life occurred the blow, which fell destroyingly upon his inmost being, and which he on the instant recognized as fatal for his heart. It was the formal rupture with the Sand; and in fact he did not long survive it. For the present he was convalescent indeed, but slowly and painfully, and he had become so changed, that one scarcely knew him.

The following summer brought him that transitory improvement, which persons, whose life is gradually passing away, are wont to derive from the beautiful season of the year. He was not willing to leave Paris and so robbed himself of the beneficial influence of the pure country air upon his health.

The winter of 1847-8 was only a painful alternation of reliefs and relapses. In spite of that, he resolved in the spring to execute his old purpose of going to London. When the February revolution broke out, he was still confined to his bed; it seemed as if a dark destiny drove him to a livelier sympathy in the events of the day, and he spoke more about them than was otherwise his habit.

In April he felt himself better and now seriously thought of visiting that island, to which he had set out to go when youth and life still offered him the brightest prospects. He travelled to England, where his works had already found an intelligent public, that knew them and admired them.* He left France in that state of mind, which the English call low spirits. The momentary sympathy which he had bestowed with a certain degree of exertion upon political events, had quickly passed away. He had become more silent than ever. His affection towards the few persons whom he continued to see, took the color of that soul-pervading excitement, which precedes the last farewell greeting. His indifference for all outward things still grew upon him; Art alone retained its unlimited power over him. In the shorter and shorter moments in which he was permitted to occupy himself with it, Music claimed his whole being as earnestly as in the time when he was full of life and hope. Before he left Paris, he gave yet one concert in the hall of M. Pleyel, a friend to whom he always stood in the most intimate relation, and who now too pays a worthy tribute to his mem-

* Chopin's compositions had been for several years much circulated and made known in England. The best virtuosi played them. In a little writing called: An Essay on the Works of Chopin, published in London by Wessel and Stapleton, much is said that truly characterizes him, and the two lines of Shelley chosen for a motto:

"He was a mighty Poet — and A subtle-souled Psychologist," apply most admirably to Chopin. Among other things the author says: "One thing is certain, viz: to play with proper feeling and correct execution the Préludes and Studies of Chopin, is to be neither more nor less than a finished pianist; and moreover, to comprehend them thoroughly, to give a life and a tongue to their infinite and most eloquent subtleties of expression, involves the necessity of being in no less a degree a poet than a pianist, a thinker than a musician. . . . In taking up one of the works of Chopin, you are entering, as it were, a fairy land, untrodden by human footsteps, a path, hitherto unfrequented, but by the great composer himself; and a faith, and a devotion, a desire to appreciate, and a determination to understand, are absolutely necessary, to do it anything like adequate justice. . . etc.

ory and his friendship by the erection of a monument over his grave. In this concert his select and long tried public in Paris heard him for the last time.

In London he was received with extraordinary cordiality, and this reception drove away his melancholy and scattered his gloomy and desponding humor. He fancied himself entirely master of it, when he flung all, even his former habits of life, into the stream of oblivion. He neglected the prescriptions of his physician and the carefulness which his sickly condition required. He played twice in public and innumerable times in private circles. He went much into company, stayed longer than usual, defied all exhaustion and let no consideration bind him to a regard for his health.

At the Duchess of Sutherland's he was presented to the Queen, and the selectest circles of society were emulous of his possession. He made a journey too to Edinburgh, but the air there was particularly injurious to him. After his return from Scotland he felt very feeble; the physicians urged him to leave England as soon as possible — but he delayed his departure a long time. Who can define the feeling, which suffered him to linger? — He played once more in a concert for the Poles; it was the last love-token that he sent to his fatherland, the last look, the last longing sigh! All his friends crowded round him and he received the most enthusiastic applause. He bade them all farewell, without their dreaming that it would be the last. What may the thought have been that moved his heart, when he crossed the channel to return to Paris? to that Paris, now so different to him from that which he had found, without seeking it, in the year 1831!

This time a bitter and unexpected blow awaited him on his arrival. Doctor MOLIN, whose advice and skilful attendance had saved his life, to whom alone, as he was convinced, he owed the prolongation of his days, lay on his death-bed. He felt this loss severely; it had a dispiriting influence on him, which in moments when the state of the soul has so much dominion over the sick body, must have been very injurious. He cherished the firm belief, that no one could supply that man's place to him and had confidence in no physician more. He kept continually changing his physicians, none would suit him, and he placed no further hope in their art. A sort of superstitious despondency got possession of him; no tie that was stronger than life, no love that was as strong as death, came to his aid in the conflict with this apathy.

After the winter of 1848 he had ceased to be in a condition to work continuously. Here and there he took in hand some leaves containing hastily sketched thoughts, but the strength failed him to arrange them into an orderly whole. Regard for his name gave him the wish to see all such sketches burned; he was not willing to have them, maimed and distorted, transformed into posthumous works not worthy of him.

Of finished manuscripts he has left behind him nothing but a last Notturmo and a very short Waltz.* In his latter days he designed to write a Piano Forte School, in which he wished to embody his thoughts about the theory and practice of his art, the fruit of his long labor, of his happy innovations and his artistic experience. The purpose was a serious one and demanded a double exertion even from so assiduous a worker as Chopin was. Perhaps he wished, in seeking refuge upon this dry field, to escape the excitement of Art, which, according as the heart is bright or lonely, shows such different sides. In it he sought only a monotonous occupation that would claim his whole attention; in this regular daily labor, which "conjures down the spirit's storm," he hoped to forget what would not keep out of his mind.

But Chopin's powers sufficed no longer for such purposes. He traced in thought, to be sure, the outline of his plan, and spoke of it repeatedly; but the execution was to him impossible. He only wrote out a few pages of it; the fire has consumed them with the other papers.

At length his illness increased so visibly, that further hope was out of the question. Soon he could no more leave his bed and he could hardly speak. His sister at this sad news hastened from Warsaw and never left his sick bed. He saw the anxiety, the forebodings, the mourning around him, without betraying any signs of the impression it all-made upon him. He spoke of his end with entire Christian peace and composure, and yet he hoped for a coming morrow. The singular passion which he always had for changing his habitation, came once more to light; he had hired other quarters, ordered them to be fitted up and busied himself with arrangements, often relating to the smallest particulars. As these directions were not taken back, they were all strictly executed, and some articles of furniture were carried to the new dwelling on the very day of his death.

Was he afraid perhaps that Death would not keep his word with him? Was he sensible of that double influence, which some higher natures have felt on the eve of events decisive of their fate, that conflict between the heart, which has a presentiment of the future, and the understanding, which shrinks from foreseeing it?

From week to week, soon day by day the shadow of death stepped closer and closer to him. The sickness reached its goal, the suffering became more and more painful, the decisive moment drew near. In the intermissions of the more and more frequent crises Chopin preserved to the last his presence of mind and force of will. The wishes he expressed in these painless moments, showed with what solemn tranquility he looked death in the face. He wished to be buried next to BELLINI, with whom he had lived in very friendly relations during his abode in Paris. Bellini's grave is in the church-yard of the Père la Chaise, next to that of CHERUBINI; the desire to become acquainted with this great master, in the admiration of whom he had been educated, was one of the motives which induced him to touch at Paris on his route from Vienna to London in 1831. His earthly resting-place is now between Bellini and Cherubini, those two so different spirits, whom Chopin however approached in equal degrees, since he had as high an esteem for the science of the one, as he had attraction toward the other. He shared the melodic feeling with the composer of Norma, and at the same time aspired after the inward substance and the harmonic depth of the old master.

To his very end he maintained the reserve that was peculiar to him in his relations with his friends; he desired to see no one for the last time; but his thanks to the friends, who visited him, he embroidered round with the pure gold of a touching acknowledgment. The first days of October left no further room for doubt or hope. The fatal moment was to be feared each day, each hour; his sister and Gutmann never left him for a minute. The countess Delphine Potocka hastened back to Paris, when she heard of his dangerous condition. All who came to the dying man, found it impossible to tear themselves away from the sight of this beautiful, great soul in its departure from this life.

On Sunday the 15th of October a crisis, still more painful than any that had preceded, lasted several hours. He bore it with patience and strength of spirit. The countess Delphine was there, her soul was penetrated, her tears flowed. He opened his eyes and saw her standing at the foot of his bed, the tall, slender figure, clad in white, the image of an angel beautiful as ever painter's fancy had created. Surely she seemed to him a heavenly apparition; he revived an instant and breathed out a prayer to her to sing. All believed that he was talking wild; but he repeated his request with a tone of earnestness, which no one could resist. They pushed the piano in the hall close to the door of his chamber, and the countess sang with sobbing voice; tears ran down her cheeks and never had her fine talent and her wonderful singing a more touching expression. Chopin listened and seemed to forget his sufferings; she sang the hymn to the Holy Virgin, which, it is said, saved Stradella his life. "How beautiful! O my God, how beautiful!" said he — "once more, once more!" — The countess pressed down the overflowing fountain of her feeling, seated herself again at the piano and sang a psalm of Marcello. But within the chamber a piercing pain suddenly seized the sick man; all the bystanders were terrified and involuntarily sank in silence on their knees; only the voice of the countess floated like a heavenly melody above the sighs of the others. The night came on, a twilight spread its shadow over the mournful scene, Chopin's sister knelt against his bed and wept and prayed.

In the night he grew worse; yet on Monday morning he became somewhat better and asked for the holy sacrament. In the absence of the Reverend —, with whom he had been on very friendly terms in their common exile, he sent for the Reverend Alexander Jelowicki, one of the most distinguished men of the Polish emigration. He saw him twice and received from him the Holy Supper with devotion in the presence of his friends. Thereupon he let these approach singly to his bed-side, gave them a last farewell and invoked God's blessing on them and on what they loved and hoped. The remainder of the day passed off amid increasing pains — he spoke no word more. Only toward eleven o'clock in the evening did he feel himself slightly relieved. The clergyman had not left him and Chopin expressed a desire, so soon as he found his speech again, to pray with him. He pronounced the prayer of the dying in Latin with a clear, intelligible voice, leaning his head steadily on Gutmann's shoulder.

A cataleptic sleep lasted till the 17th of October, 1849. About two o'clock began the death-struggle; a cold sweat ran from his brow. After a brief slumber he asked with scarcely audible sound: "Who is with me?" He inclined his head to press his lips once more gratefully upon the hand of Gutmann, who held him in his arm, and in this moment he breathed forth his soul. He died as he had lived, in love.

Robert Schumann's Musical Life-Maxims.

[TRANSLATOR'S INTRODUCTORY NOTE. — ROBERT SCHUMANN, since the death of MENDELSSOHN, takes rank in the estimation of many as the greatest living German Composer. The following maxims, or aphorisms, (which we translated from the German a year or two since, and now design to scatter along through our pages, a few at a time,) embody the whole creed and practical philosophy of the great artist, and should engrave themselves upon the mind of every one who means to make himself an artist in the sphere of sound. The composer designed them as an appendix to the first edition of his piano forte instruction book, called the Jugendalbum, or "Album for Youth." The maxims were to have been introduced alternately with musical pieces illustrating them. But there were too many difficulties in the way of the execution of this design. The German publisher, however, proposed to insert them in the second edition of the "Album," and in the meantime furnished a copy of them to the Zeitschrift für Musik, a musical journal published in Leipzig, from which we translate.—J. S. D.]

I. The cultivation of Hearing is the most important matter. Take pains early to distinguish Tones and Keys by the ear. The bell, the window-pane, the cuckoo — ask yourself what tones they each give out.

II. You should sedulously practice Scales and other finger exercises. But there are many persons who imagine they have accomplished everything, when they have spent many hours each day for years in mere mechanical exercise. It is about as if one should busy himself daily with repeating the A-B-C as fast as possible and always faster and faster. Use your time better.

III. "Dumb piano fortes," so called, or key-boards without sound, have been invented. Try them long enough to see that they are good for nothing. You cannot learn to speak from the dumb.

IV. Play in time! The playing of many virtuosos is like the gait of a drunkard. Make not such your models.

V. Learn betimes the fundamental laws of Harmony.

VI. Be not frightened by the words, Theory, Thorough-Bass, Counterpoint, &c.; they will meet you friendly if you meet them so.

VII. Never dilly-dally about a piece of music, but attack it briskly; and never play it only half through!

VIII. Dragging and hurrying are equally great faults.

IX. When you are playing, never trouble yourself about who is listening.

* The Posthumous Sonata announced in Paris is probably one written in Vienna in his early years.

X. Always play as if a master heard you.

XI. Strive to play easy pieces well and beautifully; it is better than to render harder pieces only indifferently well.

XII. Always insist on having your instrument purely tuned.

XIII. You must not only be able to play your little pieces with the fingers; you must be able to hum them over without a piano. Sharpen your imagination so that you may fix in your mind not only the Melody of a composition, but also the Harmony belonging to it.

XIV. Accustom yourself, even though you have but little voice, to sing at sight without the aid of an instrument. The sharpness of your hearing will continually improve by that means. But if you are the possessor of a rich voice, lose not a moment's time, but cultivate it, and consider it the fairest gift which heaven has lent you.

XV. You must carry it so far that you can understand a piece of music upon paper.

XVI. If any one lays a composition before you for the first time, for you to play, first read it over.

XVII. Have you done your musical day's work, and do you feel exhausted? Then do not constrain yourself to further labor. Better rest than work without spirit and freshness.

XVIII. Play nothing, as you grow older, which is merely fashionable. Time is precious. One must have a hundred human lives, if he would acquaint himself with all that is good.

XIX. In every period there have been bad compositions, and fools who have praised them.

XX. A player may cram his memory with finger-passages; they all in time grow commonplace and must be changed. Only where such facility serves higher ends, is it of any worth.

XXI. You must not circulate poor compositions; nor even listen to them, if you are not obliged to.

XXII. Try not to acquire facility in the so-called Bravura. Try in a composition to bring out the impression which the composer had in his mind; more than this attempt not; more than this is caricature.

Music in the past Half Century.

An Address delivered before the Harvard Musical Association, at Cochrane Hall, Boston, Dec. 22, 1851.

BY SAMUEL JENNISON, JR.

Instrumentation, or the method of employing the instruments of the orchestra, had already at the close of the last century become so fully developed, as in the opinion of M. Fétis, scarcely or not at all to admit of improvement. The place of the wind instruments was once supplied by the organ. The flageolet and flute which first made their appearance were followed by horn and trumpet, oboe and clarinet, whose province it will be remembered was to accompany, with meagre effect, the simple note of the singer. MAIO and JOMELLI, LEO and DURANTE began improvements which were carried still further by PIZZINI and GLUCK. They met the usual fortune of innovators, finding their endeavors to improve their art considered obtrusive and annoying, rather than agreeable. The uncultivated ears of a century ago could not comprehend the heightened gratification of accompaniments which seemed to distract their attention from the songs. It is stated to have been GALUPPI, who first ventured to throw the principal air into the instrumental parts, while the singers became, as it were, secondary, carrying on, on their part, a kind of conversational accompaniment to the instruments: a custom now so agreeable, and of which instances will readily occur to all familiar with the concerted pieces of the Operas of ROSSINI, BELLINI and DONIZETTI. We can all bear witness to the truth of the observations of that author, that in almost the whole of "Don Giovanni," MOZART has carried the richness of his instrumentation so far as to have apparently attained the highest point of perfection. It is clear that the orchestral accompaniments of the latest composers have not surpassed in beauty those of their wonderful predecessor.

The same author suggests, as the only remaining means of imparting the requisite variety and novelty in this branch of the art, a return to the earlier custom, of accompanying different portions of the opera with different combinations of instruments, instead of giving to all alike, as is now generally done, the full force of the orchestra.

HAYDN, near the close of the last century, first in his Symphonies produced great dramatic effects from instruments alone, unaided by scenic representations; after him MOZART, and in our day BEETHOVEN, SPOHR, MENDELSSOHN, SCHUMANN and others have given, in their great compositions of this class, such evidence of the "Might of Sound" that it is a question that may well divide the musical world, whether the sentiments of the heart do not now find in pure harmony alone an expression to which human language can add nothing.

It has been a frequent complaint of late years, that too much of a merely noisy character has been added to the orchestra; that in the endeavor to produce powerful effects good taste has been sacrificed, and the ear been sought to be taken by force rather than by sweetness: and the suspicion cannot at times be well avoided that the design of the prolonged fortissimos, the unanticipated sforzandos, the so frequently unintermitted use of the whole might of the orchestra, is to conceal the poverty of the subject.

Not only have drum, cymbal, bells, triangle and gong at times added their various clangor, but one instance is related in which fourteen, in another twenty-five trumpeters have been brought upon the stage at once; and in a certain opera of one ROSER, at Vienna, the crashes were heightened by the report of pistols and carbines, not to mention that another well-known composer is said to have introduced on one occasion the roar of a piece of artillery.

We may imagine a tasteful impresario or critic of the Old School expostulating with and answered by the modern composer, after the manner of La Mancha's knight and the "certain bard" alluded to in Pope's Essay on Criticism, and in nearly those words, saying:

"So vast a sound the stage will ne'er contain"—
"Then build a new or act it on the plain."

The stunning effect of modern Opera has not escaped the attentive ears of Punch, who, among other imaginary curiosities professed to have been created by him, makes mention of an ear-protector, designed to enable a young lady to sit through an Opera of VERDI without becoming deaf.

PAGANINI'S HEIR. We translate the following from a German paper:

PAGANINI has left to his only son, Achilles, a fortune of two millions of francs and the title of nobility. An anecdote of Monsieur Achilles shows that the proverb: "What the fathers add, the sons subtract," will not be likely to apply to him. While yet a boy, Achilles was one evening present with a couple of gentlemen at the house of the famous singer Lablache. Four candles were burning on the table. This luxury of lights troubled the boy's feeling; after a little while he silently got up, crept on tip-toe to the first light and, while the gentlemen were eagerly engaged in conversation, blew it out. Lablache winked at it and let him go on. Thinking himself unobserved, he presently blew out the second, and then the third light. But as he was about to pursue the same process with the fourth, Lablache said to him in a friendly way: "Child, if you blow out that light, we shall be unable to see."—"We don't need light to talk by!" was the answer of the boy, now the possessor of two millions.

LEOPOLD DE MEYER.

BY C. P. CRANCH.

Well—I have seen this musical Fire,
This famous Leopold de Meyer;
I have heard this German wonder,
With his grand melodious thunder—
His sparkling rills of rippling trills,
His delicate runs, loud booming guns,
Sword-clashings and lunges,
Cataract plunges,
Fierce flashing of lances,
Intricate fancies,
Large leaps gigantic,
Like lightning grown frantic.
'Twas the very madness
Of vinous gladness.
The sense of senses
Danced into frenzies,
Loud-voiced, plebeian,
Shouts to Pœan!
Huzza for De Meyer!
Finer than fire
Leaps up the flaming
Of his bold aiming.
Over the soul
His mysteries roll
Heaving in surges,
Great Boanerges,
Portly Briareus,
Frowning so serious,
Grappling and struggling
As if thou wert smuggling
Strange fire Promethean,
Or dark water Lethean,
Crowding thy piano
With Jove's thunder—ah no!
Thou'rt but a mortal
Still at the portal:
For while thou seem'st divinely toiling,
I can see thee vainly smiling,
Living in the crowd's applause,
Catching eyes that watch thy paws
Chasing one another up
To the finger-board's tip-top.
In thy beaded champagne draught
Froth and wine alike are quaffed,
Till the stream of music flows
Like Ariel's voice with Trinculo's;
Pindar's silver lyric mingling
With the Broadway sleigh-bells' jingling.

O! purge the dim the people's breath
Has breathed against thy mirror fire;
Lose not the ancient heavenly faith
That music is a muse divine.
Let not thy fingers steal the wreath
Of fame that should be only thine.
Give us the dear, the noble strains
The great tone-masters left on earth,
Whose morning radiance still remains
O'er meteors of ephemeral birth:
The music true of heart and soul,
The language of the Seraphim—
Of the unmeasurable whole—
Creation's inmost prayer and hymn.

FAIRYLAND.

When violet odors fill the air,
When May is pink in hedge and lea,
Wild yearnings seize me unaware,
And dim old longings wake in me—
And I believe in Fairyland.

When sunset fades along the west,
In blue, and green, and lilac bowers,
I hear the trumpets of the Blest
Blown from those old forgotten towers—
And I believe in Fairyland.

When summer comes with bloom and leaf,
And looks and laughs thro' wavering trees;
When crimson peach and golden sheaf
Hang ripening in the sun and breeze—
Then I believe in Fairyland.

When kindness half would look like love,
In eyes that give, yet veil their light;
When song and fragrance float above,
And casements open on the night—
Then I believe in Fairyland.

Correspondence.

Notes of a Short Tour Westward.

JUNE, 10th, 1852.

DEAR JOURNALIST:—You ask me, what musical items I have gathered on the short trip, which I have just made westward? Alas, one can travel from Dan to Beersheba as in old times and find all is (nearly) barren. But the singing master is abroad, and in some of the larger places, Cincinnati, Chicago, Milwaukie, Cleveland, &c., I am told that the seed is sown and that some time or other the harvest will come. Heaven grant it!

I was amused at one little town in Western New York, which shall be nameless, at what was to me a novelty. A singing school happened to close with a public performance, on an evening when I was there. There was nothing particularly good, and nothing particularly bad in the singing of the school—a young lady played the piano quite respectably, and occasionally added the tones of a cultivated voice, to the rest—how instantly a little cultivation is felt!—but on the whole, it was just what we can hear in almost any of our country villages every winter. A few anthems were sung—some new psalm tunes, &c. The novelty consisted in the display of some brother singing masters, who lent their valuable assistance for that night only, and gave us some glees, sentimental songs, and the like. One of them struck me as extraordinary—he could—and actually did—more than once carry a tenor part straight through, without faltering or wavering, say a quarter of a note from the pitch; and at the next stanza, begin just where he left off! A Duo passage or two for tenor and bass proved very rich. The singing master is decidedly abroad.

On the evening of my arrival in Rochester, Catharine Hayes gave a concert in the really fine hall, which is an honor to the taste of the city. I did not attend, but heard that the audience was very small. This was not true of another concert the next evening at the same place, at which two hundred and fifty sweet little creatures from the girls' schools of the city, gave a selection of songs and duets. The pieces were such as usually form the staple on such occasions; popular airs adapted to children's (childish?) poetry. The "Spider and the Fly," "Marseilles Hymn," "Home, sweet Home," and such like common airs were sung, and were really sung exceedingly well, and greatly to the credit of their teacher. Yet why should children be taught to depend upon his voice? A few hours of proper practice will enable any choir of children to begin at a signal, and all at once; yet here, as I have seen in our schools generally, the teacher was half through a line before his little flock was fairly under way. Strange that teachers will neglect this point as they do, for children thus contract habits which always stick by them.

The large hall was crowded and a very lively interest was plainly felt in the performance of the little Linds and Hayeses. I look upon these children's classes as of high importance—whenever the teacher really teaches them to read notes.

I could not learn that a concert of really classical music had ever been given in the place—and yet Rochester is said to have a population of 40,000. Suppose Rochester were in Germany—what an Opera we should have, what a concert orchestra, what garden concerts, what music from Haydn and Mozart in the cathedral—but it is not in Germany, and I do not expect to hear an opera there this year! Musical missionaries are wanted! In Buffalo an old friend gave me a sad picture of the state of music there; here and there is an individual, who can recognize the divine thought and emotion which pervade the "tone poetry" of a Mozart or Beethoven—but no such general taste as leads to any attempt at the formation of any society for the cultivation of a taste for classical works, either vocal or instrumental. In the smaller towns on the Ohio, and on the routes from Pittsburgh to Detroit, there seems to be no assortment of good piano forte music to be found; and I was several times asked for a list of pieces, which at the same time are easy and yet worthy of the name classical. A few popular songs, waltzes, quicksteps, &c., seem to be generally the stock in trade both of music sellers and music teachers there. Still one sees at times, that there is a craving for something beyond—the very indifference of many a young lady player to her piano forte arises not unfrequently from the want of something, which shall gratify a natural taste that spurns the namby pamby airs, with the old hacknied "tum, tum, tum" accompaniment, which she alone knows, rather than to any want of real music. Why cannot some of our music publishing periodicals sometimes give a page or two of real music? Why should not Graham or Godey sometimes give an Andante from Beethoven or Haydn, instead of a "Lament on our dead Pussey," by the sentimental Mr. Jones?

I was greatly delighted in Detroit with the singing in the First Presbyterian Church. It so happened, that on the Sunday when I was there, but three ladies were in the choir, two of whom sang soprano. One very beautiful voice caught my ear with its first note; in the chant it was clear, distinct, and exceedingly musical; and in psalmody it really surpassed anything which I have heard in our churches for a long time. Mr. Mills, the conductor, is really worthy of being named, for the taste with which this part of the service is conducted. It was truly dignified, solemn, and worthy of the sanctuary. But why does he allow his organist to play piano forte music on the organ?

Music seems to be getting established on a good basis in Detroit. The better class of singers there are familiar with some good music—Romberg's "Song of the Bell" for instance; and Mr. Mills has strong hopes that in course of the next autumn and winter something may be attempted of a still higher class.

Beyond Lake Michigan music is under the protection of the Germans, and though perhaps as yet one can hear little of the truly classical, still the songs and ballads of Vaterland will in the end lead to something higher and nobler. It would be a little curious if in a few years a Bostonian should hear as much of the "genuine article" in Chicago as at home—and yet it will not be so very strange. T.

The New Organ.

To the Editor of the Journal of Music.

In the course of the admirable Address before the Harvard Musical Association now publishing in your journal, the author has, it seems to me, fallen into one of the two following false positions.

He has either not seen and made himself acquainted with the principles of the "Euharmonic Organ," or, if he has examined it, and had explained to him by its inventors, what it is intended to accomplish, he has laid himself open to the charge of deliberate misstatement of the facts in the case.

In the first place, neither Mr. Poole nor the friends of the organ claim "that it will bring about a complete revolution in the science of harmony."

Secondly, The Euharmonic organ is not like any other instrument before invented for the same purpose.

Thirdly, The principles upon which its scale is founded are those immutable laws of harmony, which ever have been, and must be recognized, so long as the present order of nature exists.

I have no doubt that Mr. Jennison upon reflection will be as ready to make the correction in his published speech, as he was anxious to stay the progress of supposed innovation in his favorite art, and to give due credit to honest attempts successfully accomplished, as may be at once proved by a reference to the organ itself.

A LOVER OF PURE HARMONY.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

STANZAS.

Like a lustrous Star
Is thy dark eye's light,
Shining from afar,
Thro' the deepest night.

Like a magic spell
Is that smile of thine;
As a gleam it fell
Of the sweet sunshine.

Like a deep, full river
Is that voice of song;
Every heart doth quiver,
As it flows along.

Rills from memory stealing
Mingle with its flow,
All the springs of feeling
Gush into it now.

On the stream we float,
Souls from earth set free,
Higher swells that note—
Wave of harmony!

Hush! the song is o'er,
And we ask in vain,
Shall we on this shore
Hear that voice again?

Without enthusiasm, nothing comes out right in Art.—Schumann.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 19, 1852.

The concluding chapter of the Reminiscences of CHOPIN, in the present number, is touchingly beautiful and will repay reading. Nor need we make apology for the space that has been given to the whole series. Many, we doubt not, by these papers have been interested for the first time in an artist of the purest and selectest stamp, and will now seek to know him still more intimately in his music. Others, who have known something of his music, could not but have read with avidity so true, so delicately appreciating a memoir by a brother artist.

The tribute is in the highest degree honorable to LISZT himself, and we only regret that we have not more of the same good thing in reserve for our readers.

Last week we transferred to our columns a droll and clever burlesque on the modern showy concert-style of solo-playing, as exemplified in the Flute. This time we reproduce a poetic jeu d'esprit by Mr. CRANCH, written when De Meyer was the rage six years ago. To our fancy, it hits the subject (we may say the fashion) in just about the right medium between joke and serious, and ends with a just appeal from the brilliant finger-music of the day to the true ends and meanings of the divine Art.

We give place to a brief stricture by "A Lover of Pure Harmony," on the allusion to the "Euharmonic Organ" in a portion of Mr. Jennison's address, in the hope that it may lead to some fair and friendly discussion of the interesting problems raised by that remarkable instrument. But as we understand Mr. Jennison's words, his position with regard to the organ is a wholly non-committal one, and implies no partial pre-judgment of the case.

Jubilee of the German Glee Clubs.

The Saenger-bund, or league of United States German singers, numbering over twelve hundred voices, are now celebrating their third annual festival for the first time in New York. The enthusiasm of the Baltimore and Philadelphia festivals, in the two past summers, will of course be renewed and deepened here.

This is a beautiful popular custom of the Germans, and one which we hard-scrabbling, money-making, desperately political Americans might imitate to some advantage. These crowds are drawn together for no end of gain, or self, or party interest. It is purely for the love of Music and to honor that divine bond of unity which Music helps to weave between human hearts. The nationality, the large humanity of the Germans, politically so oppressed and partitioned off into petty kingdoms, is nourished and kept green by this common German sentiment for ART. The nearest thing we have to these Saenger-bund festivals, are our Musical "Conventions" and "Teachers' Institutes," so excellent in their way. But these have the utilitarian element in them, and do not represent that pure musical enthusiasm which now calls out the Germans. Our's are to train music-teachers and sell music-books and extend the dominion of this or that music-school, and incidentally and indirectly operate (as they certainly have done most beneficially) upon the public musical taste. Their's (the Germans') are the spontaneous social outburst of the musical feeling. Their's are truly festivals; our's are business conventions.

The celebration in New York opens this evening with a torch-light procession. To-morrow, Sunday, they give a grand Sacred Concert in Metropolitan Hall, when doubtless the great choruses of Handel will be heard, as well as the sublimely simple Lutheran Chorales. And by that sea of manly voices, with manly hearts in them! On Monday a secular concert; excursions to green places, games, &c., will complete the Jubilee in true German style and spirit.

Madame De La Grange.

This distinguished prima donna, the new star just now at Her Majesty's Theatre, was born in France in 1823. She learned music at first merely to satisfy the world's requirement of an accomplished lady; but her talent developed in such a surprising manner, that it was soon clear to her teachers and herself that this art was her true vocation.

Thereupon she enjoyed the instruction of Bordogni in Paris, and then made Italy her home for five years. Here her intimacy with Pasta was of infinite advantage to her; Pasta became her teacher, her model and her friend, and introduced her also to Rossini, at whose instance and recommendation she sang in Bologna, Florence, Padua and Venice.

In Paris she appeared first as Desdemona, then as Alice and Lucia, with decided success.

Madame De La Grange first went to Germany in the year 1848, where she was engaged as first singer at the Italian Opera in Vienna; but in the very same year she sang the Rosina and the Lucia in the German opera and carried the public to a pitch of enthusiastic recognition. With her extraordinary talent for languages, she could soon sing as well in German, as in French or Italian.

Soon after she went back to Paris, to the Grand Opera. In the spring of 1850, when Meyerbeer's Prophète was to be put upon the stage in Vienna, the composer designated Madame De La Grange for the part of Fides. She undertook it and performed it fourteen times in succession.

From Vienna she went to Pesth, where she became the favorite of the Hungarian public, and redoubled their homage by the fact that she learned the Magyar language and appeared in their national Opera amid the most tumultuous applause.

From that time this honored artiste has selected Germany for her especial home, and she has found great recognition in the North, particularly in Hamburg. For some years she has been married to Herr von Stankowitsch, a Montenegrin, who holds the rank of colonel in the Russian service.

Madame De La Grange's voice, (so says a German criticism of last autumn,) still possesses all its natural freshness and strong color, which in the sustained tones tells in the midst of a full orchestra. But more wonderful than nature is the art, the finished method of the singer. The greatest correctness and certainty, even in the most difficult intonations; perfect confidence in leaps through two whole octaves; the most uncommon flexibility and pearly liquidity of throat; smooth runs; genuine trills, that ring out clear and gradually melt away — all these excellencies of a great bravura singer are ascribed by the Germans to Madame La Grange.

Besides the Fides, such rôles as the Rosina, the Lucia, the Isabella in Robert le Diable, the Martha of Von Flotow, &c., are set down as her best. It is said that her strong points in Le Prophète, are those in which mechanical execution has the freest scope, as the great aria in the fifth act. In power, firmness and fullness of tone, as well as in sustained melody, and in her conception of the entire rôle, and in dramatic intensity in certain situations, JOANNA WAGNER is placed far before her. She played Fides with the tenor, ROGER, "an artist who has such a magical attractive power of drawing another on with him in his sun-path, that it becomes difficult to tell whether that other shines mainly by her own, or by his light."

Previous to her arrival in London, Madame De La Grange was singing in Leipsic. Mr. Lowell Mason heard her, and writes thus to the N. Y. Musical World:

"She has a voice rich in tone, extensive in compass, and of great flexibility. Her lower register is very fine, having more power than that of Sontag: indeed this is true of her whole compass, and in this particular she may be compared to Jenny Lind. With respect to quality and purity of tone, we think the latter lady may have the preference in the higher register, but elsewhere the voice of De La Grange is superior. In her lesson in the 'Barber,' of Rossini, she ran up with apparent ease to the thrice marked small g; and in her songs in the Zauberflöte she touched the thrice marked small r with the ease and accuracy of a piano forte. She sings with a freedom, openness, frankness of voice (so to speak) that we have scarcely ever heard equalled, and never excelled. She is, perhaps, thirty years of age, and of most interesting appearance, good figure, large and bewitching eyes, easy, graceful, and elegant in every movement and gesticulation. We have been delighted with her singing; but yet not more so than with that of Sontag or of Jenny Lind."

Since compiling the above we hear voices chanting the other side of the story; from which it would seem doubtful if Lumley has yet found his ark of safety. The Tribune critic heard Madame La Grange three years ago in Paris "sing to very small and very cold audiences," and could not "perceive any reason why they should be warm. It was the fair singing of a worn voice," &c. And in the London Leader "our incomparable Vivian" records his opinion thus:

"A more unpromising début than that of Madame De La Grange at Her Majesty's on Saturday, I have not seen for some time. It was a 'blaze of triumph;' but I call upon the reader to watch the duration of this fervor. The opera was Lucia. The débütante created such a 'sensation' as genius alone could justify. I stand, therefore, in a minority; but I am not the least concerned as to the result. As far as I understand acting, Madame De La Grange is one of the worst actresses on the stage; as far as I understand singing, she is the least agreeable prima donna we have. The sentence is severe, let us await the verdict of a few weeks. Her voice is worn, unsympathetic, and, in its high screams, painfully resembles the sound of whistling through a key. As a set off against this, let me add that her execution is often marvelous, especially in staccato passages, which she accomplished with a precision and delicacy that deserved the applause that saluted them. But, although to deny her great skill would be to deny evidence, I return to my position, that her singing is decidedly not agreeable, because unmusical; for the delicacy and intensity of expression demanded by music, I can accept no substitute in the way of fioriture."

THE GERMANIA SERENADE BAND made an agreeable and promising beginning of their Summer Afternoon Concerts in the Melodeon. The hall was quite well filled, and the audiences will naturally grow larger and larger, unless the heat becomes too tropical. Such cheap summer opportunities of hearing good instrumental music of a higher order than mere quicksteps and waltzes, and yet with a judicious mingling of the light and graceful with the classical and solid, were just what the people wanted, and will contribute both to the refreshment and the refinement of those doomed to spend the season within the hot walls of the city.

The programme on this first occasion (as we doubt not also on the second, yesterday) was well up to the above requirement. It consisted of about an equal number of pieces from the eight brass instruments or "Serenade Band" proper, and from the "String department" — strange as it is to call that a department, which includes the whole plus more than as many more, to wit: two first and two second violins, a viola, two violoncelli (or perhaps we should say one and a half, one being a boy—but the other was WULF FRIES), a double bass, two flutes, two clarinets, two horns, two trumpets, trombone, &c.

Here were most of the elements of quite a nice little orchestra, and under the excellent leadership of Mr. SUCK they played with beautiful precision and regard to light and shade. The brass however, from the acquired unity of so much practice, was naturally too telling for the rest; the violins too few, and though the two first violins (one of them at all events) were fluently played, yet they have by no means acquired the relative efficiency which somewhat compensated for the same want of numbers in the "Germania Musical Society." This perhaps will come with habit. The greatest want we felt was of bassoons, to mediate between strings and brass. An obœe also is much needed. Good performers on these instruments are extremely rare in Boston, for the reason that they unfit the embouchure of the artist for other wind instruments, and do not repay an exclusive devotion. Mr. WERNER was in his right place as first flute, as was Mr. SCHNAPP at the head of the brass.

The lack of body and proportion was most felt, of course, in the first piece, the Overture to Egmont; in spite of the understanding and precision with which it was given, it suffered much for want of violin power. The rendering and enjoyment were more complete in the more light and graceful overture by Kalliwoða, and in the very choice waltz and opera selections. The deficiency was not a little relieved, whenever Mr. Suck felt free to join his own vigorous bow to the first violins.

Taken as a whole, as a first performance, after very few rehearsals, and with the temporary necessity of vacant places for certain important instruments until they can be filled and well filled,—this little experiment was too promising to be allowed to come to any other issue, than to grow and ripen into a really artistic orchestra. This it may do, we trust, without any injury to other similar organizations; for the time has past when the monopoly policy can be a safe one, even to those whom it is most designed to favor. Whatsoever can maintain itself by merit, is in the long run and in the best sense encouraging to all.

We need not say so much of the brass band performances, under Mr. SCHNAPP's effectual conduct and tuition, for their merit is no new thing. We can scarcely imagine eight such instruments much better played. There is some room for remark, however, on the selections of music for such homogeneous groups of a peculiar family. Those that the "Serenade Band" have been in the habit of giving, are from a great variety of good sources. They are all interesting, if only as a matter of curiosity when so played. But some kinds of music suit the nature of the instrument, the family; and some kinds, when the first surprise of novelty is over, sound like rather far-fetched imitations of the real thing. The Trio from Lucrezia, the song from Lortzing's German Opera: "The Czar and the Carpenter," we were glad to hear in this way; they were beautifully, smoothly, richly played, all the parts clear and finished, well subdued, &c.; and yet, after all, the effect is far from dramatic; the rich and mellow tones are passionless. Again we were still more grateful for that reminiscence of the most beautiful prayer in the Freyschutz: Und ob die Wolke, &c. But it gave us a new light about the peculiarity of these smooth brass tones, and wherein they can only feebly imitate the characteristic, vital music of the orchestra or human voice. The more pathetic, the more human the music to be interpreted, the more cold and inadequate do the tones of these instruments appear. With all their mellowness and smoothness, with all their luscious commingling, they sound to us like soulless, watery, Undine-like natures; and while we have the perfect shape of the melody we loved, it still affects us somehow like its ghost. But when that "Hungarian March" was played, so full of sad, determined, truly moral heroism, who did not feel the fitness of the music to the organs that conveyed it, and a more real, although simpler, satisfaction.

The same criticism, or an analogous one, applies to this whole modern improvement in the construction of brass instruments; to the whole Saxhorn family, the valve-trumpet, &c., so softened down and made so smooth and flexible instead of the harsh, spirited, crackling blast of the old straight trumpet. That had character, if it was somewhat intractable; but these are somewhat emasculated in their gentleness.—But this opens a whole field of discussion, which we may not enter now.

OUR MILITARY BANDS. Many times of late, while listening in the streets, it has seemed to us that our bands do not perform as good a kind of music as they have done in some previous years. Arrangements from the fashionable modern Italian Opera music, scenas, cavatinas, choruses, and so forth, from Ernani and Lucia and Lucrezia Borgia, however much they recall certain pleasant associations and pique certain acquired appetites, are far from being a very effective kind of music in martial parades and civic street processions. They sound too effeminate, far-fetched and characterless. They are not manly, soul-stirring, bold enough. Far better for the purpose were those German Marches, composed (if we remember rightly) by Walsch, upon which our old "Brigade Band" built up its character some twenty years ago, and which were favorites for years since. Far better those three or four stern, simple, sad, determined Hungarian Marches, which now and then salute our ears. Those have the true ring to them; those expand the chest as well as lift the feet, and make one feel that life is indeed a march to some great purpose. Those seem to belong to all times, when men are men, and to convey the real thrill of strong, free hearts.

It is a pity that our bands should lose in the character of the music which they play, what they have gained in skill of playing. For in this last respect there is no denying the great improvement that is extending itself throughout the land; and we shall not be so ungrateful to the days of our own boyhood, as to despise the influence which this street music has in forming the public taste, or at least love, for music.

We do not suppose this opera fashion peculiar to our own Boston bands. We have noticed the same thing in New York, and presume it is a sort of all-pervading fashion—for there are fashions in street tunes, imitated from city to city, as there are fashions in hats and coats.

We noticed not long since, when a very long and splendid procession passed us, as band after band came within hearing distance, that the tunes played were about equally divided between operatic airs and "negro melodies." Surely from such armies of clever musicians and such armories of shining instruments, we might expect something better. Does not good taste indicate some room for reform here?

New York.

INFANTILE VIRTUOSOS. A concert of a novel character was announced for Thursday. The performers were to be three of the minute musical prodigies of the day: little Mlle. Petit, pianiste, nine years old, who plays the most difficult pieces; little Miss Patti, eight years old, who sings the cavatine from Ernani, Sonnambula, &c., with an operatic air; and, for a very little squire to the two little ladies, master Marsh, the infant drummer, four years old. Such a fairy force must be altogether irresistible in these midsummer evenings.

ALBONI. Her kind newspaper keepers seem not to have definitively disposed of the great contralto yet,—but es geht an, as Tenfeldsdroeckh says. One has consigned her to cool summer retirement in Fairfield, Connecticut. But the Herald knowingly hints of two or three concerts in "about a fortnight," and has been kind enough to investigate and settle the question for the moral portion of the community, of which it is the organ, that Alboni has not come out here for any humbug of a philanthropic purpose, like Kossuth, Jenny Lind and Ole Bull; nor even to make money; but simply to enjoy herself, being one of the richest, heartiest, laziest and best of women; her chief attraction hither being "the shad of the North River and the canvas-back ducks of the Potomac." Knowing Herald!

But the grave editor of the Journal of Commerce has been allowed to hear her sing. You would think he had been taking exhilarating gas. So has he of the Mirror, who declares that her low notes resemble the tones of a drum! and that her face is round and fair as an apple. These confirm the report of speedy concerts.

P. S. The concert is announced for the 23d.

SAFETY OF CONCERT ROOMS. The Tribune, in memory of the Goldschmidt and in anticipation of the Alboni concerts, justly sounds the alarm about Metropolitan Hall, and the difficulty of getting out of it. We copy it, because the subject should be agitated in all our cities. We too look back with a shudder to "that inclosure, from which the throng of five thousand or more persons was compelled, in coming out, to crush through the narrow throat at the head of the staircase: and we must call aloud upon the proprietors, as we have before done, to make some arrangement which would render an awful destruction of human life, in case of sudden alarm, not so fatally certain as it is now. We cannot recall any hall of the size, whence the means of issue so totally preclude hope of safety in an emergency. The difficulty is in the narrowness of the staircase, and until some steps are taken to remove so serious an objection to a hall, otherwise quite unparalleled (?) for its purpose, it will be our duty to refresh the public remembrance of its great insecurity in this respect."

MAD. MARELLINI, the mysterious, who made the singular breakdowns in Boston, last Autumn, and has since sung in Charleston with the like result, is about to repeat the experiment in New York. The Herald announces her with a long flourish of trumpets, speaks of her beauty, her eminently Italian face, her "great success" (!) in Boston, and how Jenny Lind went in one night to hear her—but not how she went out again!

Paris.

GRAND OPERA. Father Fétis continues his long and eulogistic analysis of Le Juif Errant, pointing out its beauties scene by scene and strain by strain. Such authority may well suspend judgment, in spite of the adverse impression of most other lovers of good music. The play continues on the stage, the house continues thronged, Tedesco continues to win admiration and has renewed her engagement. It would seem that the votes were gradually going over to the side of M. Fétis. We hope soon to hear again from our own correspondent.

The OPERA COMIQUE always maintains itself, and must lend a very genial sort of moonlight just now to the shaded hemisphere of the lyrical great world, while all the operatic sun-light blazes in the London hemisphere. There the Parisians have been finding entertainment in light, graceful, funny operettes, such as Richard-Cœur-de-Lion, the Deserteur, the Tableau Parant, the Calife and the Voitures versées (carriages upset) by Boildieu, of which a critic says that: "A natural, easy, even melody, united to a simple and rational harmony, in which there intervenes an instrumentation sober, clear and not too noisy, has decidedly its imprescriptible rights." The Voitures versées is said to be as popular as was the Dame Blanche.

M. HABERBIER. This new pianist with his new finger method, to whom we alluded some weeks since, has given a second concert, and opinions seem remarkably divided. The Gazette runs him as "This new instrumental Messiah, this Mahomet of the piano, this Calvin in fingering, announced as a reformer," &c., and sums up the result of the second, as of the first concert, in these words:

"M. Haberhier is an artist of talent, a charming pianist, who has more dexterity than tone, more address than sensibility and who understands passage-playing better than song; and as for his new points of mechanism, there is not a pianist of a little experience who does not find them scattered through the studies of Kalkbrenner, of Czerny, above all in the music of Liszt, and even in the variations of Henri Herz."

Not so the France Musicale. This pronounces the concert a "complete and definitive triumph," hints at a balked conspiracy against him, likens it to a scene in the life of Stradella, since a room-full of "pianists who came with a hostile end, felt all criticism expire on their lips." No more "acrimonious conversations," no more "bitter ralleries." They found that he had actually "come to teach them the means of doubling their power of execution," and so on. He played the Overture to Guillaume Tell, the Cypride de Salon and la Fontaine of his own, and with signal triumph the Nocturne and Grande Valse of Chopin. The writer ascribes to him the "vague spiritualism" of the music of the North, and says:

"Since Liszt and Chopin, no pianist has so profoundly moved the feminine fibre. We know a lady of high rank who never speaks of Haberhier and of his playing, unless with admiration, with a serious and select enthusiasm, which is not free from a sort of mysticism."

The Revue des deux Mondes and other papers echo this last opinion and talk as enthusiastically about the spirit of the Northern music as if the Danish pianist were an Ole Bull in his way. One critic said: "We have not been hearing the piano, we have been hearing music": which certainly conveys the opposite impression to the opinion first quoted.

At the grand ceremony of blessing the flags in the Champ-de-Mars, parts of the "Mass of St. Cecilia," by Adolph Adam, were executed by the united bands of all the regiments of the garrison of Paris, numbering more than a thousand musicians. The infantry bands took the instrumental, and the cavalry (brass) bands the vocal parts of the Mass.

"THEORIES COMPLETES DU CHANT" is the title of a new treatise on the voice and the art of singing, by M. Stephen de la Madelaine, just published in Paris. We see it spoken of as "the most complete and learned exposition that has ever yet been made of this important branch of the musical art." It begins with defining that vague word, Method. (Pity to rob our critics of such a learned-looking screen, when they don't know what to say about a singer!) Then follows a treatise on the vocal mechanism, "a brilliant series of principles borrowed from the most illustrious masters, Crescentini, Porpora, Garcia, Bordogni, &c., precious traditions to which M. Madelaine adds the result of his own experience." Then follows Style, or the aesthetic part of the subject; and finally Hygiene as connected with singing. The work is said to possess great charm of style and illustration.

London.

OPERA. At Her Majesty's Lucia was repeated with Madame De La Grange, who achieved a still more decided success than at the first time. Gardoni's Edgardo was much admired. Ferlotti was the Enrico. — Cruvelli has thrice appeared in her great character of Beethoven's Fidelio, supported by Calzolari and Belletti. That might be coveted as the highest lyric opportunity of the times! Cruvelli has impressed most persons of true taste and musical feeling as the genius par excellence among the newly risen stars, the London Athenaeum to the contrary notwithstanding. The Wagner's forbidden power is said to be mainly dramatic. — Fidelio was followed on the same evening by a light comic opera: La Prova d'un Opera Seria.

"Light comedy characters are infinitely better adapted to the capabilities of Madame La Grange, than parts exacting dramatic power and passion. The capricious, touchy, and exacting prima donna was well acted and admirably sung: the introduced bravura was a triumph of florid vocalism, and deservedly brought down thunders of applause as she poured forth a series of novel as well as daring roulades. Lablache's duo with Madame La Grange, 'Ah, guardate che figura,' was received as usual with shouts of merriment, although it has been heard season after season for upwards of twenty years. Equally delighted was the auditory with the well-known directions of the sensitive composer to the orchestra. Lablache revels in practical jokes with the members of the band in the distribution of the parts of the score to each player. Her Majesty, the Duchess of Kent, and Prince Albert honored the performance with their presence."

On Thursday June 3d was an extra night. Donizetti's Don Pasquale was given by Lablache, Mme. La Grange, Calzolari and Ferranti. The giant was in excellent voice and perhaps never played the part with more humor.

At the ROYAL ITALIAN a representation of La Juive confirmed the success of the French tenor, M. Gueymard. Mme. Jullienne's Rachel and the Cardinal of Herr Formes were great successes. — I Puritani was twice performed, and MARIO was the hero, GRISI the Elvira. Says "Vivian" in the Leader:

"Mario was not dead, but sleeping. His voice—that sweet and tender voice, so delicate, so voluptuous—that voice which we all thought had lost its bouquet, made itself felt the other night in Puritani with all its pristine beauty, and a crammed audience rejoiced in the discovery. That was a 'blaze of triumph'—that was singing."

Think what a caste in Lucrezia Borgia! For the Duchess, GRISI; Gennaro, MARIO; Duke Alfonso, RONCONI; Maffeo Orsini, MDLLE. SEGUIN (said to have been a failure); and in the secondary male parts, MARINI, TAGLIAFICO, POLONINI, MEL, ROMMI, &c. Chorus and orchestra under COSTA, were magnificent. "Marini's voice in the masked chorus was a tower of strength and contributed greatly to its electrical effect." "The dying scene of Mario raised the enthusiasm of one of the greatest houses of the season to the highest pitch." — For the extra night, June 3d, Meyerbeer's Les Huguenots was played for the fifth time.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY at its sixth concert gave "Spohr's somniferous symphony in D minor" and a MS. overture by Cherubini. The Illustrated News contrasts the excitement of the auditory at the C minor of Beethoven, with the profound apathy attending this symphony of Spohr's. Beethoven's "Men of Prometheus" was the other overture. JOACHIM played Mendelssohn's only violin concerto. The singers were CLARA NOVELLO and STAUDIGL.

NEW PHILHARMONIC. Mendelssohn's Symphony in A (posthumous, with the Saltarello movement); the first of Beethoven's four "Leonora-Fidelio" overtures; Berlioz's own overture, Les Francs Juges; and his orchestral arrangement of Weber's Invitation à la Valse, were the main features of the fifth concert. M. Silas played his own piano forte concerto; and Savori the violin concerto of Mendelssohn, combining it, was said, "the purity of tone of the Italian, the sentiment of the German, and the brilliancy of the French schools of violin playing."

A Pilgrimage to Vienna and the Tomb of Beethoven.

I had been told repeatedly that Vienna was changed; that, since the events of 1848-9, much of that careless gaiety and living for the present moment, which formerly characterized the Viennese, had disappeared; and that, as they had acquired an appearance at least of greater earnestness and solidity of character, just in the same ratio had the great Austrian Vanity Fair lost its charm for the pleasure-seeking traveler. I presume that there was truth in this. Certainly I did not find the picture, which I had unconsciously formed from reading travels and guide-books, fully realized—much of that Oriental grandeur, and indeed quaintness of effect, arising from the mingling together of crowds from the East in all the picturesqueness of their peculiar national costumes, which I expected, was wanting; and save here and there in the Greek and Jewish coffee-houses, I saw few individuals to remind me by their flowing robes and turbans that I was not in a city of northern Germany.

However, it mattered little to me—I was not there merely to seek pleasure—I had an object before me, which occupied much of the twelve days I spent there, and in my walks and leisure moments I kept ever in view the search for memorials of BEETHOVEN. One place particularly interesting to me was the music-store, once kept by Toby Haslinger, whom Beethoven liked so well to joke, under the title of "the little Adjutant General." It was Toby to whom the composer gave his famous counsel, when the musician complained of his lack of customers.—"Order," wrote he on the paper handed him by Toby, "Order, instead of quintals of music paper, genuine, unwatered Ratisboner; have this favorite article of trade sent to you down the Danube; distribute it cheaply in quarts, pints and seidels; pass round salted sausage, kipfel,* radishes, butter and cheese; extend your invitation to the hungry and thirsty in letters half an ell long on your sign—'MUSICAL BEERHOUSE!'—and you will have, every hour in the day, such crowds of guests, that one will pass the latch to the next, and your shop never be empty."

The taverns, which he used to frequent to dine, drink a glass of beer or wine, read the newspapers, &c., were easily found: the "Bugle Horn," and the "Sun" (I think) in the court near St. Stephen's, called the "Brand," and others; the two theatres, where his Fidelio, great Mass, and other pieces were first performed, and the Pasquillatischer House, where he lived so much at intervals.

By the true artists and friends of Music in Vienna the memory of Beethoven is cherished as a sacred thing, though a stranger has more opportunities of hearing his great works in Berlin, and many memorials of him are preserved with jealous care. Among the enthusiastic admirers of the great composer, Herr Aloys Fuchs stands in the front rank, and to him I was indebted for several hours of high enjoyment. Mr. Fuchs is known throughout Germany as a most industrious and indefatigable collector of the portraits and autographs of musicians; Bach, Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, all whose pictures and "handschrift" are worth having, are represented in his collection. As he turned over the collection of Beethoven portraits, arranged in chronological order, he came to the fine copperplate of Latrone, published in 1814; as he opened to this he exclaimed with strong emphasis, "So habe ich ihn kennen gelernt!" "Such was he when I first saw him!" This was in 1816. Fuchs, then quite a young man, had, in some manner obtained so much of the good will of Beethoven, that he ventured, soon after, (May 3d, 1817,) to call on him with a request for his autograph. It so happened that on the morning of that day, Krumpholz, the violinist of whom years before the great master had taken lessons, while walking on the glacis was smitten with apoplexy, and died immediately. Beethoven took the album, wrote a short Trio for men's voices, to words from Schiller's "William Tell," and added at the end: "Zur Erinnerung an den schnellen und unverhofften Tod unseres Krumpholz." (In remembrance of the sudden and unexpected death of our Krumpholz.) This interesting autograph is of course still in Mr. Fuchs' possession.

This gentleman is also librarian to the great "Society of the Friends of Music, in the Austrian Capital,"—the same society to which Archduke Rudolph, the patron of Beethoven, bequeathed his immense and invaluable musical library. Through his kindness, I spent a couple of hours glancing at the treasures, preserved in the rooms of the Society. Besides the splendid collection of musical publications, there is quite a musical museum of instruments of all sorts. In one glass case are preserved the various stringed instruments, which once belonged to Esterhazy, the patron of Haydn, and some which belonged to Haydn himself. Among them several "barytons," the instrument for which Haydn wrote 163 compositions, it being the favorite instrument of the Prince. This was in form a small violoncello with two set of strings, one above, and one under the bridge. Here also was to be seen the Viol d'Amour, mentioned in Shakspeare. 'Twas truly a feast for the eyes to look at the immense collection of music and musical works here preserved—of all kinds and qualities, old and new, rare and common—splendid autographs—among them that noble MS. copy of the great Second Mass, which was presented by Beethoven to the Archduke Rudolph. Among the various medals and similar curiosities, which have come into possession of the Society, I saw with deep emotion that heavy golden medal, which Louis XVIII. sent the Composer upon the receipt of a copy of the Great Mass. This medal was sold at auction after Beethoven's death, for its value as old gold! The purchaser had the magnanimity to present it to the Society, which now preserves it. It will never again be sold for old gold!

With another gentleman, I walked out one day, some three miles east of the city to the palace of

* A sort of dry, wheaten cakes.

Schönbrunn—not to see the favorite residence of Maria Theresa, not to see the palace which Napoleon occupied when at Vienna, and in which his son died so early,—not to see the beautiful gardens and pleasure grounds, which extend to the top of the ridge, where the Gloriett, a temple of Fame, built by the Empress Maria Theresa, affords such a splendid view of Vienna and the mountains in the distance;—but to find the spot where, half a century ago, a young man afflicted with disease and incurable deafness, loved to come from the village of Hetzendorf at the foot of the ridge on the other side, and sitting in the thickest of the wood, which crowns the height, gave utterance in immortal tones, to the mighty emotions which oppressed his great heart. Here he, Beethoven, wrote that remarkable Will, that record of gloom and despair, which long afterwards was made known to the world, when its author was no longer struggling with fate. Here afterwards when he had become somewhat reconciled to his calamity, he used to sit in a natural seat, formed by the triple stem of an oak, and work upon his immortal Fidelio. It was a delightful day (May 18, last year) and Schönbrunn was in all the beauty of the opening spring. But trees and shrubs and flowers, and fountains, cool allies and shady walks, all these had little of interest compared with an oak, which we found “in that part of the park to the left of the Gloriett,” two stems of which “shot out from the main trunk at the height of about two feet from the ground.” We found many double trees, which formed good seats, but this one alone answered the description, which Schindler gives of that which he and Beethoven found in 1823, and on which the composer assured him he used to sit while engaged in the composition of his “Christ on the Mount of Olives,” and his Opera.

When one passes through the Schotten Thor (Scottish Gate) on the west side of the city proper, the glacis spreads out between him and the Währing suburb at least quarter of a mile in width. Directly opposite, the Währinger Gasse, or rather avenue, leads through the suburb to the village of Währing some two miles distant. As you cross the glacis, on the left of this avenue, overlooking the pleasant open space with its walks and trees, and the city beyond, stands a huge block of buildings. First is a gun manufactory, then comes a range of building, seventeen windows in length, occupied as a beer house and shops below, and let in suits of apartments above; and at the other extremity is an edifice, evidently once a church, but now some sort of a military office. The central part of this block is known as the Schwartzpanier house; and here in the third story, on the evening of March 26, 1827, in the midst of a tempest of hail and rain, and thunder and lightning, Beethoven breathed his last! Plenty of air and sunlight were necessities of existence to him, and here for some time previous to his death, when not in the country, he had lived. In front of this house collected that vast multitude on the day of his funeral, when the pressure became so great that companies of soldiers were at length ordered out, to stand sentinels and keep open a passage for the funeral procession. An anecdote which I got on good authority, shows how universally the great deceased was known.

A stranger who happened to pass, turned to an old apple-woman and inquired, what the crowd and the military all meant? She looked at him a moment in wonder, and then answered with a scornful smile—that “he must surely be in Vienna that day for the first time, or he would have known that the General of the musicians was to be buried!”

There is nothing picturesque or peculiar in the Schwartzpanier house; and yet how much more interesting than the noblest of the palaces, which rise proudly from the city opposite!

One pleasant morning, with an autograph or two, and a rare print of Beethoven after his death in my hand, which I just succeeded in obtaining, I stepped into an omnibus for Währing. Just before starting, three gentlemen entered. We had not ridden far when I touched my hat to one of them, and said, “Excuse me, sir, perhaps you can tell me if I am right; I wish to visit Beethoven’s grave?” He seemed pleased, and with true German kindness said he would see that the driver left me at the right place.

This led us into conversation, and as my speech, like the apostle Peter’s, soon bewrayed me, I had to tell them that I was from America,—from America, that distant, barbarous land where there is neither science nor art—in the opinion of so large a portion of the German people. The idea of one from America being there bound on a pilgrimage to the grave of Beethoven, interested them exceedingly. They examined my autographs, and a little lock of gray hair, which an admirer of Beethoven had given me; congratulated me upon their acquisition, and expressed their regret that such things should be allowed to leave Vienna. One of the gentlemen, a middle-aged, fine looking man, himself a composer, and who had known Beethoven well, assured me that my memorials of the composer were genuine—an assurance however which I did not need. This gentleman was the brother of FRANZ SCHUBERT! Our acquaintance was soon cut short, to my sorrow, by our arrival at the cemetery—the “Währinger Friedhof.”

Ring at the door of the keeper’s house, said Mr. Schubert, and when it is opened pass directly through, and up the walk, and in the upper part of the enclosure you will find the monument against the wall, and just beyond that of Franz Schubert.

The Währinger Friedhof, which may contain some four or five acres, lies upon the gentle slope of a ridge which rises a mile perhaps from the outer barrier of Vienna. It is on the slope from the city, so that one sees nothing but the tall spire of St. Stephens to recall to mind the hurry and bustle of the capital. The grounds are laid out in uniform and monotonous lines, but beautified by many a lonely monument, by a profusion of young trees, and innumerable flowers.

The keeper’s lodge is at a corner of the cemetery, and the path which leads to the monuments I sought is the outer one on the left side of the enclosure, on entering. Advancing, perhaps two thirds up this path, a monument on the right caught my eye, inscribed with the name of Ritter von Seyfried, the friend and biographer of him whom I sought, and just beyond, on the left, almost hidden by the foliage of a small willow was the single word in gilded letters, sunk into the granite block, BEETHOVEN.

The monument, about eleven feet in height, is placed against the wall of the enclosure, and is supported by a few courses of brick built up from the top of the wall. Nothing can be more simple. A pedestal inscribed with the name merely, from which rises a modest obelisk, adorned with a harp, surmounted by a blazing sun, and, near the top, with the serpent emblem of eternity, enclosing a butterfly. In front of this monument lies a large granite slab and beneath this repose the remains of Ludwig van Beethoven. Neither on this nor on a subsequent visit did I discover those Latin inscriptions given in Moscheles’ translation of Schindler; certainly that single word—the name—is all that is wanting upon the monument of Beethoven.

Just beyond lies Franz Schubert—he of whom Beethoven as he lay upon his death bed and examined some of his works, exclaimed with deep emotion: “Truly, Schubert is animated by a spark of heavenly fire!” But how soon was that fire quenched after the great luminary had departed! Beethoven died March 26, 1827, and he who possessed so much of his genius followed on the 19th of November, the next year.

Schubert’s monument is ornamented with his bust in bronze, and the following inscription:

Die Tonkunst begrab hier einen reichen Besitz
Aber noch viel schönere Hoffnungen.
FRANZ SCHUBERT liegt hier.
Geboren am XXX Jaenner MDCCXCXVII,
Gestorben am XIX Nov. MDCCCXXVIII
XXXI Jahre alt.

[The Art of Music buried here a rich possession, but yet far fairer hopes. FRANZ SCHUBERT lies here. Born on the 30th January 1797, Died on the 19th Nov. 1828, thirty-one years old.]

I have seldom been more affected by tender and sorrowful emotions than during my two visits to the grave of Beethoven. Some person had been there and laid upon it a wreath of “immortels,” how fitting a tribute! There it lay undisturbed, and I felt almost as if guilty of sacrilege, when, after plucking of the clover and other leaves, which grew around the slab, I ventured to add a loose sprig or two from the wreath of “immortels.” A. The Quartet.

The following fable is given in “Lectures on Russian Literature,” by Dr. Boltz, published in Berlin, last year.

A waggish Ape, an Ass, a Ram and a bandy-legged Bear, once were smitten with the idea of performing a quartet. They procured therefore a violoncello, a viola, and a pair of violins, and took their stations beneath a linden on the meadow to enchant the world with a specimen of their artistic abilities. Now they raise their bows and scrape away—but their music will not harmonize.

Stop, brothers, stop, screamed the Ape, wait a bit! How can our music be in harmony? You don’t sit right. Bear, place yourself with your viola opposite the violoncello, and I will play the first here opposite the second violin; now you shall see how it will go; mountain and forest will then begin to dance.

They placed themselves thus, and the quartet began anew; still, not a bit the better.

Halt, halt! cried the Ass, I have the trick of it; we shall certainly harmonize if we only sit in a row.

The Ass’s counsel was followed; they seated themselves in a perfectly straight line—and lo, the quartet was as bad as ever. And now they began to argue and to quarrel more briskly than ever, as to how they ought to sit.

It so happened that in the midst of the noise and confusion a Nightingale came flying by.

They all appealed to him at once to satisfy them on this point.

Pray, be so kind, and stop awhile with us, said they, and bring our quartet into order; here are the notes, and the instruments; just tell us how we should sit.

To be a musician, answered the nightingale, one needs more knowledge and better ears than you have. You, my good friends, sit as you may, will never answer for musicians.

Something to cast Bertini in the Shade.

The great "Pianoforte School," of CARL CZERNY,—the teacher chosen by Beethoven for his nephew—which was in course of publication last summer, must we think now be near its completion. We wonder what house would publish such a work in this country, and how many pupils would undertake to go through it!

It was to consist of ten parts or volumes, as follows:

- I. Eighty Easy Progressive Pieces, with daily practice of the Scales in all the 24 keys. (Opus 817.)
- II. Ninety New Exercises for daily practice in fingering in all available forms. (Op. 820) to be constantly practiced until the fourth year of study.
- III. "The Beginning"—Twenty-five Easy Melodious Exercises for Little Hands. (Op. 748.)
- IV. Fifty Exercises in Modulation, in all keys, for four hands. (Op. 751.)
- V. "Progress," in Twenty-five Instructive, Progressive Exercises. (Op. 749.)
- VI. Do. Do. (Op. 753.)
- VII. Dexterity of Fingering. Fifty Studies to improve the flexibility of the fingers and hands. (Op. 818.)
- VIII. Melody. Twenty-eight Studies in Melodic-Harmonic style (Op. 819.)
- IX. The Finishing Course (Der Vervollkommnung). Twenty-five Characteristic Studies. (Op. 755.)
- X. Style. Twenty-five Chamber Studies. (Op. 756.)

Music in the past Half Century.

An Address delivered before the Harvard Musical Association, at Cohituate Hall, Boston, Dec. 22, 1851.

BY SAMUEL JENNISON, JR.

It would be curious, in the next place, did time permit, to observe how in the course of a few centuries many of the characters denoting the duration of the note have become obsolete, others indicating greater rapidity of execution taking their place.

The semibreve, the half short, once with a single exception the shortest note, has long been practically the starting point in our measure of time: while the minim, minimum, originally the least in duration, has been completely outstripped by crotchet, quaver, semi and demisemiquaver, whose minor subdivisions, like numerals ascending beyond millions, have become difficult of appreciation or name. These designations have, under the simplifying and reformatory processes which mark the age, already become in some degree, and may eventually be wholly superseded by the names of half note, quarter note, eighth, sixteenth, and so on, as in a similar manner you now find the figures 2-2, 4-4, &c., often substituted for the character formerly in use to mark the common time.

Changes like these would seem to indicate a constantly increasing rapidity of execution from century to century. Of the tendency to take too quickly the tempo of the more rapid movements, (to which in the excitement of the moment performers are often prone to do even more than justice) as well as of the solemn Adagio, or stately Andante, you are aware what complaint has been made within our day. HAYDN gave expression to his vexation; and fearful indeed must have been the indignation of the impatient BEETHOVEN to have heard his Andante converted into Allegretto, Allegretto into Allegro, and Allegro into Presto.

MAELZEL'S Metronome, an invention of this period, has in a great measure obviated this evil.

In this connection it is worthy of notice that the ancient sober Minnet of the Symphony and Sonata has been in many instances, and particularly by BEETHOVEN, converted into the sprightly Scherzo: while the comparatively moderate measure of the Landler or Rustic Waltz, which is exemplified in such airs as "Buy a Broom," has within the last fifty years been superseded by the exciting, champagne-like sparkle of the brilliant sets of STRAUSS, LANNER and LABITZKY. The modern Waltz, at first called the Vienna Waltz, from its origin in that gay and fashionable metropolis, partakes, as has been suggested, of the intoxication and glitter of the ball room, as clearly as the Landler does of the simplicity of rural, outdoor amusement.

In one of the volumes of the Quarterly Musical Review since 1825, mention is made of an apparent elevation of the standard of pitch, which, if not confined to England, might be supposed to have its influence in helping on the reign of brilliancy. Bartleman, the celebrated bass singer, would take 'Non piu andrai' in E instead of D, where it is written. Madame Mara is said to have been seriously offended with a Don Giovanni who would not sing 'La ci darem' with her upon B flat instead of A; and Mrs. Billington is related to have thrown a whole orchestra into convulsions when once, in the performance of the Messiah, she insisted upon taking 'Rejoice greatly' in C, a whole tone above its proper key of B flat. Were such transpositions of frequent occurrence, the gradual elevation of pitch would not be an improbable result. The correspondent of the Review, complaining of this evil, expresses the apprehension that his "bread and reputation" may be affected by it; and a clarinet player, then lately from the Continent, found he could not use his instrument at a concert in London, the standard of pitch being half a tone higher than in the country he had left.

You may have observed, that in the course of some remarks upon the progress of music among us within the last fifty years, made the last summer by a gentleman of this city distinguished for his labors in the cause of Church Music, it was stated that at the commencement of the century the Alto of the female voice was unknown here: the part, when made use of, being sustained by men. Old singing books will accordingly show you the alto written in Counter Tenor upon the high notes of the staff, an octave above where it now stands for the female voice. To that remark it may be added that the contralto part, of which the first effective employment was made by ROSSINI in Duetts for two female voices, within this period, is said to have been brought into favor by GRASINI, the celebrated friend of the more celebrated GRISI, and by whom the latter was encouraged to follow the path which led to her fame.

The tremulous style of singing so observable in some of the popular favorites of the day, I judge to be of modern origin. Effective as this is in producing the rich, cantabile expression of the violin, its too frequent abuse by vocalists would lead us to cherish the firm, un-Italianized, sustained tone which comes from the throat of a LIND.

As an instance of the new "turns of melody," characterizing music since ROSSINI's day, may be mentioned the modulation, usually at the conclusion of the first half of an aria, into the minor of the third above the original key note; instead of into the simple dominant, as in former days; thus, suppose an air upon B flat, we now more frequently expect the modulation into the key of D minor, than into that of F; take for a familiar example the fourth line of "Involami," or of "Tu chi a Dio" in the Finale of "Lucia Di Lammermoor."

Among other events worthy of mention are the Musical Festivals, which, having their origin just beyond the dividing line between the last and present century, have within the past fifty years spread over the world. In 1784, England witnessed the successful achievement of the first great project of assembling a vast number of performers in Westminster Abbey, in commemoration of her revered HANDEL. The example of England was early followed, first by Switzerland, next by Germany in 1804, and again, after an interval of six years, on a larger scale, in 1810. The wars of Napoleon put an end to them on the Continent until the year 1816: at which time in Hamburg the custom was revived, rapidly becoming general throughout Germany, where the Festivals were held often under the auspices of the celebrated Academies, as the St. Thomas School, the Seminary of BACH. One of these great gatherings was held at the Hague in 1834, in 1836 at Amsterdam. The first in Italy took place at Bergamo in 1835; in France at Strasburg in 1836; in Russia in the same year at Riga. Those of England have been perhaps most conspicuous, where the cities of York, Birmingham, Manchester, Worcester, &c., have frequently witnessed immense concourses of the lovers of thousand-voiced harmony. The Germans of New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore do not suffer to die in this country and in our day the recollection of the reunions of the "Liederkränze," "Liederbunde," and other "Musikalische Gesellschaften" of the Fatherland.

Nor ought we to overlook, among the novelties of our time, those small troupes which, under the appellation of "Ethiopian Serenaders," "Negro Melodists," "Sable Minstrels," "Æolian Vocalists," and the like, have become from their endless number, and the peculiarity of their song and designation, a national characteristic of the United States of America; a class whose widespread influence, it cannot but be feared, has been detrimental to the purity and dignity of the Art; nor those other and similar bands which under the designation of "brothers" and "families," by their simple and oftentimes (from the natural affinity of voice existing between father and son, sister and brother,) peculiarly blending strains, have left pleasing recollections in ten thousand of the less tutored ears at home and abroad. The Hermanns, and after them, at a considerable interval, the Rayners, whose arrival here is within the recollection of all, were, if I mistake not, the pioneers in this country of this species of singing.

It has been often remarked that no female composer of acknowledged eminence has ever yet appeared. The year 1851 still records the lack. Without intending any disparagement of a sex which has given so frequent evidence of the highest attainments in various departments of science and art, we may be pardoned for asking with Cyril, in Tennyson's "Princess,"

But when did woman ever yet invent?

An Opera, an Oratorio, a Symphony, a Trio, a Quartet, an Overture, a Cantata—never! But may we not, when we observe all the signs about us in this our day, since to her sex can no longer be denied the possession of "the vision and the faculty divine," expect to see her too winning the fame, not only of a splendid pianist and magnificent vocalist, but of the great composer; and having her beauty and grace associated with this of all arts most enchanting, the sweet sister of that to which a Barrett, a Hemans, a Norton have imparted charms otherwise unknown?

[To be concluded in our next.]

NEW MUSICAL INSTRUMENT. Mr. Freberhuyser, a musician of Albany, has invented a new musical instrument, the materials used for its construction being sea shells. The exterior of the shell is not disturbed, and retains all its rough attractions. The month-piece is fitted to a screw tube adjusted at the head of the shell. Along the sides the key holes are arranged at proper intervals, and the edges carefully lined. A valve lined with velvet, hinged at one corner, covers the mouth of the shell, and is compressed or opened as the character of the music requires. At the opposite and extreme corner of the mouth, the vent is left for the egress of the surplus air. The instrument, therefore, with the valves and keys closed, is air-tight, and the variations in the size and natural organization of the shell, furnish the change in the tone of the instrument. The music is said to be powerful and agreeable.

The Part-Songs of Germany.

It is forty years since Zelter (best known in England as Goethe's correspondent) and his friend Fleming, founded at Berlin a congregation of staid elderly men, who met once a month to sit down to a good supper, and to diversify the pleasures of the table by singing four-part songs, principally composed by themselves. Their number was forty; and far the larger part of it composed of amateurs or men in office. It was an original statute that no one was eligible as a member who was not a composer, a poet, or a singer. During his lifetime Zelter was their president and principal composer; and in no branch of art did his peculiar talent evidence itself so brightly as in these convivial effusions, where humor, raciness, a masterly employment of the limited material at his disposal, and a fine sense of the poetry he took in hand, distinguish him among his contemporaries. Goethe used to give his songs to be composed by Zelter; and many of them were sung at the Berlin "Liedertafel" before they were printed or known elsewhere. Fleming also contributed some fair musical compositions,—that to Horace's ode, "Integer vitae," amongst others.

It was in the year 1815, or thereabouts, that Berger, Klein, and a younger generation of musicians, founded a young "Liedertafel" society, on the same principle, and for the same number of members. Friedrich Forster wrote some very pretty songs for it. Hoffman, the novel writer and kapellmeister, made it one scene of his strange and extravagant existence; and left behind him there an immortal comic song—"Turkische Musik," the words by Friedrich Forster. In general, a gayer and more spirited tone pervaded this younger society than belonged to their classical seniors. It was the practise of both bodies to invite guests on holiday occasions; and by the younger part-singers ladies were admitted twice a year. Nothing could be sprightlier or pleasanter, a little extra noise allowed for, than these latter meetings. They were not long in spreading far and wide. The good suppers became of less integral consequence; original compositions were not always attainable; but in every town it was natural to collect the younger men of all classes, for the purpose of singing together. A regular system of organization, of division and sub-division, has arranged itself. The town societies in combination form provincial assemblies, where many hundreds come together. In the north of Germany the large class of young men who are either schoolmasters or organists in the towns and villages, or are educated as such at the normal schools, have societies of their own, and periodical celebrations.

The provincial festivals of these societies are held in the good time of the year, so that open air performances are practicable. A fine site, too, is a thing always chosen. Not very long before my Harz ramble, the Liedertafeln societies of that district had been holding a congress at Blakenburg. These Liedertafeln societies take part in other celebrations not their own. When Schiller's statue was inaugurated in Stuttgart, the singing bodies of all the towns in the districts round about poured in through the gates of the town, one after the other, each with its banners and its music, till the separate chords, to speak fancifully, united in a grand chorus in the market-place. And while there exists a well-trained army of volunteer choristers ready to be called into action on all occasions—it need not be pointed out how different it is in quality to the body of subordinates at once semi-professional and untaught, at whose mercy lies so much of the best music ever to be heard in England—I should say, did lie; for part-singing is now flourishing with us like the bean-tree in the fairy tale.

It is needless, again, to remark how the works which make a whole great people vocal, must have a value and an interest in more aspects than one. To offer an instance or two likely to be familiar to the English—Music has nothing nobler in her stores than the battle songs in which the harmonies of Weber and the burning words of Körner are united. We sit by our firesides, it is true, and know not the sound of an enemy's cavalry in the streets, nor the booming of an enemy's cannon without our gates; and hence are touched only faintly by the spell of the soul within them; but it is impossible coldly to listen to the masculine chords and bold modulations of "Lützow's Wild Chase," and the "Sword Song," and the "Husarenlied." Again, we have taken home to ourselves and half nationalized "Am Rhein," among our "Black eyed Susans" and "Rule Britannias," because of its spirit and beauty; though we cannot feel, save dramatically, and by going out of ourselves as well as from home, the joviality and mirth of those who dwell in a wine land, or the kindling of such a spirit as moved the army of Liberators on their return from victory, when within sight of Ehrenbreitstein, to burst out with one consent into that noble melody which was heard with little ceasing for two days and nights while the band was passing over the river!

Honor, then, to the part-songs of Germany, and better acquaintance with them! is not the worst toast one could propose at a glee club.—Chorley's Music and Manners in France and Germany.

Robert Schumann's Musical Life-Maxims.

XXIII. Consider it a monstrosity to alter, or to leave out anything, or to introduce any new-fangled ornaments in pieces by a good composer. That is the greatest outrage you can do to Art.

XXIV. In the selection of your pieces for study, ask advice of older players; that will save you much time.

XXV. You must gradually make acquaintance with all the more important works of all the important masters.

XXVI. Be not led astray by the brilliant popularity of the so-called great virtuosi. Think more of the applause of artists, than of that of the multitude.

XXVII. Every fashion grows unfashionable again: if you persist in it for years, you find yourself a ridiculous coxcomb in the eyes of everybody.

XXVIII. It is more injury than profit to you to play a great deal before company. Have a regard to other people; but never play anything which, in your inmost soul, you are ashamed of.

XXIX. Omit no opportunity, however, to play with others, in Duos, Trios, &c. It makes you playing fluent, spirited, and easy. Accompany a singer, when you can.

XXX. If all would play first violin, we could get no orchestra together. Respect each musician, therefore, in his place.

XXXI. Love your instrument, but do not have the vanity to think it the highest and only one. Consider that there are others quite as fine. Remember, too, that there are singers, that the highest manifestations in Music are through chorus and orchestra combined.

XXXII. As you progress, have more to do with scores, than with virtuosi.

XXXIII. Practise industriously the Fugues of good masters, above all those of JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH. Make the "Well-tempered Clavichord" your daily bread. Then you will surely be a thorough musician.

XXXIV. Seek among your associates, those who know more than you.

XXXV. For recreation from your musical studies, read the poets frequently. Walk also in the open air.

XXXVI. Much may be learned from singers, male and female; but do not believe in them for everything.

XXXVII. Behind the mountains there live people, too. Be modest; as yet you have discovered and thought nothing which others have not thought and discovered before you. And even if you have done so, regard it as a gift from above, which you have got to share with others.

XXXVIII. The study of the history of Music, supported by the actual hearing of the master compositions of the different epochs, is the shortest way to cure you of self-esteem and vanity.

Musical Review.

Gems of German Song. Seventh Series. Boston: Geo. P. Reed & Co.

No. 7. Spring of Love. MENDELSSOHN.

" 8. Spring Time. A. FESCA.

" 9. Spring's Approach. G. WOEHLE.

" 10. Red, Red Rose. A. FESCA.

It is some fifteen years, we think, since Mr. Reed began to experiment upon our American musical taste, by publishing, from time to time, one or two choice specimens from the modern song-composers of Germany. And we remember with what avidity the "Last Greeting" and the "Passing Bell" of FRANZ SCHUBERT were then welcomed, and how this new and deeper appetite began to spread among our young music-lovers. It was the revelation of a new world of song to those who had only known English songs and ballads, sentimental love-strains with the most meagre common chord accompaniments, and so on. Meanwhile, by a variety of opportunities, we have become better acquainted, vocally and instrumentally, with the German masters, and there are many among our amateurs who do not shrink from the most difficult and picturesque accompaniments, which envelop so inseparably most of their melodic inspirations. There seems to have been a market for song after song—frequently the most complex and artistic—of Schubert, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Kalliwoda, Spohr, &c.; and now the title page of these last issues presents verily a rich and tempting catalogue,—nearly sixty in all.

We cannot say that all of these sixty songs come fully up to the standard set by those which first gave the series its character. They are of quite various degrees of merit. After Beethoven's incomparable "Adelaide," after Schubert's "Serenade" and "Ave Maria" and "Young Nun" and "Du bist die Ruh," after Mendelssohn's "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges," it would be hard indeed to explore indefinitely and never descend. Such "wings of song" are given to but few, and in them they are not always "renewed like the eagle's." Whatever may have been wanting to the ideal we had formed for such a serial publication—grateful as we are in any case for the whole of it—naturally occurs in an examination of these four fresh numbers, named above.

In the first of them (No. 7,) we recognize an arrangement of one of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," that beautiful Andante con Moto, which forms the first of the fourth set (op. 53), a favorite with pianists, and which sings itself sweetly enough even without words, under skilful fingers, if the player only feels. And it is far easier to extract its melody and meaning in that way, than to find the voice that can adequately sing it to whatever words. Yet it is a melody which suggests words, and whoever put the German words, here given, to it, (for aught we know, it may have been Mendelssohn himself,) has done it cleverly. The English is a very far off imitation and not half so sing-able. The song is certainly beautiful in itself and curious for its derivation; but why go to tunes written for the strings to sing, when there are so many of equal merit and like spirit made in the first instance for the voice?

No. 8, by Fesca, treats the images of Spring, the "golden sunshine in the rippling waters," the "drooping flowers," the "gold-tinted dew-drops," "zephyrs," "willows," "water-nymphs," "Philomel," &c., in a flowing romantic Allegro, with a descriptive, fairy-like accompaniment, full of modulation and ppp., and not to be mastered all at once. Fairly learned it must be quite effective, but after that song of Mendelssohn's it seems to show more skill than melodic inspiration. A race so musically learned and accomplished as the Germans will naturally produce a hundred songs from fair to clever for every one of its proper "gems of song." We know not how far a fine singer and pianist might overcome our hesitation to accept this song of Fesca's as such a gem.

No. 9, is a beautiful song; still we fancy it would be esteemed common-place among Germans; but this too may be because the Schubert and Mendelssohn specimens have spoiled us. To neither of the two last are German words given. This omission we always regret; the number of German readers is constantly increasing; the original words in the best German songs are generally true poems and inseparable from the melody, and the English words ought to be as close a reproduction of these as possible, with the original side by side for comparison. For the object in such a re-publication should be, not only to furnish good available songs, but to convey as accurate and worthy an idea as possible to us Americans of what are the famous songs of Germany and wherein they deserve their fame.

No. 10, again by Fesca, was composed to a German version of Burns' song: "O, my love is like the red, red rose." It is a pleasing, simple melody; yet it seems to lack the inspiration and is not half as naturally wedded to the words as the old tune with which they have been associated to English ears.

Nothing in the above remarks must be construed to mean that Mr. Reed's "Gems" include anything not highly worthy the attention of the singer and song-lover. Yet we should be glad to see a serial selection of the most truly classic German songs. We use the word in a generous sense. We have no idea of restricting it to Bach and Handel, to Mozart and Beethoven, or even to Mendelssohn and Schubert. We mean those songs, by whosoever written, sometimes by some of the Dii minorum gentium, it may be, which have become established favorites in Germany, and on which the fame of their authors as song-writers mainly rests;—those which not to know is not to know musical Germany. There are many yet left of the best of Schubert, which we can hardly afford to postpone to clever second-rate productions. Then again it is perhaps time to extend the list into some of the newest developments of German song genius. It might be safe to venture a few specimens of ROBERT SCHUMANN, who now claims the highest honors since the death of Mendelssohn. To be sure, his place as a composer is as yet a problem, the German world being divided between Schumann-ites and anti-Schumann-ites; but it is something in his favor, so far certainly as his very numerous Lieder are concerned, that the "Queen of Song" herself is among their most partial admirers, and has been heard more than once to express her preference for them even above those of Schubert. Then there is ROBERT FRANZ, a younger man, whose songs have the real inspiration—and there is TAUBERT, and LINDBLAD, who although a Swede and full of nationality, may yet be classed by proper affinity with the Germans. These are the first-rate men, the true creators; why go to the imitators, before we know them!

1. Hommage à Alex. Dreyschock. Impromptu pour le Piano. Op. 3. WILLIAM MASON. Leipzig.
2. Amitié pour Amitié, Morceau de Salon. Op. 4. By the same.

These are graceful little compositions, with themes agreeable and characteristic, although not strikingly original, and wrought out to considerable elaborateness after the modern fantasia style. They evince true study of harmony and of the art of carrying along and interweaving individual parts. We do not suppose the young author laid himself out much in them, or that they are to be taken for much more than easy chance specimens of his every-day musical activity in that "land of real music" where he so wisely prolongs his studies; nor can they have much chance of distinction amid the works of prolific swarms of German pianists of every degree of talent. But for a young American student, a born Yankee, they are certainly highly creditable; and we shall be glad when the mastery of this art, which Mr. Mason, is seeking in Germany, shall be turned to the furthering of the cause of musical taste again in his own country. We look in great part to our young countrymen, now studying the art in its true home, for the realization of some future American Conservatory of Music.

Fading Flowers. A Song. By WILLIAM MASON. New York: Firth, Pond & Co.

A very simple, but by no means commonplace melody, in the minor mood, by the same young author. The accompaniment, too, while very simple, is unique in form and quite expressive.

Mr. Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St., besides his classical reprints, continues to encourage native efforts, in the small popular forms of Polkas, Waltzes, Marches, and easy Songs. We have to acknowledge the following, which have all something to recommend them in their proper line, and we do not know that the market for such things is at all affected by criticism, just or unjust, minute or general.

1. Sprite Polka. By JAMES G. BARNETT.
2. Paradise Polka. By JOHN S. WRIGHT.
3. Memento Polka. By EDWARD S. CUMMINGS.
4. Independent Boston Fusileers' March. By N. K. BACON.
5. "Do they Miss Me at Home?" as sung by the "Amphoons." Music by S. M. GRANNIS.

This last is rather of the sentimental order, too much affected by the singing "families;" and we presume it is the sentiment, rather than the music, that is relied on as the excuse for publicity.

6. Oh! Touch those Thrilling Chords again. A Ballad. By WILLIAM R. DEMPSTER.

A simple, pleasing melody, within an easy range of voice.

Beethoven's Sonatas. Op. 31, No. 2, in D minor. pp. 18. Price 75 cents. Boston: O. Ditson.

This makes the seventeenth Sonata of this elegant and cheap edition. And it is one of the most wild and exquisite tone-poems of the whole series. It is one of the two Sonatas of which it is related that Beethoven, when asked what suggested their idea to him, replied: "Read Shakspeare's Tempest." And truly the music conveys the spirit of that marvellous creation as perfectly as his overtures to Egmont and to Coriolanus give the spirit of those two tragedies. In that power of entering into the spirit of whatever subject, Beethoven possessed a Shakspearian genius. The Allegro of this Sonata gives the idea of ocean, storm, and supernatural agency. In two little monochord fragments of recitative, you may seem to hear the wondering, pleading voice of Miranda and the calm, wise reply of the magician father. The Largo has the most deep and grand expression, and the Allegretto Finale is a most exquisite and Ariel-like movement.—What is all the finger-facility of Herz and De Meyer, compared with the power to read and feel and reproduce at will so beautiful a poem?

NEW YORK, June 24.

These days would become my native Persia. Yet although we all naturally "seek the shade, and find wisdom"—where we can, in such weather, I delight to see that the hard siege of the relentless Winter is raised at last, and to feel once more a budding belief in Summer and the Tropics. But we have been more in Germany than America since Saturday night. You had heard of the German Glee Congress, or festival of singers, which was held last year in Baltimore, and the year before in Philadelphia. Feeling themselves sufficiently prepared for metropolitan approval, they determined to hold their third annual Jubilee in New York, and it has been a great and deserved triumph.

They arrived all through the day on Saturday, making their head-quarters at the Apollo, and in the evening repaired to the Park where, with flaring torches and flashing banners, and a swaying motley crowd, they presented a beautiful and unique spectacle. They chanted and sang and made speeches, and had an exciting time, while the merely political crowd was assembled around the Tribune office, impatient for Baltimore news. The procession moved down Broadway to Fulton street, and returning came up Nassau into Chatham, and so up the Bowery, and back again to the Apollo. As they passed with festal music playing popular airs and songs, waving their banners, huzzaing and singing, there was a delightful want of rowdiness in the show, which contrasted well with the torch-light procession of the Democratic ratification meeting a few evenings since, of which boozy, brawling and abundant noise and fury, most evidently signifying nothing, were the characteristics.

At the Apollo there were more speeches and congratulations and pledgings of all kinds, and at length a general going home to bed. In the morning the Musik-Local of the Apollo was very handsomely decorated with a huge golden harp surrounded by evergreens, and supported on each side by the American and German flags. There was no breeze and the drapery hung gracefully and undisturbed over the balcony. Beneath, upon the sidewalks and lounging around the door, were the groups of singers in every kind of costume, cap, hat and badge, looking like a set of German students hurrying around the lecture room of the University. During Sunday the New Yorkers showed their guests the various elephants, after a grand rehearsal at the Apollo. And in the evening took place the "grand sacred concert" at Metropolitan Hall. The building was crowded with Germans and it was easy to feel the suppressed enthusiasm of the audience before the concert began. It had one little vent, when KOSSUTH entered. We all rose and shouted and waved our hats and were charmed with the graceful suavity with which the noble Hungarian received our homage.

An immense stage had been erected with a little box or pulpit, for Herr Agriol Pauer, who was to conduct the performance, and after repeated demonstrations of impatience, that gentleman ascended to his place, with a silver baton presented in honor of the occasion, and with a vigorous wave of his arm, swung the orchestra of more than a hundred performers into the masterly overture to Oberon. The long, waving, mingling, dreamy chords of the introduction are in the sweetest style of romantic music, and of Weber, its truest interpreter. Throughout, the picturesque power of the composer develops itself in fathomless and suggestive harmonies, and although it was easy to feel that it is not so rippling, dancing and weird as Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," yet it has a gravity and depth of pathos which are admirable and characteristic. Weber is always a richer composer, always fuller of musical material than his successor, but the latter has a breadth and beauty and propriety of treatment which is quite unmatched in musical history. In "Oberon" and the "Midsummer Night's Dream," they are much alike in conception, as was unavoidable. Of the two, the first is the wildest, the last, most aerial and fairy-like.

Directly after this full-voiced overture, which was admirably done, with the utmost accuracy and true feeling, your Boston Liederkrantz sang. The effect was a little thin and insufficient after the instruments. But when the ear grew accustomed to the voice, the delight was universal and enthusiastic. The audience had pride and sympathy in all that was done, and the performers threw themselves with all their souls into the work. Each club sang separately, advancing and retiring with the precision of military discipline. Flowers fell profusely at the close of each glee, and when the Junger Männer Chor of Philadelphia sang Zimmerman's Harfner's Lied from Wilhelm Meister, Wer nie sein brod, &c., there was a rain of bouquets from every quarter of the hall, and a burst of acclamation that insisted, imperially, upon a repetition. The charm of the music, is its exquisite fitness to the song; and the majestic consent of so many voices—now shaded into the most delicate breath of wailing, now rising into the pealing triumph of assertion—produced an effect of whose absorbing interest I can give you no idea. Among the novelties of the concert was the overture to the Zauberflöte of Mozart, chanted by the Liedertafel of Philadelphia. But I was compelled to leave before this was sung—and the concert was not over until nearly midnight.

On Monday morning the clubs all marched in procession through the Park and up the Bowery to Broadway, down which they passed to the rehearsal at Metropolitan Hall. It was a fine sight, but entirely un-American. There was a slouching ease in the mass, most of whom wore straw hats, and carried fans, which was very suggestive of similar scenes in Germany. The banner, schwarz, roth und gold, the German tricolor, was borne in front, and made a rich and imposing show. They paused and saluted Gov. Kossuth at his residence in 16th street, and received from him his customary dignified and cordial acknowledgment.

The Monday evening's concert was very fine. It was exclusively choral singing—fancy it. An orchestra of more than a hundred, and twelve hundred singers! Metropolitan Hall was more than a third filled with the necessary platform, and the choral singing was colossal beyond anything I have ever heard in any country. It was not mere noise. It was musical sound adequately directed to musical ends. The director swayed the mighty mass as easily as the tides are swayed, and not less deep and grand than the ocean were the ponderous and profound effects. They were subdued, too, when needed, to the softest strain. It was a great musical triumph.

A Pic-Nic in the beautiful grounds of Elm-Grove upon the island, on Tuesday afternoon, of which I must steal another moment to tell you, closed this magnificent Jubilee. HAFIZ.

A MUSICAL SEAL. The "Boston Music Hall Association" have reaped one of the first fruits of the "New England School of Design for Women," at this early stage of its existence, in the shape of a fine emblematic design for their Corporation Seal. The work was put in competition among the designing young ladies of the School and quite a number of cunningly artistic designs were elicited. It was a perplexing choice; but the one finally accepted by the Committee is a beautiful figure of St. Cecilia, designed by Miss Jane M. Clark, who has already become a teacher in the School, and is constantly giving proof of rare and various artistic talent.

The School of Design works to a charm. A few days since we were shown the first printed specimens of lithographic engraving emanating from its pupils; in accuracy, grace and freedom they shame some more practiced hands. The inventive faculty already called forth in this school in arabesques and all kinds of ornamental drawing, far exceeds the sanguine expectations of its friends and founders. Here is really a whole series of elegant remunerative occupations opened to our sisters, who by instinct and by talent should be ministers of the Beautiful.

To bring these remarks more to a practical point, we would direct the attention of our music-publishers, who are always seeking new inventions for the vignettes on the title-pages of their music, to the School of Design. We are sure that they will find it a rich source of fresh and beautiful plans suited to all their requirements. Let them cast their lines upon these waters, and try it once or twice; that is, send in their orders, and see if they cannot get something original, without having to borrow from French and German works of the same sort.

A QUESTION FOR MUSIC-PUBLISHERS. Can any one inform us why it is that printed music never bears a date? why we are always left in ignorance, so far as the printed sheet or volume tells us, whether the work be old or new? and why it is not as important and as expedient on all accounts that music should be dated, as that a letter or a book should be?

Is it for so transcendental a reason, as that music is supposed to be of no time, but to belong only to the "Everlasting Now," as it is also said to be limited to no point in space, being a universal language?—Or is it left dateless for the express end to conceal its age, as if from an instinct of publishers that only novelties, like young maids, are vendable?—Surely a false calculation this, seeing that good music, like good wine, improves and charms the more by age.

We know not but we call in question, with profane simplicity, one of the profoundest and most important mysteries of the trade. But really it would much help the student, buyer and collector of music, to know when a composition was born into the world, and whether such or such an edition of it is the older. Posthumous publications and reprints, arrangements, &c., ought to bear the dates both of the composition and of the publication.—Will not our friends Reed or Ditson set this good example?

GERMAN "LIEDERTAFELN." The glowing account by our correspondent "Hafiz" of the German festival in New York, will naturally awaken a desire to know something of the origin of these tuneful organizations. We give therefore on another page an extract from Chorley's "Music and Manners in Germany," which will go far to satisfy this desire. It is pleasant to be able to associate the birth of so beautiful a custom with GOETHE's sterling old friend, ZELTER, the founder of the Sing-Akademie at Berlin.

MADAME GOLDSCHMIDT, says a letter by the Niagara at Halifax, had arrived out in good health and spirits, and been warmly welcomed by her old friends in England. She had received various propositions to sing in operas, oratorios, &c., but had as yet made no definite answers.

A NEW PRIMA DONNA. The music-lovers in Copenhagen have for a year or two past been growing enthusiastic about a young native singer, Mlle. CAROLINE LEHMANN, who has created quite a furore at the theatre as Agatha in Der Freyschütz, as Romeo &c., and at the concerts of the great symphony composer, Niels W. Gade. Mlle. L. is the sister of Mr. Lehmann of our Mendelssohn Quintet Club, and will accompany her brother hither on his return to Boston early in September. The Transcript says:

"We have just read the translation of a criticism by Gade. He expresses unqualified admiration of her school, and more especially her voice, which is a mezzo-soprano of great compass, (reaching from F in the bass to C in alt., a distance of two octaves and a fifth,) of a rich tone, and of the most sympathetic quality. Gade stamps her as a genuine artist of the first quality.

"She is yet very young, being but twenty-two, has rather a handsome, prepossessing face, and a fine figure; in fact, she has all the physical and mental qualities to constitute a great and favorite artist.

"Having never been farther from the city of her birth, Copenhagen, than Stockholm, she is comparatively unknown to the French and English journals; however, the articles that have appeared in the more northern ones, have been in terms of the greatest praise."

Several of these (translated by a friend) are in our hands. One, dated December 1850, notices a Concert of GADE, at which several of his own compositions were performed; among which it names

"'Agnes and the Mermaids,'—an enchanted piece of music, the impression of which was still more deepened by Mlle. Lehmann's charming representation. We can but express our regret at the little opportunity this gifted songstress has enjoyed for the development of her talent, which without doubt is a great acquisition to our Opera. Her rendering of the part of Agnes was tasteful and correct, and at the same time so perfectly in the spirit of the composition, that it transported even the sterner musical public present to enthusiastic applause, of which the composer (N. W. Gade) no doubt with joy ascribes a well earned share to Mlle. Lehmann."

Another (Jan. 1851) speaks of her in Der Freyschutz:

"Mlle. Lehmann is already well known from her successful debut as Romeo. There is a wide difference between these two characters—between the passionate son of Italy, and the romantic, melancholy, superstitious maid of Germany; a difference as great as that between Italian and German music. Mdlle. L. proved that she completely conceived the peculiarities of this music also.

SUMMER AFTERNOON CONCERTS. The second took place on Friday of last week and was as successful as the first. The want of an obœ had been happily supplied in Sig. De Ribas. The number of brass instrument performances was reduced to three out of the nine pieces in the programme, making the concert mainly orchestral. Two good overtures were played, one (new to our ears) a spirited and interesting composition by Kuhlau: the other, Mozart's to Nozze di Figaro. In this last it seemed to us that, in the conductor's care to drill his forces into due regard to light and shade and emphasis, and to teach them to avoid the level, careless, routine way of playing, the forzando effects were rather overdone; but this will soon remedy itself, as so important a point of expression had better be exaggerated at first than be habitually slighted. Here too, of course, the paucity of violins was partly answerable, and we are happy to learn that their number has since been increased. The clarinet solo, by Mr. Guenther, was a pleasing selection, played with a good feeling and with much richness of tone; but the orchestral accompaniment showed lack of rehearsal. The movement with variations ("God save the Emperor") from Haydn's String Quartet was finely played by Messrs. Suck, Werner, Eichler and W. Fries.

Yesterday's programme contained Weber's Overture to Euryanthe and the first and last movements from one of Haydn's Symphonies; also an arrangement by Mr. Suck, of Schubert's Ave Maria, for several obligato instruments with orchestral accompaniment. Better and better.

SCOTTISH MUSICAL AND LITERARY RE-UNIONS. A very curious entertainment by the FRASER family, (father, son and two daughters), is nightly frequented at the Masonic Temple. It is genuinely Scottish, and the party are but recently from Scotland; the programmes consist mainly of the old familiar Scotch songs and ballads, sung principally by the two young ladies, with the father at the piano and the brother accompanying on the violin, all sometimes joining their voices. They seem enthusiasts about this species of music, and render it with an uncommon energy of expression. Mr. Fraser prefaces each piece with a short account of its origin and connection with Scottish social life, sometimes reading the words ("Home, sweet home," &c.) with a good deal of unction. We cannot but admire the arduous "Objects" which this family have felt inspired to undertake, as set forth at the top of their programmes, viz: "We labor to elevate Music (!) and Song to that high Literary and Educational position on which they ought to stand," &c.

New York.

A FRENCH OPERA TROUPE is playing at Niblo's, — a little spot of dancing sunshine, we should fancy, tossed from the merry waters of the Opera Comique. The prima donna is Madame FLEURY JOLY, who is said to possess a fine silvery soprano, with nothing of the French nasal twang. The piece is Une Songe d'une nuit d'été, a sort of French Midsummer Night's Dream, in which are boldly introduced Queen Elizabeth, Shakspeare (!) and the Fat Knight. Mons. DIGUET figures as Shakspeare.

"THE WALDENSES." The following is the plan of Mr. Asahel Abbot's new Oratorio performed last week by the Harmonic Society:

"The people of a Waldensian village open the morning with a hymn. While a part celebrate their happy exemption from the corruptions and misfortunes that attend the state of opulent and lawless nations, another portion go out to hunt the chamois in the mountains.

"Others ascend the hill with their flocks, and are enclosed with a thunder storm. With the approach of night they return.

"They hold a musical entertainment, wherein are noticed some incidents in the history of their race, especially a celebrated persecution at the season of Christmas, and that when their fathers were driven from their country, with the re-conquest of it from the French after their memorable march across the Alps from the lake of Geneva, under the leading of their pastor.

"With the Sabbath morning the people assemble for worship. At the close of their Liturgy an alarm of invasion is given and all rush to arms. A battle follows, and a victory. They celebrate their success with a hymn of praise; then turn to bewail the slain. The leader's wife, having been mortally wounded in the battle, dies, and a dirge is sung at her grave. The solos predict the ruin of the Anti-Christian powers, and, with the chorus, sing 'Great and marvellous are Thy works, O Lord God Almighty.'"

Mr. Abbot is a phenomenon. He is a sturdy, self-made New Englander who has for some years taught music in New York; but, what is more, can boast himself the composer of an incredible number of oratorios and other scores in great forms. Not only that: he has instructed several of his pupils to be likewise composers of great oratorios. To hear him talk, you would suppose that great oratorios grew on every bush, where he resided. — We know nothing of the merit of Mr. Abbot's music, and trust that it will have a fair chance. The "Waldenses," we understand, is one of a series which he designs to sketch in honor of the different races that have struggled for liberty through the last 1600 years.

ALBONI. All the New York papers are of course in raptures over the great Contralto's American debut on Wednesday evening. Not hearing from our own correspondent in season for the press, we give with full reliance what the Tribune says:

"Alboni has achieved a triumph even more brilliant than we had anticipated. The hall was crowded with a 'brilliant and fashionable' audience.

"The rattling, rumbling, characteristic overture to La Gazza Ladra opened the concert. Signor Sangiovanni sang the cavatina Languir per una bella from L'Italiana in Algieri. He is destined to sure success. His voice is a delicate tenor, of rare sweetness, purity and flexibility. Its quality is sympathetic to that degree that we are constantly reminded of the traditions of Rubini's wonderful organ. To this exquisite quality of voice Signor Sangiovanni adds an equal cultivation, singing with a fluent, limpid grace, and with a brilliancy of fiorture remarkable in so young and — not to say it slightly — so unknown a singer. His shake is clear, his slides and roulades accurate and true. His organ, however, is far from powerful.

"With Signor Rovere, the Basso, we were not so much pleased. He has a good, full voice, not striking in any particular, and he sings with knowledge and facility. In a concerted movement he is essential and effective. But he is much too exaggerated. His fun is too funny, his accent quite too staccato, his action altogether decidedly unsuited to the concert room.

"Madame Alboni, in a flounced white silk dress, low-necked and short-sleeved, (so a learned and lovely said) with a single diamond-bracelet upon her right arm, her short black hair unadorned, and holding a fan, handkerchief, and a sheet of music, was led forward by Signor Arditi and was received with prolonged and renewed applause. She acknowledged her flattering, but voiceless, reception by a frank and smiling obeisance, — bent again and again, as the plaudits continued, bowed finally to the conductor and the orchestra, and placidly awaited the cessation of clapping. Her delivery of the recitative Eccomi affine in Babilonia displayed immediately the breadth and entire finish of her manner, the unparalleled ease and exquisite flexibility of her delivery, — and the whole scena revealed the range, the quality and the power of her voice. It is a pure contralto, but its high notes, which are very high, are round and, what is very remarkable, pure and sweet. She stands like a statue, and the music flows, without the slightest effort, from her mouth. In all the most critical, and — for a singer — dangerous and difficult passages, it pours on as full and unencumbered as ever, gliding through the most elaborate and exquisite fiorture as easily as a sunbeam through space. Her singing is truly shaded. Its effects in the piano passages are pencilled with aerial delicacy; her forte is strong, broad and clear and her shake,

" — call it the well's bubbling, the bird's warble."

Over all these fine details presides the supremest sense of power. Her singing costs her no more effort than graceful movement costs a natural, graceful person; and we felt last evening what we felt the first evening we heard her four years since, that here is a genial Italian, gifted with a wonderful voice, which she has had the good sense to cultivate and develop to its extremest possibility. Consequently it is as satisfactory to hear her in the concert room as in the opera. The charm begins and ends in the voice. She has not the dramatic power which results from genius, and from a remarkable individuality, but her true taste in singing, and the magnificent organ controlled by that taste, seduce us into asking no questions, into making no demands.

"The Brindisi brought down the first tumultuous applause. It was taken in a quick time and delivered with perfect simplicity. She allowed herself but a single ornament, one pure and perfect shake, as if indeed il segreto per esser felice were bubbling through her lips; and the final measure she varied by descending, with charming phrasing, quite into the depths of her voice. To the unanimous encore she graciously responded by repeating the last verse.

"In the duet with Sangiovanni, Tornami a dir che m'ami, from Don Pasquale, the same beautiful simplicity was evident not less in the general delivery than in the full, fine sweep at the close. In the first few bars, especially, Sangiovanni's voice was calm as moonlight. Its fresh sweetness mingled deliciously with the gushing freedom of the contralto. 'It had a dying fall,' it was a persuasive strain of the sweet South.

"The concert closed with Non piu mesta. This was always one of Alboni's great triumphs, but never greater than last evening. The profusion of skill, the prodigality of perfect vocalization, with which the brilliant rondo was delivered, was the final drop of ecstasy in the evening's delight. The intoxicated audience could not contain itself, but burst in upon the closing notes, thoughtlessly rendering them inaudible. But the imperturbable singer smiled — her eyes swam with pleasure at the pleasure she gave; she thrilled, she warbled, she slid, she rouladed, she soared, she sank — and ending, she bowed, in retiring, with a sparkling smile, advancing again to the unintermitted applause — the cries — the waving handkerchiefs; and, laden with bouquets, repeated the allegro of the song as freshly and nimbly as if she had not sung for a month. There were more shouts, flowers and ecstasies. It was, as we said, an ovation."

Music in the past Half Century.

An Address delivered before the Harvard Musical Association, at Cohituate Hall, Boston, Dec. 22, 1851.

BY SAMUEL JENNISON, JR.

Let me not forget at this time to give expression to a single thought for our country. We are continually reminded that hitherto we have had no music. Nor have we been, nor are we yet ripe for it. But let us not despair for our country. I cannot but believe, that from beneath this thrift, this utilitarianism, this cunning, there will yet force its way to the light this flower,—Art, in all its varieties; that Germany and France, and Italy, all resplendent as she is, shall not be forever monopolists of all that is glorious and divine, and America be repellant forever: I cannot bring myself to believe that a land so fruitful of statesmen, orators, and men of science, and no longer deficient in historian, poet, painter, and sculptor, shall be forever destitute of the great Musician. Only he will not derive his inspiration and nurture from the unmeaning publications of which our day and our country are so prolific; with which the love of pecuniary profit, or the desire to gratify a fleeting fashion, have inundated us.

And now, as we draw near our conclusion, let us not separate without paying a passing tribute by bringing before our minds at least the names of some of those illustrious composers the world has within this period lost.

HAYDN, the father of instrumental music, whose name has been longer known among us than almost any other, although the beautiful finish of his Symphony, Mass and Quartett are still as sealed books save to a few.

PLEYEL, whose fame was once so great that no quartett or sonata was endurable but his own; and who, when Salomon was producing the twelve famous Symphonies of Haydn, at his Concerts in London, was sent for to come to England and compose for the rival Professional Concerts, as being the ablest competitor of the great Symphonist; yet of whom among us scarce any thing is known but one or two simple church melodies which bear his name.

ALBRECHTSBERGER died in the same year with Haydn, 1809; most learned trainer of so many geniuses;—he whom Haydn consulted, under whom Beethoven, Hummel, Seyfried, and Weigl pursued their study.

GRETRY, so distinguished in France, and in whose Cœur de Lion occurs that memorable song, O Richard, o mon roi, historically associated with the downfall of Louis XVI.

HUMMEL and FIELD: the latter once unrivalled as a pianist, who, on hearing the masterly improvisations of the former, then unknown to him, exclaimed, "You must be Hummel, for there is no other in Europe who can thus surpass me."

CLEMENTI, every where styled the "Father of the Piano Forte."

MICHAEL KELLY, the first English male singer who had ever been heard in Italy or even on the Continent; and to whom,—suspected of adulterating the liquors in which he dealt, as well as of plagiarism in his musical productions,—that witty designation was given by Sheridan, "Composer of wines, and importer of music."

WEBER, author of Der Freyschütz and Eury-anthe;

HEROLD, of Zampa; ROMBERG, of the Song of the Bell; ROOKE, of Amilie; CALLCOTT and SAMUEL WEBBE, ATTWOOD, CLARKE, ARNOLD, of English celebrity, and known so widely for their glees; CHERUBINI, MEHUL, GOSSEC, among the founders of the Conservatoire; RIES, sole pupil of Beethoven; PICCINI, CIMAROSA, BOCCHERINI and NAUMANN, HOFMEISTER and DUSSEK; KOZELUCH and HIMMEL, WINTER, BOILDIEU, ONSLOW, PIXIS, KALKBRENNER, PAER, KUHLAU, STORACE, SHIELD, KING; and numerous others, the evil of whose works has not, we trust, lived after them; the good has surely not been interred with their bones.

One illustrious group has not yet been named, of whom neither had attained to the years of middle life; horn, flourishing, and dying, within the period of which we speak; one famed for the originality of his piano forte compositions,—here most commonly known for the Mazurka; one for the before unheard-of richness of his songs; one for the too copious sweets of his operas; one for the beauty of his symphony, and the grandeur and originality of his oratorio.

CHOPIN, SCHUBERT, BELLINI, MENDELSSOHN: Mendelssohn, the greatest of the number, whose fitful, unearthly wailings, as they rise from the combined voice of flute and clarinet in the little snatches of minor melody occurring in the symphonies and overtures, constantly recal to my mind the similarly vague and wayward beauty of the concluding lines of Kubla Khan,

"Could I revive within me That symphony and song:"

and terminating with the quatrain:

"Weave a circle round him thrice,
And close your eyes with holy dread;
For he on honey dew hath fed,
And drunk the milk of Paradise."

Above all these place BEETHOVEN; that master spirit, the utterance of whose name recalls in all musical souls such unnumbered impressions of sublimity and beauty; the heart-searching, unfathomable, mysterious BEETHOVEN; standing alone upon his unapproachable eminence, even as he seemed to live in his own world; founder of a school of which he is himself the only fit representative; which admits of no successful imitation, even as he admitted but one learner, and scarce a listener by his side; a law unto himself; the embodiment, the type, if we do not misjudge, of the restless struggle and upheaving of his own time, of which that ill-fated continent seems yet doomed to witness the repetition; type of that unfading hope and fervent aspiration and indomitable resolution which fill the heart of that patriot now visiting these shores: BEETHOVEN, whose holy influence yet to be felt upon the world it is impossible to estimate; who points as with ever outstretched finger to the Future, the Untried, the Eternal,—

"The far off, unattained and dim;"

whom to attempt to eulogize before this audience were a superfluous, a needless task; but whom to pass over with the mere mention of his name, were, as it were, to violate the conscience and imprison the tongue; of whom none may utter a more fitting word than he did of himself when he said to Bettine: "I feel that the Divinity is nearer to me than to most men."

Of composers now living and of their individual merits, it has not entered into my design more particularly to speak; and of those who are yet to live and carry forward this enchanting art, who shall foretell the numbers and the glory. Whether even greater names than any yet uttered may not hereafter be known, or how enduring or transitory the fame of those now most illustrious shall be deemed by him who from the heights of centuries hence directs his view backward upon the days through which we are now passing, midway in the path of our century's life, who shall presume to predict?

The remark that great geniuses are ever in advance of their age is to none more applicable than to the great composer. From the time of TERPANDER, condemned for adding a new chord to the lyre, down to our day, how have they been uncomprehended! What HAYDN may again arise, with all his simplicity thought by elegant critics to manifest the ravings of a Bedlamite? What new MOZART, whose quartetts, sent into some Italy, shall be returned as full of supposed mistakes? What new BEETHOVEN, whose symphonies shall seem at first to the most cultivated of his day, so wild and impracticable that even an accomplished Salomon shall only consent, upon urgent solicitation, to give them a rehearsal! What new BUONONCINI, rival of some mighty HANDEL, shall in after ages be remembered only in the epigram of a Swift? What new Casta Diva, "Robert, toi que j'aime," "Qui la voce," "Ernani, involami," become in its turn the touchstone of a cantatrice's reputation?

It seems but a small fountain, indeed,—this gamut of twelve notes; yet how inexhaustible its resources! From that "harmonious spring" a thousand times ten thousand rills, streams, rivers, "their mazy progress take." The human mind cannot comprehend the almost infinite variety of combinations of which even these few fundamental tones are susceptible. And when we are tempted to believe that Music must have advanced to a point beyond which she cannot go, we shall do well to imitate the simple faith of STÖLZEL, who, surrounded by the then deemed unsurpassable music of his day, believed "that the world would yet hear something greater than the canon:" or of the old teacher FUX, who in his Gradus ad Parnassum, says to his pupil, "Though you were to live to the age of Nestor, you would still have an infinity before you."

Thus, gentlemen, I seem to have but glanced in the most imperfect and hasty manner at a few of those various subjects which, taken separately, will furnish material for an extended address.

Had we confined our attention even wholly to musical events on our own continent, or in our own city; entering the music store and examining the programmes of fifty years ago; had we noted merely the "movements of progress," in the phrase of M. Fétis, impressed upon the study of this Art by the foundation in 1815 of the earliest of our own Muscial Institutions, and more lately of the Academy of Music, with its Conventions swelling from twelve to twelve hundred,—or by the residence, permanent or transient, of artists and professors like Zeuner and Knight and Herwig, not to name gentlemen now living among us; had we but recalled the time not long since past, when an orchestra could scarcely be brought to obey the magic influence of the conductor's baton, or when one of the last who addressed you, that accomplished professional editor, poet, painter, sculptor and musician combined, found cause to congratulate you on having listened to artists now almost forgotten—Nägel, and Madame Spohr Zahn,—here alone would be found abundant food for reflection.

And now, gentlemen, in conclusion, as we feel ourselves borne along in the impatient current of the Present, and yielding our admiration to the allurements of that which so easily gains popular applause, let us not, nor can we, ever forget that, remote from all this glare and noise, there lie treasures of priceless worth: let us, when we feel the need as it were of a firm friend and sympathizing companion, a worthy study, a noble and inspiring presence; let us, whenever we desire to awaken within us again that wondrous longing of the soul which Music, while it seems to quell, leaves but the more unsatisfied,—let us turn to those great works recognized as the Classics of the Art; as the scholar seeks the wealth contained in the pages of Athenian and Roman orator, philosopher and poet; as the student of our letters loves to slake his thirst and drink in new health and vigor from the old and in all the new events which our generation has witnessed, let us read promise of a day when, among us also, he who with lofty purpose devotes a life time to this sacred Art shall no more be deemed to have wasted his days upon an unworthy and frivolous pursuit; when the old proverb shall no longer by its antithesis imply the incompatibility of "wisdom and understanding" with musical learning and skill; when to be familiar with the exquisite riches of HAYDN, MOZART and BEETHOVEN, shall be no longer the lot of a fortune-favored few, but shall come to be deemed almost as indispensable to the true accomplishment of the man of culture, as to have the beauties of poets ever green in the memory; when the converse of that other maxim shall prove true, and the Great shall be for all, and all shall be for the Great; when this "solace of life" shall become more and more appreciated and prized in every household and in every heart, till to the ears of all mankind the earth become like Prospero's Isle to the shipwrecked voyager, — "full of Sounds and sweet airs that give delight and hurt not."

THE CRICKET IN JUNE.

Untimely prophet of the day of gloom!
Hast thou no softer note, no sprightlier tune,
No merrier song—more fit for joyous June
Than that unchanging croak of death and doom—
With all around thee rose and lily bloom
And freshest verdure mantling every tree,
Blue skies, glad birds, the honey-laden bee
And sweet airs creeping heavy with perfume?
Fit type art thou of all the morbid crew
Who constant fret lest we too happy be,
Who keep a death's head ever in our view,
In each bright cloud a coming tempest see.
Fain would we spare their lesson and thy lay,
Thine until autumn, theirs till our funeral day.

The Sentiment of Various Musical Composers.

BY J. S. DWIGHT.

The surest way to characterize the ruling tone of sentiment in a composer is, to note the state of mind in which his music leaves you. There is some music which is all glitter and effect, which you hear with astonishment, and go home weary and without capacity of emotion. You have been excited, but not inspired; not inwardly and deeply warmed. Such is the case with much of the latest fashionable school of music,—music made to order, to display the ambitious executantes of the violin, or the piano forte,—music purposely subordinate to the singer or the play. Such is the too prevailing class of modern operas, after the brilliant, melo-dramatic, bravura-crammed patterns of Verdi, Donizetti, and other Italian followers of ROSSINI, the founder and the genius of the sensuous school. Such are most of the French operas. And such, almost without exception, are the showy variation pieces and fantasias of the Paganinis of the violin, and the Herzes, Dohlers, Leopold de Meyers, et id genus omne, of the piano forte. Enterprise is four-fifths of all their genius, and short-lived astonishment is nearly five-fifths of their effect upon their hearers.

An opera of BELLINI, as of many of that school, bathes you in a delicious flood of tenderness. It is rose-light everywhere, and tepid Spring. You are sad, and full of passive, sympathetic sensibility; softened, melted, but not roused, not strengthened. A surfeit comes, and you are glad to have a good cold north wind sweep away the mild, vague haziness that hangs about your senses, and breathe a bracing atmosphere, feel your spirit and your nerves invigorated, and see things by the clear, literal light of day, until the time for twilight reverie shall come again.

What could be more opposite to this, than the effect of HANDEL? Repose, such as your spirit gains in looking up into the illimitable sky! A fulness of awakened energy, serene as sleep; a balanced, integral activity, calm as the descent of Niagara, or as the movement of the planets; a healthful universal sympathy; a communion with the absolute; a sense of union with the whole, which can indulge all moods, and sing to every humor, but is the victim of no one. It is life flowing from the centre, and informing the whole being, and not some morbid irritation in any single faculty. Handel is greatest in his choruses, which are like the collective voice of all mankind, and sweep us into the glorious current of the great humanitarian sentiment.

From Mozart you turn reluctantly, as from a gorgeous inspired festival, in whose enthusiastic pitch of liberty, and love, and joy, you feel that your faculties and your emotions, and all your appetite for every sort of harmonies, have all got out for once in this cold, eramping, barren world, and swim in a willing and congenial element, where all you touch is vital and responsive. Sense and soul have met and mingled. Spirit and matter have forgot their quarrel. The intensest sense of living; the full, perfected flower of sentiment; the exaltation of the soul to a certain divine consciousness; the overflowing and softening of all the harsh outlines of all things not in concord with warm trustful feeling; a tremulous recognition of the near presence of the spiritual world to this our every-day life; a sort of disembodied pure existence (unless you call ecstasy itself a most voluptuous embodiment), floating free and permeating all things, as if matter had given up its impenetrability: this you feel, and as if the breath of one, whose love was your communion with the soul of all things, fell upon your cheek.

From HAYDN you go as from the sweet, quiet happiness of home, or from the mild restorative of woods and fields, with cheerful heart, clear head, and temperate desires, with the sunny domesticity of a good child, or a wise, kind parent, and the buoyant self-possession of a well-ordered life.

Childlike love of nature, and cheerful, genial domesticity, are his two dominant traits. The first is shown in that bird-like instinct wherewith he organized the orchestral forces into so fit a nest for his creative, uneventful life (for he lived almost in his orchestra, as in his little world). It is shown, too, in his proneness to imitation of the sounds of nature, and in the prevailing character of his great works, the "Seasons," and the oratorio of the "Creation." The other trait displays itself in the cool temperament of all his happy inspirations; in the clearness, regularity, and order which were the style of his life as well as of his compositions; and in fact that he was most felicitous, most himself, most beyond all others, and a model to all others, in the form called technically "chamber music;" in the composition, that is, of quartets, &c., for string instruments, in which the various members of the violin family hold fine discourse together, both argumentative, pathetic, grave, and frolicsome. This is eminently domestic music. The quartet is the best form in which art expresses and idealizes that moral music of our lives, which wells up from the fountains of the sacred sphere of home.

All of these great composers were great in all the forms of composition. But Handel was most Handel in the fugued chorus of the people; Mozart's life oozed out purest in the opera; Beethoven is the despair of all ambitious — rather say, of all great spiritual — aspirations, in his orchestral symphonies; Haydn best enforced the lesson of his life in his quartets of chamber music.

And what shall be said of the music of BEETHOVEN? We carry away from it something that we should not have dreamed of in any effect which the others could produce upon us. This music always leaves us with roused spirit, restless, urged by mighty aspirations which can no more slumber; a lasting influence, as of a Promethean spark dropped into the breast from heaven. The music of this day all owns its influence, though all conventional tastes resisted it. The sentiment and tone of thought and feeling of our age is deeply affected by it. Whoever has heard and taken into his soul this music is a deeper man henceforth, and feels more of the infinite significance of life. It wakes no passing mood, but takes possession of the hearer's soul; becomes a surging ocean under him, which now lifts him till he seems to touch the sky, and now sinks with him to night and loneliness, yet only to climb higher with the next full wave, still bearing the tide-mark farther up the beach. It is music pregnant with a mighty future, and like a providential utterance of the great heaving, struggling breast of this prophetic era of humanity.

Of the many striking characteristics of his music, perhaps the most remarkable is its wild, pleading earnestness; his impetuosity and fire, — the glorious frenzy of a giant or a god, strong enough safely to disdain anything like tameness.

Yet equally remarkable are the unfathomable, still depths of love and tenderness which are felt to underlie his stormy surface. He has a fertile imagination, too, in as romantic and exquisite a vein as that of Mendelssohn, or of the bard who gave him the "Midsummer Night's Dream" for a text. And his love of nature, as it inspires his "Pastoral Symphony," is full as true and perceptive as that of Haydn, while it is vastly deeper.

With a many-sidedness like Shakespeare's, there is still one pervading sentiment in all the music of Beethoven. It has more of the prophetic character than any other. The progressive spirit of this age, the expansive social instinct of these new times, accepts it by a strange sympathy. Many a young music-loving American jumps the previous steps of training, through the taste for Haydn, Mozart, Hummel, &c., and with his whole soul loves at once Beethoven. It is because Beethoven is, to speak by correspondence, like the seventh note in the musical scale. His music is full of that deep, aspiring passion, which in its false exercise we call ambition, but which at bottom is most generous, most reverent, and yearns for perfect harmony and order. The demands of the human soul are insatiable — infinite. So long as anything is not ours, we are poor. So long as any sympathy is denied us, we are bereft and solitary. We are to have all and to realize all by a true state of harmony with all. Is not this the meaning of Beethoven's music? Its wild impatience, its struggling chromatic harmonies, its surging, billowy movement, all imply a glorious unity and peace beyond the now immediately attainable. So the seventh note cries out on the verge of the completed octave, draws every thought to that, and pleads for its repose and its perfection. — Sartain's Magazine.

THE NIGHTINGALE'S SONG.

BY S. T. COLERIDGE.

All is still,

A balmy night! and tho' the stars be dim,
Yet let us think upon the vernal showers
That gladden the green earth, and we shall find
A pleasure in the dimness of the stars.
And hark! the nightingale begins its song.
He crowds, and hurries, and precipitates
With fast thick warble his delicious notes,
As he were fearful that an April night
Would be too short for him to utter forth
His love-chant, and disburthen his full soul
Of all its music!

—— I know a grove

Of large extent, hard by a castle huge
Which the great lord inhabits not: and so
This grove is wild with tangling underwood,
And the trim walks are broken up, and grass,
Thin grass and king-cups, grow within the paths.
But never elsewhere in one place I knew
So many nightingales: and far and near
In wood and thicket over the wide grove
They answer and provoke each other's songs —
With skirmish and capricious passagings,
And murmurs musical and swift jug jug,
And one low piping sound more sweet than all —
Stirring the air with such a harmony,
That should you close your eyes, you might almost Forget it was not day! On moonlight bushes,
Whose dewy leaflets are but half disclos'd,
You may perchance behold them on the twigs, [full,
Their bright, bright eyes, their eyes both bright and Glist'ning, while many a glow-worm in the shade Lights up her love-torch. —

—— Oft, a moment's space,

What time the moon was lost behind a cloud,
Hath heard a pause of silence: till the moon
Emerging, hath awaken'd earth and sky
With one sensation, and those wakeful birds
Have all burst forth in choral minstrelsy,
As if one quick and sudden gale had swept
An hundred airy harps! And I have watch'd
Many a nightingale perch'd giddily
On bloomy twig, still swinging from the breeze,
And to that motion tune his wanton song,
Like tipsy Joy that reels with tossing head.

Just now the nightingales are wailing so sweetly around me! There are four of them here, and last year there were just the same number. How they breathe out their souls into that art of rapture — music — and as if all was thrown into a single tone — so pure — so innocent — so true and deep — such as no human creature can ever hope to produce, either with voice or instrument. Why must men learn to sing, while the nightingale, untaught, knows how to warble into our very hearts, so faultlessly in tune, so free from all failure? I have never heard any singing from human voices that moves me like the nightingales'. A minute since I asked myself, since I listen to them so intently, what if they would like to listen to me, as well? for just then they were silent: but hardly did I raise my voice, when all four burst out into such a warble of trilling — just as if they would say — leave us our own empire! Airs, and opera songs, are like the mere false tendencies in the moral world — the rhetoric of a false enthusiasm. And yet man is carried away by sublime music; why should this be, when he himself is not sublime? — after all, it shows a secret wish in the soul to become great. It is refreshing like dew, to hear this better genius whisper in its natural language. Is it not so? O yes! and we then long to be ourselves like these tones, that dart onwards to their aim without wavering to either side. There they reach the absolutely complete, and in every rhythmical movement give out a profound mystery of spiritual form — this the human being cannot do! Surely melodies are beings created by the Divinity, that have a progressive existence of their own; every such idea comes forth at once in full life, from the human soul: it is not the man that creates the thought, but the thought creates the man. — Bettine Brentano's Correspondence.

La Scala, Milan.

The theatre of La Scala, built after the designs of Piermarini, is deemed, with respect to architecture, the most beautiful opera-house in Europe; and, except the great theatre at Parma, and that of San Carlos at Naples, it is the most spacious. The stage decorations, also, are splendid and classical; and the orchestra is, generally speaking, the best in Italy; but the circumstance most creditable to this, and, indeed, to every other theatre on the Continent, is that perfect decorum which enables ladies, though unattended, to go, return, and even walk from box to box, without the slightest chance of receiving an insult.

Perhaps the first feeling on entering La Scala is that of disappointment — at least, we experienced it so; it is not until you have looked around you, and become aware of your own insignificance in the area, that its vast dimensions are apparent, and then you perceive that it is indeed magnificent. There is, however, one drawback; it is badly lighted, one chandelier alone throwing its lustre over the whole interior, and that, we thought, by no means so large as the lustre at our Astley's. All the light is thrown upon the stage — the audience being in comparative gloom. This, of course, greatly deteriorates the splendor of the theatre, but rather adds to its appearance of immensity. The decorations were clean and light, having been newly furnished for the coronation of the Emperor of Austria.

By a fortunate coincidence, for we had wished it might be so, the opera was the divine "Son-nambula" of Bellini. We have always thought the music of this opera the most pathetic and heart-touching in existence. Perhaps associations (and how strongly are we governed by them!) may have flung a further charm over it. Many scenes — many lights and shadows of our past life, important and varied as an existence of not many years can comprise, have been so closely connected with the music and representations of our favorite opera, that we never hear it without a thrill of intense emotion — a feeling that we can scarcely define as allied to pain or pleasure, so equally do they mingle. Every passage — every bar — calls up some recollection of bygone times; from the joyous "Viva Amina" of the commencing scene, to the beautiful "Ah! non giunge" of the finale, "memory will bring back the feeling" of past hours; which, although sometimes "fraught with sadness," we would not willingly forget.

But there were other associations connected with La Scala that awakened a lively interest in us. It was here poor Malibran carried all before her: this was the scene of her greatest triumphs, and here is her name still venerated. A handsome bust has been placed in the foyer of the theatre to her memory, since last autumn; but this souvenir was not needed. The names of Amina and Fidelio are so coupled with her own; that as long as these operas are played, she will not be forgotten. — London Literary World, 1844.

Robert Schumann's Musical Life-Maxims.

XXXIX. A fine book on Music is THIBAUT Ueber Reinheit der Tonkunst, ("On Purity in Musical Art.") Read it often as you grow older.

XL. If you pass a church and hear the organ playing, go in and listen. If it happens that you have to occupy the organist's seat yourself, try your little fingers, and be amazed before this omnipotence of Music.

XLI. Improve every opportunity of practising upon the organ; there is no instrument which takes such speedy revenge upon the impure and the slovenly in composition, or in playing, as the organ.

XLII. Sing frequently in choruses, especially on the middle parts. This makes you musical.

XLIII. What is it to be musical? You are not so, if, with eyes fastened anxiously upon the notes, you play a piece through painfully to the end. You are not so, if, when some one turns over two pages at once, you stick and cannot go on. But you are musical, if, in a new piece, you anticipate pretty nearly what is coming, and in an old piece, know it by heart; in a word, if you have Music, not in your fingers only, but in your head and heart.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 3, 1852.

The Term "Classical" in Music.

There is great vagueness in the ordinary talk about "Classical music." The term has a variety of meanings and is made to cover things unlike and heterogeneous. On the other hand, in its most limited application, it becomes pedantic. But what is now the pedantic is undoubtedly the literal, formal, soulless copy of what was originally the true and generous use of the term. For it implies a setting up of models, it appeals to examples held in reverence, which to imitate appears a safer and a wiser course than to start off ignorantly upon one's own vagaries and open paths which lead no one knows whither. Pedantry is only the outward, mechanical, Chinese copy of a once genuine and living recognition of the truly excellent.

Of course the term "classical" in Art bears some analogy to the same term in literature, and in the same manner appeals to certain well-established and enduring models as the ground-work of all true study. It is a matter of classes and of text-books. There is a course to be gone through.

In literature, it is the great Greek and Latin authors, whose authorship was so genuine in power and spirit, so complete in form, so clear and pure in style, as to become an authority and pattern for others after them. They represent a period when the literary faculty, the literary side (so to speak) of humanity enjoyed one of its most complete and vigorous developments. Not to know them and their works, not to be imbued with their spirit and moulded to their manner, is to ignore what in a certain representative sense is the most experienced and truly cultivated part of ourselves; it is to fling away the staging of the past and begin like savages anew. Possibly we may be inspired to do something unique and excellent ourselves in our own way; but why not enter the paths which men like ourselves have happily opened and proved practicable? If we have any original force in us, will it not abide with us even to the end of such paths?

In Music the "classics," the cherished models and text-books of the classes, are of comparatively modern date. Yet music, like literature, has its classics, its established models of form and method in the art of composition. It finds them in those brave, inspired old geniuses, in whose hands the rude music of nature gradually grew into the wonderful forms of the music of Art: the men, whose musical creations were a practical unfolding of the germs of music, according to their innate divine laws of proportion, combination, harmony, into full and perfect forms of Art. In them natural music became scientific, learned; that is, in their works we find the principles, the eternal laws of music best illustrated. It is no longer a vague, wild, æolian harp-like phenomenon, floating about the world in mysterious snatches of melody; but its principle of order has been found and logically developed: and now a piece of music is a connected discourse, in which a melodic theme is unfolded, treated, brought into relation with kindred themes, and woven as a motive or primitive fibre into a complex organic texture. Those who first did this (working of course in an ascending series of greater and greater successes, from Orlando Lasso, through Palestrina, through Bach and Handel, up to Mozart and Beethoven) of course wrought earnestly. They had got hold of the genuine thing. Mere fashions, weak aspirations after novelties and specious effects, had no part, or at least a very small part in their labors. Hence they could always be appealed to as genuine: Das ist das Wahre! (that is the true thing!) said Beethoven of Handel. And all the more modern music, however various in form and spirit, however antic and fantastic in its attempts at novelty, even to the Paganinis and De Meyers, rests on this classic ground-work of culture. To make musicians, the works of the great contrapuntists must be studied. Counterpoint—Punctum contra punctum, point against point,—is the derivation of the word. It describes a composition in several parts or voices, note answering to note, each part having its distinct individual movement, yet all together intertwined into a beautiful, complex, harmonious whole. Canon and Fugue followed by the logical necessity of things; for this very logic of nature is itself a fugue; and the fugue principle, variously modified and more or less distinct, runs through all nature and all Art. Fugue is the form of free, harmonious motion, type of the infinite everywhere in the finite; set water in motion and you have wave chasing wave, which is a fugue. These old masters got hold of this principle of nature and wrought it out gloriously into their works, their fugues and choruses, their masses and oratorios, their sonatas and symphonies.

Those of them who adhered most strictly to the principle, and were least drawn off by tempting fashions and popularities of the day, naturally became the classic models for musical students. Palestrina, Bach and Handel especially so.

Now some are narrow and pedantic enough to limit the term classical to these, and to think nothing sound which wanders far from them. They forget that genuine Art must have two attributes: one is learning, but the other is inspiration, genius; one may be acquired, the other cannot. Bach, and Handel, and the later names whom we call classical, were all men of genius; if they have all met in certain common principles of Art, because all so profoundly true to nature, which is one in all its infinite variety, still they have each wrought from a decided individuality of genius. Mere imitation of their form and manner cannot make one classical; for what makes the models themselves classical, is that they imitated no one, but sought the real laws of art, whether in the labors of their predecessors and masters, or in new experiments of their own. They made nature, art, the soul, God, their master.

This element of genius admitted, together with the perpetual change of circumstances, local and historical, and we see that the term "classical," to preserve any good and worthy meaning, must constantly extend its arms and take in wider and wider varieties. It is absurd to limit it to a certain number of old masters, and to later copyists of them. Thus we approximate by a negative process to a clear and sensible use of the term. But we must rest here, hoping that the first resumption of the journey will take us more rapidly to the goal.

To the Editor of the Journal of Music.

Permit me, dear Sir, a brief space to say in reply to the correspondent in your last number, what you have indeed already been kind enough to say for me, that in the paragraph relating to the Euharmonic Organ, it was by no means my design to speak disparagingly of that which may well be called a remarkable instrument: and I regret to find that my language should have conveyed the impression that I was over "anxious to stay the progress of supposed innovation," or unwilling "to give due credit to honest attempts successfully accomplished." Without taking up your room at present, for a more full explanation, let me state that my intention was simply to speak of the instrument as a memorable invention; and in asserting that its pretensions were of a high and extraordinary character, I was not aware that I went beyond the limits of truth. The impressions I had gathered with regard to its probable or possible results, which I have spoken of as the claims set forth by its friends, (I might, no doubt, have more prudently said "some of its friends,") were in fact derived from a gentleman who, besides being a mathematical and theoretical as well as a practical musician, of high attainments, is a personal friend of the inventor, and of his work: who believes that the true theory of music is yet to be written, and that this instrument is destined particularly to illustrate it: hence, as might aptly be said, to throw upon music a "new and marvellous light."

I repeat, I regret that any of my language was so unguarded as to be susceptible of an interpretation unfair to the ingenious and estimable inventor, but still more that any "Lover of Pure Harmony" should have felt compelled, in any event, to hold out to me the unpleasant alternative of having made a "deliberate mis-statement."

Yours, SAMUEL JENNISON, Jr.

Crawford's Virginia Monument.

A letter in the Algemeine Zeitung from Munich, dated June 7th, says: "Last week the sculptor CRAWFORD, of New York, was here to see the place where his great work for the State of Virginia is to be executed, and to make arrangements as to the time when it shall be finished. This work will undoubtedly be one of the greatest which the present day has produced, and it is a token of the high reputation of the royal bronze foundry of Munich, that even in North America it receives the preference before all other similar establishments in the old world. Mr. Crawford openly said, that the manner in which King Louis had prepared the soil for Art here, had gained the whole world's confidence in the artistic industry of Munich.

"The monument, whose execution is entrusted to Crawford by the State of Virginia, and which is to stand in the capital of that State, Richmond, is a group of statues with WASHINGTON as the central figure. The ground-plan forms a circle of sixty-four feet diameter, on the periphery of which, upon six cubes, are to be placed the same number of colossal eagles.

"Steps lead to the second story, the ground-plan of which is a six-cornered star, the emblem of the United States, upon whose projections will be placed the statues, twelve feet high, of Virginia's great men, who distinguished themselves in the Revolution, viz.: "Patrick Henry, Thomas Jefferson, Marshall, Generals Henry Lee and Andrew Allen, and the jurist George Mason. In the middle of this star rises a lofty granite cube, with bas-reliefs and inscriptions, on which the equestrian statue of WASHINGTON, eighteen feet high, has its place; so that the entire monument will be sixty feet high. The statue of Henry is already in the hands of the 'former';—indeed Crawford found the head already cast. He was present also on Saturday at a great casting (the Quadrige for the Siegesthor) and had an opportunity of convincing himself of the certainty and accuracy with which work here goes on. The statue of Jefferson is finished in the model and will immediately be here. Mr. Crawford has returned to Rome, where he has made the entire model."

Novel Effects in French Opera.

As specimens of the height to which the straining for effect is carried by the modern, especially the French composers, we translate a couple of descriptions from M. Fétis's eulogistic analysis of Halevy's "Wandering Jew," now all the rage in Paris.

1. A SWARM OF BEES.

The first describes the introduction of a Ballet, quite out of the ordinary course of a pas de deux or de trois, and rivalling apparently the ravishing picture of the bees in Virgil's Georgics.

"It is these swarms of bees, hovering without object, sporting in the air, forgetting their honey-combs and abandoning their solitary hives, which the poet and composer have taken for the subject of their divertissement; the bees are represented by light young girls, whose elegant corsage suggests the colors and lines in the body of the winged insect. The shepherd Aristæus tries to fix them by throwing flowers across their path, but in vain. Then he does not have recourse to the clanging cymbals of Cybele:

"——Matris quate cymbala circum, which would not have a very good effect in music; but he lets a ravishing melody be heard by the sounds of an oboe, to which M. Verroust gives charm enough to operate the miracle.

"Nothing could be happier than the theme and instrumental combination imagined by Halevy for the entrance of the bees upon the stage. This theme, written for alto and three violoncello parts, muted and pianissimo, imitates the buzzing of a swarm in the most poetical manner. Meanwhile the violins, also muted, give out little groups of notes of a perfect lightness. All this is ingenious. Then the violoncello sings a beautiful melody accompanied by passages of the violins, holding notes in the bass wind instruments, and tremolos in the alto, of a very happy effect; after which the first movement returns." . . .

2. NEW BRASS INSTRUMENTS.

"After this original ballet, the finale commences with a march, to which the grandees of the empire move to present their respects and their loyal vows to the empress. This march is executed by fifteen brass instruments of a new system, but in an antique form, designed and manufactured by M. SAX. These instruments, to which the inventor has given the name of Sax-Tubas, are combined in the following manner:

- | | | |
|---|----------|-------------------------|
| 1 | Sax-tuba | in B flat (octave), |
| 1 | " | in E flat soprano, |
| 4 | " | in B flat contralto, |
| 3 | " | in E flat alto-tenor, |
| 2 | " | in B flat baritone, |
| 2 | " | in B flat bass, |
| 1 | " | in E flat contra-basso, |
| 1 | " | in B flat contra-basso. |

"The form of M. Sax's tuba is borrowed from the figures which we see upon Trajan's pillar at Rome. With the Romans, this instrument was sometimes called tuba, sometimes buccina and even are recurvo, because it was curved in such a manner that the large part, after passing under the arm of the musician, repassed over his shoulder and presented the bell in front. The advantage of this form, for power of sound in the open air, is that it avoids the elbows, which impair the free propagation of the sonorous waves. Nothing can give an idea of the volume of sound produced by these new acoustic contrivances of the intelligent maker, to whom we owe already so many beautiful inventions. The contra-bassos in E flat and B flat possess an unheard of power. This latter instrument, very easy to play, has forty-eight feet of development in its tube, with a conical diameter well proportioned. It is the giant, the mammoth of the species.

"As I have just said, the Sax-tubas, whose sound is at once shrill and prodigiously voluminous, are destined for music in the open air, in great solemnities; but their effect in a close hall had not been sufficiently calculated. At the first representation of Le Juif errant, their impression was formidable and out of proportion with the sonorous mass of the orchestra of the Opera. Such was the talk throughout the hall; but in subsequent representations the musicians put dampers on their lungs, and the effect, although still very powerful, perfectly harmonized with the rest of the instrumentation.

"While I am upon the inventions of M. Sax, let me say a few words of the piece in Le Juif errant in which Halevy has introduced a quatuor of Saxophones, whose sympathetic sonorousness produces an excellent effect. The combination consists of one soprano Saxophone in B flat, two alto Saxophones, and a bass Saxophone in C, played by M. Sax himself. This first experiment in concerted music of a new instrument, to which there is nothing analogous, has shown that effects hitherto unknown may be drawn from it for the Symphony."

Our thanks are due to Mr. A. WILLIAMS, of the firm of Redding & Co., our worthy agents, for his beautiful Map of New England, on which are clearly laid down all the railroad and telegraph lines, completed or begun. It has also a table showing the time and cost of construction and the number of miles of each. A very useful map, most carefully and artistically executed.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL. Favored by the long continued fine weather, the new Music Hall advances very rapidly towards completion. The roof is now on and covered in. The raising this gigantic frame-work to a height of seventy feet was an interesting spectacle. The corridors are entirely plastered, and the interior of the hall and lecture-room fired throughout. The masons have gained between twenty and thirty days on their contract, and there is now no reason to doubt that the building will be ready for its uses on the 15th of November. Many applications have been already received for its occupancy, here and from abroad, and every effort will be made to avoid disappointment in the promised time of opening. We understand it is in contemplation to open and dedicate it with a grand musical festival.

Next week we will give some particulars regarding the very convenient and luxurious arrangements of the orchestra, the Auditorium, &c.

THE OPERA HOUSE PROJECT. The newspaper report that a site had been selected at the corner of Washington street and Hayward place, seems to have been premature. The estate cannot be had. And we think most of our music-lovers will not regret the loss. So noisy, close and crowded a locality would ill suit the quiet artistic uses of the theatre required, especially in summer, when windows must be open, and when too, we trust there would be afternoon performances occasionally.

GERMANIA SERENADE BAND. The third summer afternoon concert was a decided improvement on its predecessors. The orchestra (no longer styled the "string department" in the programmes) had been enlarged, so that there were three first and three second violins. Mr. Ryan played the tenor. The gem of the entertainment was the first and last movements of Haydn's Symphony in E flat, a quite elaborate composition of surpassing beauty. It was finely rendered, and we hope to hear it repeated, with all the movements. Indeed this little orchestra need not shrink from an entire symphony, so long as they avoid those of the more massive and gigantic build. The overture to Euryanthe was highly interesting, though not in all parts so firm and clear as it would become with more practice. Mr. EICHLER's solo on the viola was a pleasing and artistic performance; the tone of the instrument (which we never heard before in solo) was peculiarly sweet and rich and honest, the execution neat and expressive, and the piece, a fantasia by Mr. Eckhardt on that fine tenor air from Der Freyschütz: "Through the forest, through the meadow," was of uncommon merit.

MUSICAL CONVENTIONS. We understand that the "Philharmonic Institute," under the direction of Messrs. B. F. BAKER and A. N. JOHNSON, will hold its annual session in this city early in August, either at the Melodeon or Hall of the Lowell Institute.

Mr. LOWELL MASON will attend the Birmingham Festival in September, which will delay his return to this country until October. We greatly regret to hear that it is a matter of considerable doubt whether the Convention, which has grown up under the auspices of himself and Mr. WEBB, can have its session this year. The loss of the Tremont Temple makes an additional obstacle.

New York.

The second concert of ALBONI was as successful as the first. Yet little that is new appears in the notices and criticisms thereof. All agree that she is a most finished artist, with a most luxurious voice, who has no affectation, trick or nonsense about her, and no great depth or spirituality. We should infer that her genius lay much in the Rossini vein, the refined sensuous, something as genuine as it is brilliant, though not the highest. It is intimated that she will give one more concert before the dog-star rages. — Madame Fleury Joly and the French Opera Comique still draw at Niblo's. — SONTAG, as it appears by a letter from Lowell Mason in the Musical World, is certainly coming in the autumn. — The wealthy citizens residing around Madison Park have engaged the noble new band of the Seventh Regiment to play there two evenings in the week throughout the Summer. This band consists of forty instruments, and embraces some of the best German musicians in the city. Such an example should be followed in all the cities.

OLE BULL suddenly parted company with the GERMANIANS and JAELL in Canada, and has gone on private business to Virginia. The others have succeeded, without him, in delighting the people of Kingston, Toronto, &c., and were announced at Buffalo. A paper of that city, in heralding their coming, goes in for the "classical," as follows:

"Be it remembered that this is no band of strolling catch-pennies, but a gathering of born and sternly educated musical ability. We recollect listening to their performances a twelvemonth ago, and the strains still haunt our hearts. We speak for the 'Panorama of Broadway' (!) and the 'Railroad Overture' (!) to begin with."

England.

THE WAGNER CASE. According to the Hamburg Freysschutz, letters have been received from Franlein Johanna Wagner, by her mother, who is now staying in Hamburg with her married daughter, in which hopes are expressed, that through the mediation of certain influential persons, the fatal feud between Lumley and Gye will be so far made up, that she will be able to sing for both. For the interest of the Songstress this is certainly to be wished.

FIVE THOUSAND CHILDREN'S VOICES.—MEETING OF THE CHARITY SCHOOLS. The anniversary meeting of the charity children, consisting of deputations from the various schools in the metropolis and its vicinity, took place on the 5th, in the nave of St. Paul's Cathedral. The number of children assembled amounted to between 5000 and 6000, which, with the congregation, consisting of a still larger multitude, formed a very imposing spectacle. . . . The ceremony consisted, as usual, of full cathedral service. . . .

"What has always been the theme of admiration to foreign musicians and connoisseurs (from Haydn of old to Berlioz of the present day) in the anniversary meetings of the schools, is the children's song in unison. This was yesterday as solemn and impressive as ever—most especially in the Hundredth Psalm, a tune which, in its particular style, is incomparable. In the Psalms, the 'Gloria Patri' was also remarkably well sung, accompanied by the trumpet and drums, as well as by the organ. . . . In some passages we have never heard the children sing so well as on Thursday. In the anthem of Handel, they gave the frequently recurring unison phrase on the words, 'God save the King, may the King live forever,' with magnificent force, precision, and intonation—qualities preserved wholly unimpaired even up to F sharp, upon which the climax of the emphasis occurs. Anything more sublime than this, as a simple and unaffected effect of musical sounds, could hardly be imagined. The responses, in the preces of Tallis, were also given with great solemnity and faultless precision by the children, whose multitude of young and unworn voices it was refreshing to hear. . . . Among the choir were observed, in surplices, M.M. Berlioz, Joachim, Osborne, and other well-known musicians, the value of whose exertions, although not professed singers, was by no means to be underrated. Mr. Bates was, as usual, the conductor."—London Mus. World.

OPERA—HER MAJESTY'S. Cruvelli's Amina is praised by the Morning Chronicle for its great originality:

"There are various readings, by our leading vocalists, of the peasant girl's part. . . . According to her requirements, a prima donna renders Amina a heroic sufferer, and a sort of lyrical virgin martyr, or an affectionate little rustic, astonished that she should be ill-treated who never ill-treated anybody. And a third leading lady gives us a mere fancy-ball peasant, who is plebeian only in costume, and who glances, smiles, and trills as the original would do before a grand piano in the midst of a distinguished circle, with a duke holding her gloves, and an ambassador her fan. All are very delightful personations; and what is more to the purpose, Bellini's music in each case receives the amplest justice. We give Mdlle. Cruvelli all praise for having walked away from all three readings. . . .

"Her Amina, as we have intimated, is neither a heroine, a simpleton, nor a lady. A village maiden is seldom one of the three. Cruvelli has probably studied her Amina on the green turf of one of the villages of her own country, and among the best class of the peasant girls who meet to dance in the cool evening, after their own and their lovers' work is over.

"The Amina of Mdlle. Cruvelli is warm-hearted and impulsive—energetic, but not with mere stage energy, but with that of a loving and intelligent nature, surprised and grieved, and eager to have justice done to itself by those on whom its affections centre. It is not what is called an 'interesting' personation—there is too much truthfulness about it to enable it to claim that amiable commonplace of landation. But it is not melodramatic, in the unfavorable sense of a misused word, and is as decidedly a work of art as her noble Fidelio or her magnificent Norma."

Of her Leonora in Fidelio the Musical World says:

"Cruvelli literally sang and acted better than ever in Leonora. The delight of the cognoscenti was expressed in unmistakable terms, while that of the general public was unanimous and unbounded. For our own parts, we were never so thoroughly satisfied with Sofie Cruvelli, never so thoroughly convinced of her greatness. . . . Not only the public is with her, but the entire press—at least all the 'better brothers' thereof—and if there be an exception, it only proves the rule. Sofie Cruvelli's Fidelio, on Tuesday night, was a grand, complete, and powerful performance, and, as we have hinted, was more finished and decided than ever. The 'Hope' song was exquisitely given, and the points in the grand trio in the second act were rendered with irresistible force. The B and C in alt were taken and sustained with a certainty and tone equal to a cornet-à-piston."

In Don Pasquale Madame LA GRANGE twice created a furor by singing Schulhoff's Mazurka, a thing difficult enough to play on the piano. CRUVELLI did a similar feat by introducing into the Barbiere "Rode's Air and Variations." Cruvelli plainly is the star at Lumley's; she was soon to appear in Otello, in Lucrezia Borgia, in the Huguenots;—in the last supported by Madame LA GRANGE, Mdlle. ANGRI, LABLACHE, FERLOTTI, BELLETTI, GARDONI and CALZOLARI—truly a remarkable caste!

At the ROYAL ITALIAN, they have had Il Flauto Magico again, Lucrezia Borgia, "The Martyrs," and Robert le Diable, in which Mme. JULLIEN'S Alice made a great impression, TAMBERLIK "sang splendidly," and CASTELLAN'S Isabella was "lady-like and striking." Since which, the Puritani, the "Elixir of Love," &c.; and Spohr's Faust is in preparation, with CASTELLAN, TAMBERLIK, RONCONI and FORMES. Jullien's new opera, "Peter the Great" will speedily follow.

BOSIO and BETTINI. "Vivian" in the Leader says:

"Signor Bettini, a robust, or rather robustness, tenor, made his appearance at Her Majesty's, in Ernani, with mediocre success. Not much more can be said of Mdlle. Agiolina Bosio, who appeared at the Royal Italian Opera, in L'Elisir d'Amore, without exciting more than tepid enthusiasm. She is pretty, graceful and at ease on the stage. Her voice agreeable, though uncertain in its intonation, her execution facile without brilliancy."

We subjoin some more opinions:

"Mme. Bosio made a favorable impression throughout, always excepting the case of the flood of ambitious floriture with which she deluged her last air, and in which she over-taxed both her facility of execution and her powers of endurance. In other respects her performance was dramatically very lively and agreeable, and vocally pleasing and even, without being particularly startling. Mme. Bosio's voice is a softly-toned soprano, of moderate compass and power, destitute of timbre, but round and flutey in tone, and used with good method and very fair facility. As a comic artist she shows decided talent, and was indeed, so far as Adina went, a mistress of the craft. Her first song over, she seemed as much at home as though a veteran on the Covent-garden boards, and acted with a playful sprightliness and a perfect command of stage business which denoted long and steady practice. Her best points were the sprightly and quasi-sentimental airs with which the part is studded, and which she gave with great sweetness and vocal finish."—Chronicle.

"We doubt whether it would not have gone off rather more coldly with a keener audience. Her voice possesses considerable sweetness and delicacy, and has been carefully cultivated, but evinces tokens of 'wear and tear' in some of the upper notes where employed in sostenuto passages. Her best successes were achieved in those passages where taste and feeling are called for rather than brilliant display. Her acting as the Italian village coquette was exceedingly pleasing and seemed to take with the house."—Advertiser.

"Mme. Bosio, as Adina, ought never to have been presented in that part as the successor of Viardot and Mme. Castellan. Mme. Bosio has a pure Italian style of singing, but there is no timbre in the voice, her intonation is defective, and her comedy is too stiff and frigid for the adequate assumption of the village coquette. The tremolo of a fatigued organ became painfully palpable in the "Prendi per me," in which her ambition in vocal flights was great, but her means of accomplishment too limited to be successful.

"BETTINI has a tall commanding figure, and a very powerful chest voice; but as an actor lacks intelligence, and as a singer has little taste and less refinement. Bettini was taken prematurely from Italy to sing at the Grand Opera in Paris; and his transatlantic travels have certainly not improved his style. Tenors, however, of the class to which Bettini belongs, even if that class be not the first, are of use, if not of value, in a theatre, in lyric works, in which a very strong organ with lasting powers is exacted. In the concerted pieces of 'Ernani,' requiring immense physical exertion, he successfully vied with Mdlle. Cruvelli's Elvira."—Illustrated News.

"A new Prima Donna, Mme. Bosio, made her debut last night in the part of Adina. She made a very favorable impression, and promises to be an acquisition to the theatre. She is a pretty little woman, and in her picturesque Italian costume looked the rustic coquette to admiration. She was what the French call gentille, mingling natural grace and refinement with the sauciness which belongs to the character. Her singing, too, was exceedingly agreeable. Her voice has not much power, but it is sweet and tunable, and her style has the elegance and polish of a good musician. She was warmly applauded and her success was decided."—London Daily News.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The sixth and last concert took place on the 9th. We quote from the notice of the London Times.

"The programme was as follows:—

PART I.
Choral Symphony (No. 9), . . . Beethoven.
PART II.
Selection from Cantata, . . . Dr. Wylde.
Fragments from 'Faust,' . . . Hector Berlioz.
Solo Piano Forte, Mad. Pleyel, . . . Liszt.
Chorus, 'Blessed be the Home,' . . . Benedict.
Overture, (Jubilee), . . . Weber.
Conductor—M. Hector Berlioz.

"The repetition of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with chorus, was justified by its success at a previous concert. The performance was even better than before—the best, in short, we have ever heard of this stupendous work. The chorus was perfect throughout, both in decision and intonation; and even the almost impossible solo voice parts, with rare exceptions, were sung with undeviating correctness by Madame Clara Novello, Miss Williams, Herr Reichart, and Herr Staudigl. The orchestra merits unqualified praise. The execution of the three instrumental movements was faultless. The Symphony created the same enthusiasm as at the last performance. Not the least merit of M. Berlioz is that of having been instrumental in making such a work—the grandest inspiration of the chief master of the orchestra—intelligible and acceptable to the general public. Upwards of 2,000 persons listened to the choral Symphony last night, at Exeter Hall, with the strictest and most unremitting attention, and at the end of each movement gave vent to their delight in loud and prolonged cheering; after which M. Berlioz was called for and vociferously applauded. . . .

"The next feature of interest in the concert was the selection from the lyrical drama of Faust. The last great work of Berlioz, La Damnation de Faust (composed during a tour in Germany), has been placed by philosophical critics at the head of all the productions of its author. . . . The pieces selected were a pastoral and air of Faust, alone in the meadows; a rondo and chorus of shepherds; a recitative of Faust; the Marche Hongroise, another recitative of Faust; and a chorus and dance of sylphs and gnomes. Some of these were presented four years ago, when M. Berlioz was musical director at Drurylane Theatre, under the management of M. Jullien. The impression they then produced was of no common nature; but last night they created a furor in the fullest sense of the term. Even in the fragments given there were so many beauties of the highest order, that the sternest sceptic could hardly be cold enough to deny the claims of M. Berlioz as a composer of imagination—a musical painter, in short. We should be sorry to be so constituted as to listen unmoved to the pastoral introduction in the air of Faust, in the meadows—to the prelude in the air of Mephistopheles—to the chorus of sylphs and gnomes—to the orchestral waltz, which follows it—and last, not least, to the overwhelming Marche Hongroise. The charm of these, it is true, depends in a great measure upon the marvellous instrumentation in which M. Berlioz has clothed them; but not altogether, since exquisite fancy, flowing, natural, and expressive melody, and strong dramatic coloring abound in every movement. If, as some pretend, the effects produced by M. Berlioz are not 'musical,' we are sorry for it. We feel bound to assert, without hesitation, that he is a true poet, and that it is impossible to hear his compositions without being deeply interested, and impressed by the memory of them for a long time afterwards. If what M. Berlioz writes be not music, so much the worse for music, since it proves that the ear may be delighted, the intelligence enchaind, and the feelings moved by something which, though conveyed through the medium of sound, is independent of the art which claims melody and harmony as its elements. Let us at once, however, disclaim any such opinion, and own, on the contrary, that, so far as we are capable of judging, M. Berlioz is one of the most original and gifted of musicians."

The Times makes some complaint that the Society did not fulfil all its promises, as to bringing out Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night and the finished parts of his opera, Loreley; but concludes with: "We may fairly say that, with the single exception of the Royal Italian Opera, no musical institution in this country has ever been inaugurated more auspiciously than the New Philharmonic Society."

VIEUXTEMPS and MME. PLEYEL. The first appearance of one of the greatest performers on the violin, conferred a special interest on the extra matinée given on Tuesday by Mr. Ella. M. Vieuxtemps having surpassed his immediate predecessor, De Bériot, by a long distance, must now be regarded as the veritable chief of the Belgian school, which many consider the first of all. The progress made by the violin since the time of Paganini is, in a very large measure, due to him. Like his German cotemporary, Ernst, M. Vieuxtemps is not only an accomplished executant, but an admirable composer for his instrument. Although still young, his works are received as models, and already belong to the classic repertory. For volume and fine quality of tone, grandeur of bowing, invariable exactness of intonation, and thorough command of every requisite of perfect mechanism, M. Vieuxtemps has no superior. In that which more particularly appertains to the intellectual part of his art, he is scarcely less distinguished. His reading of the great composers is masterly. Not so much remarkable for mere grace as for elegance and breadth of phrasing, there is, in his style, a prevalent simplicity which, accompanied and elevated by the soundest judgment, carries with it a legitimate and irresistible charm. M. Vieuxtemps is never either common-place or exaggerated in his expression, and though he may not so frequently transport his audience to enthusiasm as one or two of his cotemporaries, few, if indeed any, leave the ear and the judgment so thoroughly satisfied as he at the end of a performance. M. Vieuxtemps played twice on Tuesday—a solo of his own composition, in which his wonderful powers of execution were exhibited with remarkable effect, and Beethoven's violin sonata in F, with piano forte (Op. 23.) The sonata was, perhaps, the most perfect musical treat which Mr. Ella has provided for his subscribers during the present season. Supported at the piano forte by Madame Pleyel, who in strictly classical music, as in the brilliant fantasias of the modern school, is equally unrivalled, M. Vieuxtemps was entirely at his ease, and the result was a performance as faultless as it was exciting. Had Beethoven taken the pains to indicate by signs in his sonata every shade of expression, every effect of ritardando and accelerando, every little grace of manner, in short, the whole catalogue of minute points that constitute what is termed 'style' in the performance of a musical work, he could scarcely have differed in any essential point from the reading adopted by Mme. Pleyel. (!) Disdaining, as she invariably does, the frigid indifference of performers who think the precise delivery of the written notes all that is absolutely required, the accomplished pianist, while adhering to the text, gave full play to her imagination, (!) and imparted to each movement a distinct character. The allegro was flowing and simple; the slow movement the perfection of sentiment; the finale playful, brilliant, and charmingly varied. The understanding between the two great performers was perfect; the expression of one was echoed by that of the other, and from beginning to end there was an intimate alliance of feeling, which gave to the exquisite music of Beethoven its fullest and most varied meaning. No two artists, indeed, could be better assorted to each other than Madame Pleyel and M. Vieuxtemps.—London Times, 10th.

MR. OTTO DRESEL. This gentleman, for some time resident in New York, and one of the most genial and fond interpreters of Chopin's delicate music, has recently given a matinée in London. He had just arrived from Germany with many new compositions. The attendance (at the Beethoven Rooms) was so crowded that "one-third of the audience were in the lobbies and on the staircases." He produced a trio and a quartet, assisted by the great violinist, Joachim, and others. These compositions, according to the Times, showed decided cleverness, but originality and fluency of ideas were wanting. Six of his own German songs too were sung, two by Mr. Swift and four by Mlle. Jetty Treffz. One, a "Serenade," was quite successful.—Besides his own works, Mr. Dresel played with Charles Hallé, two piano forte duets, by Schumann and Mendelssohn; and a masterly performance of Sebastian Bach's Chaconne for the violin (with piano accompaniment by Mendelssohn) by Herr Joachim, completed the programme.

OLD PHILHARMONIC. Seventh Concert. Another of those immensely solid programmes. Two Symphonies: Mozart's in G minor and Beethoven's in D, No. 2. Two Concertos: by Beethoven and Spohr. Two Overtures: Oberon and Tell. All admirably played, besides vocal pieces (by Castellan, Formes and Gardoni), of which, says the Times, "the less said the better." The next programme is to include a new Symphony by the celebrated Ferdinand Hiller.

THE MUSICAL FESTIVALS. There will be four this year. 1. At Oxford, Sir H. R. Bishop, Director, on the 22d, 23d and 24th of June. 2. At Birmingham, under Costa, on the 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th of September. 3. That of the three choirs at Hereford, under the cathedral organist, Mr. Townshend Smith, on the 14th, 15th, 16th and 17th of September. 4. The Norwich and Norfolk Festival under Benedict, on the 21st, 22d, 23d and 24th of September; where will be produced two new oratorios (Dr. Bexfield's "Israel Restored," and Mr. Pierson's "Jerusalem.") At Birmingham, Mendelssohn's Loreley.

MADAME JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT was present on the 15th at the "Musical Union," when VIEUXTEMPS played Tartini's Sonata del Diavolo. (Tartini, who died in 1770, declared that he founded this Sonata on a dream, in which he heard il Diavolo play the violin with masterly skill.)

Madame GOLDSCHMIDT and Mlle. WAGNER, were both present the same evening at the St. James's Theatre, to witness the German theatricals.

Count Rossi, the husband of SONTAG, was in London, and the "Teutonic syren" herself soon expected.

Paris.

A NEW FEMALE VIOLINIST. The Gazette celebrates Mlle. DESIRÉE FRERY, a young girl of sixteen, who plays the violin remarkably, both as to execution and to musical sentiment, and calls her "the charming echo of the violinists Alard, Bazzini, De Beriot, Ernst, Haumann, Leonard, Vieuxtemps, and better still, of Milanollo." She holds her instrument gracefully and pleases at first sight. She is a pretty and piquante brunette; and in spite of her black hair buckled à la Ninon de Lenelos and her childish manner, there is an air of good breeding and no affectation in the precocious virtuoso. She is the pupil of Haumann and De Beriot and obtained the first prize at the Conservatoire of Brussels. "Her easy bowing, her brilliant trill, her staccato, her truth of intonation even in double stops, her elegant, pure and sympathetic style, make her, if not the rival, at least the sister of Teresa Milanollo; one might say he saw revived in her the young Maria Milanollo, snatched from Art so prematurely."

M. HABERBIER. The Central Bureau of Music has purchased and is soon to publish the New Method, just completed by this pianist, who seems gaining ground in Paris. The book will be entitled: New Fingerings: an Appendix to the Piano Forte Methods.

GRAND OPERA. No change of programme. Always the Juif Errant, always the same crowd and splendor. Roger, the tenor, was to leave for Germany, and Gueymard to return from London to supply his place. Massol and Tedesco would remain some time longer. By the end of May Le Juif had been given seventeen times.

Rossini's Moïse and Verdi's Jerusalem were in rehearsal for the summer.

MME. LABORDE had been singing with much success at Metz. After the rehearsal of Une Soupe d'une Nuit d'Elé, in which she was to make her last appearance, the artists of the theatre, orchestra and chorists, went with enthusiasm to offer her a serenade.

Italy.

ROME. The Miserere of Allegri was sung at the Sixtine Chapel in Holy Week. Although these old religious works have no pianos, fortes, crescendos, &c., indicated, yet the traditional style of delivery, founded by Baini, is so well preserved that they are still executed with the same perfection as ever.

VERONA. A new Opera buffa, called Il Parrucchiere della Reggenza, by maestro Pedrotti, on whom the Italians found hopes, was brought out with brilliant success. The young composer was called out more than thirty times! The principal singers were Rebusini, Neri, and Zucchini.

MILAN. The maestro Antoni Traversari had returned, to write an opera to a libretto of Peruzzini, entitled: Maritana.—There was also at Milan, the maestro Nini, author of La Morescialla d'Ancre and several other operas.

FLORENCE. Marcello's Miserere was performed at the Institute of St. Catherine. The public were ravished by the sweet beauties of this chef-d'œuvre. Choruses, song, accompaniment, all seemed sublime.

MANTUA. A new opera, Talio, by maestro Lucio Campiavi, was successful.

MONACO. Spontini's Festale, which had not been heard for many years, was brought out on the 10th of May. The public, cold to the Prophète and the Enfant Prodigue, was enthusiastic about the sublime beauties of Spontini's masterpiece.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

NOTICE is hereby given that the BOSTON MUSIC HALL ASSOCIATION are ready to receive applications for the use of their HALL and LECTURE ROOM, (entrance on Bumstead Place and on Winter Street,) by Religious Societies, for the purpose of regular worship on Sundays, after the 15th of November next.

On Universality in Art.

The sphere of Art properly so called, is the sphere of man's spontaneous productivity. I say his spontaneous productivity, in order to distinguish it on the one hand from his natural productivity, or that which is prompted by his physical necessities; and on the other from his moral productivity, or that which is prompted by his obligations to other men. Thus the sphere of Art embraces all those products of human genius, which do not confess the parentage either of necessity or duty. It covers whatsoever is produced without any external constraint, any constraint imposed by the exigencies either of our physical or social subsistence. We do not call the shoemaker an artist, because we know very well that he is animated in his vocation not by any inward attraction to it, not by any overmastering love of making shoes, but simply by the desire of making a living for himself and his family. What prompts him to work is not any spontaneous and irrepressible delight in it, any such delight as makes the work its own reward, but simply a feeling of obligation to himself and his family. He makes no shoe for the pure pleasure of making it, but because he would so put bread into the mouths of his family. Thus his productivity, being enforced both by necessity and duty, being enforced by the necessity of providing for himself and the duty of providing for those whom society makes dependent on him, is not spontaneous or free, does not in other words obey an internal attraction, and consequently falls utterly without the sphere of Art. The shoemaker is not an Artist. He is only an Artisan or Workman.

It is evident from this analysis then that Art does not simply imply production, but production of a certain order. It implies as I have already said, spontaneous production, or production which is energized from within the producer, and not by his physical or social necessities. And now that I may remove all manner of ambiguity or obscurity from the subject, let me explain to you exactly what is meant by spontaneity in man, exactly what is meant by his spontaneous action.

All action is the product of two forces or elements, one internal which we call its end or object; the other external which we call its means or subject. No action is possible unless it enjoy this double parentage, unless it proceed from a certain generative or paternal end, through a certain formative or maternal means. Here for example is an action. I place my hat on my head. This action acknowledges the congress or conjoint parentage of two elements, one originating or begetting, the other mediating or serving: namely, 1. A desire in me to protect my head from the weather; 2. An obedient physical organization. Were it not for the first element here, which was my desire to protect my head from the weather, the second element, which is my physical organization, would have remained inert, and the action accordingly would not have taken place.

Now the first or propagative element of this action, is denominated its object; the second or instrumental element is denominated its subject. Such is the invariable genesis of action, that its objective element or the object for which the action is done, bears the relation of father to it; and its subjective element, or the means by which it is done, bears the relation of mother.

You perfectly perceive then that all action properly so called embodies two elements, one internal and generative, which we denominate its end or object, the other external and formative which we denominate its means or subject.

Now such being the nature of all action, it is the precise peculiarity of spontaneous action that it always makes the object fall within the subject, that it never allows the object to lie out of or beyond the subject's self. I call this the peculiarity or distinction of spontaneous action, because both natural and moral action exhibit an exactly contrary order. They both place the object of the action without the subject, make the object external to the subject. When I act spontaneously the object or motive of my action lies within myself who am the subject of it: when I act simply naturally, much more when I act merely morally, the object or motive of my action lies without myself: that is to say in the one case, the object is my external physical organization; in the other case, it is my fellow-man.

Invention fulfils all the conditions of æsthetic activity. A work of Art is that which is complete in itself, which involves its own end, or presents the perfect unity of object and subject. Thus in the case in question — the invention of shoes — the human feet are unclad. They need a protection against the elements, but such a protection as shall not impair the natural vigor and freedom of the foot. Now in performing this work, my object, or that which generates and governs my activity, is a certain idea or conception within my own mind. If the result perfectly express this idea or mental conception, the work will be complete in itself, will be a work of Art. The shoe may not fit any actual foot of man, yet this circumstance will not affect its æsthetic merit. My design was not to fit a shoe to a particular foot: that is the business of the shoemaker or artisan: but to give outward form or body to an inward idea. If I do this, then I have done a perfect work, a work of Art, whether the actual result be or be not available to a particular use.

Now what the artisan or shoemaker does, is merely to adapt my invention to a particular foot. He seizes the universal idea to which I have given embodiment, and applies it to a specific use. He does not invent a newform; he merely moulds an existing and universal form to a particular exigency. Thus his activity is imperfect, is not complete in itself. If his shoe does not fit the foot it is intended for, it is made in vain, since it was made not for its own sake like my shoe, but for the sake of that particular foot which after all it does not fit.

Let me not be misunderstood. I do not mean to deny the existence of every degree of skill in the workman. I only mean to deny that the highest skill constitutes what men call Art. The Artist is oftentimes extremely deficient in skill, or mere executive talent; in other words he is often unhappily a very poor artisan. Talent or skill belongs to the artisan. It may abound in one man, and be extremely defective in another, so that one shall properly be called a good workman and the other a poor one. But we do not talk of a good Artist, or a poor Artist. For Art is positive, claiming a substantive majesty, and begging all adjectives to set forth its praise. The Artist is not the man who paints a landscape or a portrait better than any other man. It is not the man who writes a better poem, or builds a more symmetric edifice than another. It is not the man of any specific mode of industry or productive action. It is simply the man who in all these modes works from an ideal, works to produce or bring forth in tangible form some conception of use or beauty with which not his memory but his inmost soul is aglow.

Thus in estimating a work of Art, you would seek to ascertain how far its genetic idea or mental conception had been fulfilled, how far in other words the sentiment of the piece impressed you. It may be that Salvator paints trees more accurately than Poussin. This proves not that Poussin was not a true disciple of Art, but only that Salvator was a better workman, a more faithful reproducer of nature. For all this, Poussin may impress you with a much deeper feeling of Art than the other. His pictures may be much fuller of sentiment, may be a far ampler revelation of beauty to the soul. For Art does not lie in copying nature. Nature only furnishes the Artist with the material by means of which to express a beauty still unexpressed in nature. He beholds in nature more than nature herself holds or is conscious of. His informing eye it is which gives her that soul of beauty, that profoundly human meaning, which alone keeps her from being burdensome to the spirit. Nature rules only in the young and immature, only where the sensuous imagination still predominates. She is the menial of the Artist, or if that word seem too harsh, she is his nimble and airy servitor eager to do his royal bidding. She is simply the platform or theatre for the revelation of that infinite and divine beauty which dwells in the soul of man, and makes itself visible in all his spontaneous action. Hence nature should never predominate in the realm of Art, but only serve. And accordingly no one ever employs a painter to reproduce upon the walls of his chamber the actual landscape which smiles before its windows. For no one wishes to see nature merely imitated or reproduced. He wishes to see it imaging a nobler beauty, a subtler ideal charm, than his eyes have yet beheld. Therefore he imports a foreign sky to adorn his parlors, and finds in the sunny meads and terraced cliffs of other lands, a delight unexhausted by his past experience.

RITTER GLUCK.

A REMINISCENCE OF THE YEAR 1809.

The latter part of autumn in Berlin has usually a few fine days left. The sun steps friendly forth out of the clouds, and rapidly the moisture evaporates in the luke-warm air that breathes through the streets. Then you see a long and motley procession — exquisites, plain citizens with the good wife and the dear little ones in Sunday clothes, priests, Jewesses, young barristers, court-tezans, professors, dress-makers, dancers, officers, &c., moving through the lindens toward the park. Soon all the places are taken at Klaus and Weber's; the Mohrrüben (?) coffee smokes, the exquisites light their cigars, they talk, they dispute about war and peace, about Madame Bethmann's shoes, whether they were grey or green on a recent occasion, about the commercial treaty and had currency, &c., till all melts away into an aria from Fanchon, with which a harp out of tune, a pair of discordant violins, a consumptive flute and a spasmodic bassoon are torturing themselves and their hearers. Close against the railing which separates Weber's enclosure from the highway, stand several little round tables and garden stools; here one breathes the free air, observes the comers and goers, is removed from the cacophonous din of that accursed orchestra: here I take a seat and yield myself to the easy play of my fancy, which brings me friendly forms, with whom I hold converse about science, about Art, about all that man should hold most dear. More and more motley floats the sea of promenaders by me; but nothing disturbs me, nothing can scare my fantastic company away. Only the accursed Trio of an exceedingly mean waltz tears me away from the dream-world. I only hear the screaming upper part of the violin and flute and the ground-bass of the droning bassoon; they go up and down continually in octaves, that rend the ear, and involuntarily, like one seized by some burning pain, I cry out:

"What crazy, noisy music! those abominable octaves!" Near me some one murmurs:

"Cursed fate! another octave-hunter!"

I look up and am now aware for the first time that, unobserved by me, another man has taken a place at the same table; he fastens his look straight upon me, nor can I keep my eyes away from him.

Never did I see a face, a form, which so quickly made so deep an impression on me. A gently arched nose terminated a broad, open forehead, with remarkable prominences over the bushy, half-grey eyebrows, beneath which the eyes flashed forth with an almost wild and youthful fire; (the man might have been over fifty). The softly formed chin stood in singular contrast with the closed mouth, and a sarcastic smile, produced by the singular play of the muscles in the sunken cheeks, seemed to resist the deep, melancholy earnestness, that rested on the forehead. Only a few grey thin locks lay behind the large ears, that stood out from the head. A very wide, modern overcoat enveloped the tall, meagre form. As my look fell upon the man, he dropped his eyes, and went on with the business, in which my exclamation probably had interrupted him. In fact he was with evident satisfaction shaking tobacco out of several little papers into a large heap before him and moistening it with red wine out of a half-pint flask. The music had ceased; I felt the necessity of addressing him.

"It is well, that the music is still," said I; "that was past endurance."

The old man cast a hasty glance at me and shook out the last paper.

"It were better, that they never played at all," I resumed. "Are you not of my opinion?"

"I am of no opinion," said he. "You are a musician and a connoisseur by profession . . ."

"You are mistaken; I am neither. I once learned the piano and thorough bass, as a thing belonging to a good education, and then they told me among other things, that nothing produces a more repulsive effect than where the bass progresses in octaves with the upper voice. I took it then upon authority and always since have found it verified."

"Really?" he interrupted, and then rose and walked off slowly and thoughtfully toward the musicians, while he frequently, with eyes upturned, tapped with the flat of his hand upon his forehead, like one who tries to recall some recollection. I saw him speak with the musicians, whom he treated with an imposing dignity. He returned, and scarcely was he seated, when they began to play the overture to Iphigenia in Aulis.

With half-closed eyes, arms crossed upon the table, he listened to the Andante; gently moving his left foot, he marked the entrance of the voices; now he raised his head — cast a quick glance round — the left hand, with fingers spread apart, rested on the table, as if he were grasping a chord on the piano — the right hand he lifted on high: it was a kapellmeister, giving out to the orchestra the entrance of another Tempo — the right hand falls and the Allegro begins! — A burning flush flies over his pale cheeks; the eyebrows contract on the wrinkled forehead, an inward madness flames from the wild look with a fire that more and more consumes away the smile, that still hovered about the half-opened mouth. Now he leans back, his eyebrows draw up, the play of the muscles on the cheeks returns again, the eyes flash, a deep, internal pain resolves itself into a delight which seizes and convulses every fibre — he draws his breath deep from his breast, drops stand upon his brow; he indicates the entrance of the tutti and other leading passages; his right hand never quits the beat, with the left he pulls out his handkerchief and passes it over his face. And so he quickened with flesh and blood the skeleton, which that pair of violins gave of the overture. I heard the soft, melting complaint, with which the flute ascends, when the storm of the violins and basses has spent its rage and the thunder of the drums is silent; I heard the softly pulsing tones of the violoneelli, of the fagotto, filling the heart with unutterable sadness; the tutti returns again; like a giant dread and tall the unisono stalks on, the muffled complaint dies out under his crushing footsteps. . . .

The Overture was ended; the stranger let both arms drop and sat there with closed eyes, like one exhausted by over-exertion. His flask was empty; I filled his glass with Burgundy, which I had ordered in the meantime. He fetched a heavy sigh, and seemed to wake out of a deep dream. I urged him to drink; he did it without ceremony, and while he tossed off the full glass at a draught, he cried out: "I am satisfied with the performance! the orchestra bore itself bravely!"

"And yet," I took up the word — "yet these were but feeble outlines of a master-piece executed in living colors."

"Do I judge rightly? — You are no Berliner!"

"Entirely right; I only stay here occasionally."

"The Burgundy is good: but it is growing cold."

"Then let us go into the room and there empty the bottles."

"A good suggestion — I don't know you: nor on the other hand do you know me. We will not ask each other's names: names are sometimes troublesome. I drink Burgundy, it costs me nothing, we like each other's company, and so let it be!"

He said all this in a pleasant humor. We had entered the chamber; as he sat down he threw open the overcoat and I remarked with astonishment that he wore underneath it an embroidered vest with long lappets, black satin breeches and a very small silver rapier. He buttoned the coat carefully up again.

"Why did you ask me if I was a Berliner?" I began.

"Because in that case I should have been obliged to leave you."

"That sounds mysterious."

"Not in the least, when I tell you that I — well, that I am a composer."

"Still I do not guess your meaning."

"Then pardon my exclamation beforehand: for I see, you do not at all understand Berlin and the Berliners."

He got up and walked heavily back and forth several times; then he stepped to the window and sang scarce audibly the Chorus of Priestesses from the Iphigenia in Tauris, while now and then he knocked upon the window pane where the tutti comes in. With wonder I remarked, that he gave certain new readings to the melodies, which struck me by their power and novelty. I let him act out his humor. He had finished and came back to his seat. Deeply impressed by the strange conduct of the man and the fantastical expressions of a rare musical talent, I was silent. After a while he began:

"Have you never composed?"

"Yes; I have tried my hand in Art: but I found all that I had written, as it seemed to me, in moments of inspiration, flat and tedious afterwards: so I let it alone."

"You have done wrong; for the very fact that you have rejected your own efforts is no bad proof of your talent. One learns music as a boy, because Papa and Mama will have it so; thereupon one goes to jingling and to fiddling without mercy; but imperceptibly the sense grows more susceptible to music. Perhaps the half-forgotten Thema of a little song, now differently sung, was the first original thought; and this embryo, laboriously nourished from extraneous sources, grew to a giant, that absorbed all about it and converted it into its own marrow and blood! Ha! how is it possible even to allude to the thousand ways in which one comes to composing!—It is a broad thoroughfare, where all jostle along and shout and scream: We are initiated! we are at the goal! Through the ivory door one enters the realm of dreams: few get even once to see the door, and still fewer pass through! It looks adventurous here. Mad shapes flit to and fro, but they have character—some more than others. They do not let themselves be seen upon the thoroughfare; only behind the ivory door are they to be found. It is hard to come out from this kingdom; as before Alcina's castle, monsters guard the way—it whirls—it spins round—many dream out the dream in the kingdom of dreams—they melt away into a dream—they cast no shadow more, else would they by the shadow become conscious of the ray that penetrates this kingdom: but a few only, awakened from the dream, rise up and walk through the realm of dreams—they come to the truth—the highest moment arrives: the contact with the eternal, the unspeakable!—Behold the sun; it is the Trichord, out of which the accords, like stars, shoot down and weave you about with fiery threads—enveloped chrysalis-like in fire you lie there, until the Psyche wings her way aloft into the sun."

With these last words he sprang up, and cast his eyes and his hand upwards. Then he sat down again and quickly drained the glass that had been filled for him. A pause ensued, which I might not interrupt, for fear of turning the extraordinary man off his track. At last he went on more calmly:

"When I was in the kingdom of dreams, a thousand pangs and terrors racked me! It was night and I was frightened by the grinning larvæ of the monsters, that stormed in upon me and now plunged me into the abyss of the sea, now bore me aloft in the air. Then bright rays flashed through the night, and the rays were tones, which encircled me with lovely clearness—I awoke from my pains and saw a great, clear Eye, that looked into an organ and as it looked, there came forth tones, that glimmered and intertwined in noble accords, such as I had never before conceived of. Melodies streamed up and down, and I swam in this stream and wanted to go under: then the Eye looked at me and held me up over the roaring waves.—It became night again; then two colossi in shining harness came upon me: Ground-tone and Quint (fifth)! they tore me aloft, but the Eye smiled: 'I know what fills thy breast with longing; the soft, tender youth, Tierce (third), will step between the colossi; thou wilt hear his sweet voice, behold me again, and my melodies will be thine.'"

He paused.

"And did you see the Eye again?"

"Yes, I saw it again!—For years I sighed in the kingdom of dreams—there—yes there!—

I sat in a glorious valley, and listened how the flowers sang to one another. Only a sunflower was silent and mournfully inclined her closed calix to the earth. Invisible bands drew me towards her—she raised her head—the calix opened and out of it the Eye flashed upon me. And now the tones, like rays of light, proceeded from my head to the flowers, which eagerly sucked them in. Greater and greater grew the leaves of the sunflower—flames streamed from them—they enveloped me—the Eye had vanished and I was in the flower cup."

At these last words he sprang up and hurried with swift, youthful steps out of the chamber. In vain I waited for his return; so I resolved to go to the city.

[To be concluded in our next.]

FROM THE GERMAN OF RUCKERT.

Stern life for me hath frosted
The house-roof o'er;
But warmth enough remaineth
Inside the door.
The Winter's breath has whitened
My crown so hoar;
Yet flows the blood, as redly,
At th' heart's good core.
The cheek's young bloom hath fled,
The roses have retreated,
All retreated,
One by one.
Where have they all retreated?
To th' heart's deep core;
The bloom is there repeated,
That erst they wore.

Are all the joyous streams of
The world dried up?
One soft rill through my bosom
Still laves the shore.
Are all the nightingales in
The woods grown dumb?
One wakes in me, that cheereth
The midnight hour.
"Lord of the house," it singeth,
"Make fast the door,
And let the world, the old one,
Press in no more.
Shut out the frosty breath of Reality;
And only to sweet dreamings
Give roof and floor."

*This Song has been set to music for a bass voice, by FRANZ SCHUBERT.

ROSSINI.

BY J. S. DWIGHT.

We have briefly contrasted the "Sentiment of various Musical Composers" (See Journal of last week), ending with BEETHOVEN.

Now for a very opposite type. At the head of the new Italian line stands unquestionably ROSSINI—the strongest, most original, most creative, elegant, accomplished, of all the masters of Italian opera; though never very deep, and seldom going to the heart, as do Bellini, Donizetti, and many others who have shown much feebler genius. But he is a miracle of exhaustless, sparkling invention. He never lacks ideas, and does not hug a few happy inspirations through opera after opera, until his melodies seem bedriven, as we must painfully confess to find it the case with more than one production of the author of "Lucrezia Borgia," and "Lucia di Lammermoor." His melodies all come out fresh, felicitous, and to the point; as natural and obvious as they are brilliant. No other composer could carry along such a weight of ornament, and not seem cold and barren and sophisticated.

His instrumentation is always rich; his overtures are complete forms of art. Bellini, Donizetti, Verdi, have produced none that deserved the name, in comparison with his. There is no end to his variety in opera; that is, within his plane of spiritual experience, which of course is not the highest. The "Barber of Seville," suggested by Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," is the most elegant, bewitching, graceful, and refined specimen of musical comedy that we possess. It is a whole library of the brightest, fancifullest, most original and piquant tunes, such as haunt the streets, and are a part of the treasured gaiety of all lovers of music and bright life. There is a fine, hearty epicureanism about it. Everything in it sounds familiar to one who never heard it as a whole before; and everything is as bright as a laughing child's face in the morning. The author of the barber's song, Largo al Factotum, has contributed his part to the good cheer of mankind. His "Otello," the most florid and elaborate of all operas in its melodies, and taxing the most arduous reach of the most flexible of voices, has all that passionate, consuming fire in it, both of ambition and of love, that is demanded by the subject. It adds the Moorish to the Italian sun. How exquisite the melody of Desdemona, in the last part, where she sings the ballad of Isaura at her harp! And there is even religious beauty in the prayer, Deh calma o ciel!

His "William Tell," opening upon you in the overture with one of the richest tone-landscapes ever composed, shows how readily he caught so much of the spirit of the German music as is due to the wild scenery of that country and of Switzerland. His "Semiramide" is all gold and purple, full of Oriental pomp and splendor,—regal, imperial in its every suggestion.

ROSSINI marks a new era in the course of modern music. First there was the simple Plain-Song of the Gregorian times. Next the artificial, monkish, scholastic refinements upon those few old themes, working them through all the fantastic, barren complication of fugues and canons, till that art culminated and was inspired in old SEBASTIAN BACH, the type of scientific, learned music. Then, with the revival of letters, the dawn of popular and religious freedom, and the rise of the Opera, came the great German music of expression, with the great line of masters, HANDEL, HAYDN, MOZART, and, deepest, most, prophetic of them all, BEETHOVEN. But the nineteenth century was growing more and more material. It was the age of machinery. Dazzling successes, of the Napoleonic sort, inflamed men. Superficial talent and mere tact grew rampant; genius was kept back in the shade. Art grew melodramatic. The music of effect became more popular than the music of expression. ROSSINI was the master-mind and founder of the school;—himself a man of genius, though the school be false and dangerous. His operas drove out Beethoven's music in his own Vienna, the musical capital of the globe.

From Beethoven to Rossini, what a step! Here is a music infinitely more popular at first. It strikes at once; charms everybody; is full of beauty and of brilliancy, inexhaustible in fancy, and taxing only the senses of the hearer. It is not guilty of any mysticism; you can hardly define any sentiment to which it appeals; and you are not left under the spell of any feeling except that of having been most agreeably entertained. No restless longing haunts you; no lofty aspiration fires you; you are in no mood to go alone, after it. The influence of the music passed off with its own short hour; and it is exceedingly convenient, sometimes, to have had a genial spirit to converse with, who does not ask to be remembered, or to hold any lien upon your future states of mind or action. It is music which delights you; which is sure of its effect; which goes boldly and pleasantly up to everybody, but influences, changes, nobody. It is the music of the Senses. It puts the nerves into fine tune; it makes pleasure beautiful, and amusement graceful and refined, and justifies leisure unto itself. Such a ready flow of quaint, delicious melodies as this mercurial Italian has! Such a free dashing off of each extempore conceit! Such a happy working up of all to produce the best effect; and such a cunning way withal of getting round the ambitious singers, by ornamenting his airs so highly beforehand, that they can find no flourish or appogiatura more to add! And more than all, such a man-of-the-world's knowledge of the average capacity and taste of men! Such a genial bon-homme!—such an exquisite tact!

His music is polite and arch and witty, and in all ways very witching. But has it any sentiment beyond the enjoyment of to-day's existence? Shall it not be classed among the luxuries?—by which we mean not an unworthy element in its place. It is, indeed, a very proper luxury, that should belong to everybody; the wholesome consciousness of life in every nerve!—the joy of clear, fresh, harmonious sensations!—one of the best conditions, surely, of the sound heart and mind.

Reader! have you ever seen the portraits of BEETHOVEN and ROSSINI hanging side by side? There you beheld the two extremes of modern music, and the faces were as strongly marked. Wide and catholic is the world of music which could accommodate at once that rapt, inward-looking, earnest, perhaps sullen, and yet unspeakably tender face, with the mass of forehead, like a thunder-cloud, frowning over the half-closed eyes,—the inward listening, but the physically deaf!—and this jovial, full-blooded, nonchalant, mercurial epicure of the great day of trade and luxury and fashion! One a prophet, caught up with celestial visions, burning with great passion and great faith; the other emphatically a man of the world! One a still magnetic mover of human destinies; the other, a contented denizen of the actual, dallying pleasantly through paths which all frequent, and overflowing with good nature towards all the world!

ROSSINI is the master-spirit of this modern music, decidedly without a rival. He has done more, perhaps, than any composer who ever lived, to popularize music, to educate the ear of all mankind; and in the impulse he has given to the ambitious experimenting with all the outward means and mechanism and appliances of the art, though carried to excess by wonder-working virtuosos, he is but opening the transition from the limited to the more universal schools of Art which shall come after, when the new and greater sentiment of a race united in true brotherhood and joy shall need a greater music for its utterance.—Sartain's Magazine.

Robert Schumann's Musical Life-Maxims.

XLIV. But how does one become musical? Dear child, the main thing, a sharp ear and a quick power of comprehension, comes, as in all things, from above. But the talent may be improved and elevated. This you may do, not by shutting yourself up all day like a hermit, practising mechanical studies; but by living, many-sided musical intercourse; and especially by constant familiarity with orchestra and chorus.

XLV. Listen attentively to all Songs of the People; they are mines of most beautiful melodies, and open for you glimpses into the character of different nations.

XLVI. Exercise yourself early in reading music in the old cleffs. Otherwise, many treasures of the past will remain locked against you.

XLVII. Reflect early on the tone and character of different instruments; try to impress the peculiar coloring of each upon your ear.

XLVIII. Do not neglect to hear good Operas.

XLIX. Reverence the Old, but meet the New also with a warm heart. Cherish no prejudice against names unknown to you.

LI. In judging of a composition, distinguish whether it belongs to the artistic category, or only aims at dilettantish entertainment. Stand up for those of the first sort; but do not worry yourself about the others.

LII. "Melody" is the watchword of the Dilettanti, and certainly there is no music without melody. But understand well what they mean by it; nothing passes for a melody with them, but one that is easily comprehended, or rhythmically pleasing. But there are other melodies of a different stamp; open a volume of Bach, Mozart, or Beethoven, and you see them in a thousand various styles. It is to be hoped that you will soon weary of the poverty and monotony of the modern Italian opera melodies.

SONG OF THE NIGHT.

FROM GOETHE.

Sing no more in mournful numbers
Of the loneliness of Night.
No, these hours, too good for slumbers,
Souls to sweeter bliss invite.

As to Man was Woman given,
Fairest half of him to be,
Night with Day divides the heaven,
And the fairest half is she.

Therefore in the long to-morrow
Think upon it, O my love;
Ev'ry day doth bring its sorrow,
Ev'ry night shine stars above.

MUSIC IN LONDON—THE OPERA—CHAMBER MUSIC—
SIVORI, JOACHIM, & C.—HANDEL'S ISRAEL IN EGYPT
—MADAME PLEYEL—CHORAL SYMPHONY—BERLIOZ.

PARIS, June 17.

A week in London during the season, is an event not to be afterwards forgotten by a musical devotee. Nearly all the great artists of the earth are there gathered together, and oratorio, opera, and concert, follow each other in rapid and bewildering succession.

Tempted by the announcement in the Times, of great works and distinguished artists to be listened to, the British Channel once crossed, my friend F—— and I left Paris one evening, and the next morning found ourselves amid the smoke and fog of London. Smoke and fog were forgotten when we were seated in the Covent Garden opera house, listening to Mozart's delicious "Flauto Magico."—The music which the great composer has put into the mouth of the High Priest Sarastro, is entitled to rank among his finest creations. Solemn and grand, broad in its developments and pure in its forms, one feels in every phrase as if allowed to assist at the mysteries of Isis, awed, and as it were seated under the very shadow of the great temple. Herr FORMES, with his noble voice and imposing manner, gave great effect to the rôle which he assumed, and impressed me most vividly. Mme. ANNA ZERR sang the part of the Queen of Night. Her voice, which is a soprano of remarkable range in the upper register, is extremely well suited to the music written for this rôle. Her first aria: A soffrir son destinata, suffered from the memories of Jenny Lind, which cluster about the ears of any one who has listened to her admirable rendering; but the staccato cadence in the aria of the second act was astonishing as a piece of vocalization, and if her intonation were always exact, and her manner a little more graceful, she would be really a fine singer. RONCONI's Papageno, although a little too exaggerated sometimes in its buffoonery, was extremely clever, and MARIO as the prince Tamino, moved me, as he always does, by his sympathetic voice. Mme. CASTELLAN as Pamina sang extremely well, and her duet with Papageno was encored with great enthusiasm. What a delight to listen to the limpid and graceful melodies of Mozart, when a few days before one has quailed beneath the empty noise of M. Halevy's saxophones, drums and trombones, heaped one upon the other without pity, in his five act nullity, the "Juif Errant."

Our next entertainment was a concert at the Hanover Square Rooms, given by Mr. LINDLEY SLOPER, of which the gems were a quartet of Mozart, (in G) performed by SIVORI, JOACHIM, HILL and PIATTI. Sivori pleased me much more than last year, when I heard him play a solo, in which his affectation and grimace destroyed any pleasure one could have had from his wonderful execution. Mozart seemed to sober him, and he played his part simply and earnestly. After this we had Mendelssohn's Ottetto. Here Joachim took the first violin; Sivori the second, Piatti first violoncello, and Bottesini played the second 'cello part on the double bass—a feat which I suppose no one else would attempt. MELLON and WATSON played the other two violins; HILL and BLAGROVE the altos. JOACHIM is incontestably a great artist. His manner is large and without affectation. He is said to play Mendelssohn's music better than any one else; indeed that great master preferred his rendering of the violin concerto to that of any other artist. In the Ottetto he showed his great qualities enough to give F—— and myself infinite pleasure, and we regretted much not to have had time to pay him a visit, as he invited us to do, when we might perhaps have had a better opportunity of judging.

Having truly enjoyed this excellent concert in the morning, we betook ourselves in the evening to Exeter Hall, where we heard Handel's oratorio of "Israel in Egypt" performed by an orchestra and chorus, 700 in number, under the able direction of COSTA. It is only in England that Handel can be heard in perfection. His mighty choruses need such masses of sound to give them their due effect, that unless there are great means at command it is difficult to feel their sublimity. Here we had the one thing needful, and the power displayed almost took away one's breath; it was not noise, it was mighty sound, too majestic to be painful, too sonorous to do aught save awe the listener.

The next morning we attended an extra concert given by ELLA—who pretends to be the leader of classical music in London—and if judged by this effort, does not fulfil his task; for with the exception of the sonata in F for piano and violin of Beethoven, played by Mme. PLEYEL and VIEUXTEMPS—the programme was filled with modern music of rather inferior quality. In Mme. Pleyel I was profoundly disappointed. I had heard a great deal of her, and was prepared to find not only the most brilliant execution, but also the qualities of a great artist, namely, respect for the music of the great masters, and simplicity in the manner of interpreting their immortal works. What was my astonishment to hear this sonata in Fa, of which I knew every note by heart, given to the public with affected retardandos and accelerandos, with interpolated ornaments; in short, just in the manner in which it should not be played;—violinist and pianist rivalling each other in Pleyel-ising and Vieuxtemps-ising Beethoven. Such sins as these are even with difficulty pardoned, when an artist is interpreting the works of a cotemporary, who can if need be rise up and defend himself, but when committed against the mighty dead are unpardonable, and ought to be held up to public censure. Instead of this, a critic in the Times the next day, has the impudence to assure us that "if Beethoven had taken the trouble to mark all the shades of rendering, ornaments, &c., &c., which he intended in this sonata, he would doubtless have given us the new version of Playel and Vieuxtemps." This man does not know that men like Beethoven not only feel all they wish to say and write, but also say it and write it so that "he who runs may read"—and that artists who permit themselves such falsifications, are untrue to their mission and do great harm to art in every way. But enough of this; we ended our musical enjoyments in London by the crowning glory of the whole—the Choral Symphony of Beethoven, magnificently performed by the orchestra and chorus of the New Philharmonic Society, under the potent "baton" of BERLIOZ, at Exeter Hall on Wednesday June 9th. Berlioz pretends to be the child of the Ninth Symphony. This is his climax of art. This is what he himself would date from. Whether his pretensions are just or not, he has made it his peculiar study, and no one is better capable of drilling an orchestra and chorus in its intricacies and difficulties than the said Hector Berlioz. Being the first time I had ever heard this mighty work of art, I hardly dare to say what my impressions were. Such as they are, I would state them with the utmost modesty. Any one who is at all versed in the music of the greatest of composers, can at least enter with deep interest and delight into the first three movements, especially the Scherzo and Andante. The Scherzo, brilliant and rapid, peculiarly Beethovenish, carries you along in its flight, without effort, and leaves you almost breathless at the end. The Andante, one of Beethoven's most sublime inspirations, seems an epitome of all his great qualities. The deep tenderness, the feeling for nature expressed here as divinely as in the Pastoral Andante, the illimitable grandeur, in short all that he revealed to us in the realms of art, seemed to me, even on this first hearing, to be epitomised and concentrated in a magnificent whole. How I long to hear it again, and again! Then came the last movement, about which I stay my pen. I did not understand it, and reverently stand in hope and faith, that its secrets may at some future day be revealed to me. It is acknowledged even by those who know it best, to be the most obscure of Beethoven's productions, the most difficult to be understood; and it would be folly to try even to form one's thoughts upon it after a first hearing.

One other work of art, of quite a different nature must be mentioned, as having been produced on this same evening, namely: extracts from the "Faust" of Berlioz, his last and most complicated work, led by the composer himself. I had been long anxious to hear some of his Ode Symphonies, and never before have been able so to do. We had a Pastoral chorus, Recitative and Air of Faust, the Hungarian March, and the dance of Sylphs and Gnomes conjured up by Mephistopheles to lull his victim into a sleep full of enchanting visions. The march, which was encored, seemed to hoth F—and myself fitter as a theme for a Polka than for the place which it holds. It was finely worked up and splendidly scored. A part of the air of Mephistopheles in which he conjures the Spirits of Air around him, impressed me; and the dance of the Sylphs, struck me as the most fairy-like thing I ever listened to. The orchestration was magical; violins with sordines, harps, and whiffs of rapidly passing sounds from clarinets, oboes and flutes; nothing could be more spiritual. But here again it was the genius of the orchestra—it was not the power of Mendelssohn, who in his overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream, or his Scherzo in the Quintet in A, sends you by the force of his idea far away into the realms of Fairy Land, and makes the air alive with tiny shapes more brilliant than the rainbow. The music of Berlioz is generally vague, the ideas when more familiarized of little value in themselves, but so scored, that as the coloring in the pictures of the great painters of the Venitian school shuts the eyes to defects of drawing or subject, so Berlioz by his marvellous comprehension of orchestral effects makes one forget to demand a strict account of the value of the simple idea. Musical Review.

Album für die Jugend. XL. Clavierstücke, von ROBERT SCHUMANN. Op. 63. Schubert & Co. Hamburg and New York. pp. 62. Price, $3.

We are almost afraid to say how much we have been charmed by the (to us) newly discovered little gems in this collection. It is truly an Album of fresh, original, most beautiful flowers of musical poesy for young students of the piano. We have seen nothing for a long time that has made such new and such decided claims on our attention. It is a fresh musical experience, a sort of beginning the musical life over again with the child's first delight and wonder, to make acquaintance with these little pieces. The beauty of it is, that there is nothing common-place about them; they are not dry exercises; they are real live musical thoughts, each simple and unique, and perfectly embodied in a little form, that wins you as surely as you fairly notice what it is. You may try one of them over listlessly, slurring over the at first strange harmonies, not careful to preserve the individual parts distinct, and reckless of the signs of expression, and perhaps find nothing in it; for the very reason that there is nothing in it that admits of being slighted; every note and sign stands there for something, and you must play it over till you win from it the composer's meaning, when you will surely feel that you have won what is a "thing of beauty" and "a joy forever."

Observe, they are very little pieces;—too brief and unpretending, it would seem, to warrant many words about them. But little as they are, they embody in their series so much variety of beauty, both of thought and form, they show so much real invention, they are so characteristic, and indicate such a fresh well-spring of musical genius where they came from, that they seem to bring you into acquaintance with the leading features and the peculiar spirit of Schumann. He is revealed here in miniature as perfectly as Mendelssohn is in his "Songs without Words." If only for this reason, our more enterprising musical students should seek them with avidity; for Schumann is very far from being known to us otherwise. In our concerts few attempts have been made to interpret to us his larger works, and these have scarcely been successful. Our Boston Musical Fund Orchestra have again and again rehearsed publicly his first symphony. But that was written when the wealth and vigor of his imagination were too much beyond proportion with his mastery of form; the impression was one of power, but still confused and strange. And we hear always such reports of his strangeness mingled with the poems of his German admirers, that one naturally suspects a straining after novelties of effect and fears the affectation of genius. But it is also ground of great confidence in him that as he goes on he grows clearer. His Second Symphony is a great advance, upon the first in this respect. His later Songs, though at first trial their accompaniments may seem to bristle with far-fetched, doubtful harmonies, suspensions, &c., yet are sure to win you to a sense of their pure and genuine beauty, if you trust them until they become familiar.

For the sake, therefore, of getting some distinct perception of ROBERT SCHUMANN, of the most remarkable musical man or musical problem in Germany to-day, we hope our best lovers of music will procure this little Album for Youth. Those most musically cultivated will find that here is something new to interest them. But for the young, for students it is primarily designed. It is a series of little pieces, which while they exercise the fingers, also nourish the sentiment and quicken the imagination of music. They are lessons in style, in form, in the fine organic structure of musical thought. And we cannot doubt that they must fully answer their end. While simple enough for a child, and sure to interest as they grow familiar, they at the same time gently and imperceptibly initiate him into an easy thoughtfulness and refinement of manner that belongs to the best classics of the Art. Such lessons tend to make the early tastes and habits pure and above temptation from mere superficial clap-trap.

This Album is the work for which the "Maxims," which we have been giving to our readers from time to time of late, were intended. They were to be interspersed among the little pieces, each of which is an example of a certain form, style or mode of treatment of a theme. They begin very simple and progress in difficulty; though each is simple of its kind. Each piece has a name that well indicates its character; there are "Spring Songs," "Winter Songs," "Chorals," plain and figural, "Peoples' Songs;" there is the "Poor Orphan Child," the "Song of the Reaper," "Echoes from the Theatre," "Mignon," "Sheherazade," "Northern Song," &c. And there is a specimen of a "Little Fugue," and a "Canonical Song." There are several marked only by three stars, as if identified with some choice spot in the author's memory, and their beauty well warrants the supposition.

The book, which is printed in Germany, though the publishers have also a branch of their establishment in New York, (Schubert and Co. 257 Broadway,) is attractive to the eye, and has a pictorial title page, on which some of the subjects of the music are artistically illustrated.

XXV. Etudes formant l'Expression. Op. 47. STEPHEN HELLER. New York: Schubert & Co.

These studies are by one of the most genial and graceful of the piano forte writers of the day. They form (in two cahiers or numbers) the "first degree" of the "first section" of what the publishers style at the head of the title page a "Gradus ad Parnassum pour Piano." The other "degrees" are "Thirty Studies preparatory to Classic and Modern Works;" "Twenty-five Etudes Romantiques;" and "Twenty-four Characteristic Studies in all the Major and Minor Keys;" all by HELLER. The second "section" consists of "Exercises and Studies, by JACQUES SCHMITT, for the acquirement of a brilliant execution."

These first numbers of the series we have read through with great pleasure. They are a progressive course of studies, not difficult, and not common-place, and carefully fingered. But there is a refined style and sentiment about them all, which redeems them from the dry category of mere finger gymnastics. One can even enjoy them after the little poems of Schumann's "Album," they have so much character. Indeed we recommend both of these works on the ground that they are products of real musical thought, and not of mere musical routine, like most of the exercises put into the hands of learners. We thank the publishers for a real addition to our stock.

American Church Organ Voluntaries. By H. S. CUTLER, Organist at Grace Church, and A. N. JOHNSON, Organist at the Park Street Church, Boston. Published by A. N. Johnson, 36 School St. pp. 95.

The design of the editors of this work is: "to furnish amateurs with a collection of Voluntaries, which may be played at sight by those whose opportunities for studying the works of the great masters, such as Bach, Rink, Schneider, &c., have been limited." At the same time, we are glad to see that they have given in the latter part of the book some specimens of these masters; for if the opportunities to study them have been limited, there can be no better service done to amateurs than to facilitate their access to these models. As we understand the editors, they wish to furnish a set of easy voluntaries, carefully arranged beforehand, to take the place of the crude and bungling "improvisations" so called, to which half-educated organists are too much tempted to resort in their inability to master the difficult "classics" of their instrument. To this end they have furnished about forty opening and twelve concluding voluntaries, all of good medium length, and some, even of the original ones, possessing considerable beauty.

The preface contains a description of several of the best organs in the Boston churches and halls.

Little Eva; Uncle Tom's Guardian Angel. Poetry by JOHN G. WHITTIER. Music by MANUEL EMILIO. Price 25 cts. Boston: John P. Jewett & Co.

The words to this little song are sweet and worthy to embalm the pleasant recollections of many thousands of readers of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." The music is a flowing and pathetic melody, quite in the Italian vein, with an easy and pretty accompaniment. No doubt, the song will be very generally sought and sung.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 10, 1852.

GLUCK. The performance of the noble overture to Iphigenia in Aulis, at the last Summer Afternoon Concert, led us to hunt up the Fantasia-Stücken of that eccentric genius, HOFFMANN, and to translate therefrom his imaginary interview with the Chevalier, or as they say in German, "Ritter Gluck." We are not without suspicion that some one of our friends had already translated and published the same thing somewhere, some years ago. But we could not find it, which is the excuse for our hasty version. Another time we shall give such account as we can glean of the life and works of GLUCK, — a composer, who should be much more known among us, and whose lofty dramatic works are by many regarded as only second to Mozart's.

Literary Musicians.

The present is evidently the age of criticism. The power of learning, knowledge and reflection, far exceeds in all the arts the power of spontaneous, original creation. The artists themselves are critics. Once the musician lived in his world of music, unburdening his soul in tones, which are a universal language, with small power to write or talk about it, and little versed in any logic but such as you find in old Bach's fugues and the development of musical themes. But to-day the musician is a creature of to-day: he has a theory of his art, he criticizes his work even in the performance, he finds his way into the newspapers, he journalizes, he analyzes his compeers, he speculates about the music of the Future, and by words as well as deeds would fain herald some new Era in Art.

It is a curious fact that the half dozen new men who just now occupy the foreground of musical notoriety in Europe, have distinguished themselves also in the field of literary criticism of their Art. LISZT, of whose subtle faculty in that line our readers have lately been convinced by the translation in our columns of his Reminiscences of Chopin, has written several books. He is now established as chapel-master at the Court of Weimar, where he evidently aspires to build up a Medicean era for Music, as Goethe did for general art and poetry. As if he felt a power and mission to make a mark more permanent upon mankind than that of a mere wonderful pianist, whose charm is spent on those who hear him play, he appears to be animated by a large aspiration to found a great national progressive school of Art, the glory of Germany and the kindred nations, himself being a Hungarian. At Weimar he brings out (plainly with some partiality) the great compositions of one and another artist, which indicate any new and original direction in Art, as the operas of BERLIOZ and SCHUMANN, and more especially of RICHARD WAGNER. He has written a book about Wagner, in which he takes the ground that Wagner is the greatest musical genius of the age, and that his operas mark a greater reformation in the lyric drama than those of Gluck in his day. Liszt has also published a volume, unfolding a pet plan he has for what he calls a Goethe-Stiftung, or "Goethe Institute," for the distribution of prizes in all the Arts, including Music.

RICHARD WAGNER, chapel-master at Dresden, whence he was expelled for a time in 1848 as a political reformer, and uncle to the prima donna, Joanna Wagner, is also as busy with his æsthetic and critical speculations, as with his operative scores. He has recently published an essay in two or three volumes on the Opera and Drama, in which he endeavors to show that we have had no proper Opera as yet, and to lay down the true canons of dramatic music. He is also a frequent contributor to the musical papers in Germany.

ROBERT SCHUMANN, whom some even of those trained up in the wisdom of the fathers, of Bach and Handel and Mozart and Beethoven, declare to be a greater genius than Mendelssohn, was the founder of the "New Musical Journal at Leipsic." And HECTOR BERLIOZ, by some regarded as the last word in musical composition, is one of the first authorities as critic, in which function he has plied his pen continually.

We might mention others, but these are the great names, perhaps just now the greatest in the field of actual musical creation. Germany is also full of writers, critics, historians, theorists in this art, who many of them also are composers of some consequence, but whom we chiefly know as writers. These come not properly within the scope of our remark.

N. E. School of Design for Women.

We had the pleasure last week of a brief visit to this institution, which is in the "full tide of successful experiment" in Thorndike's Building, Summer St. Some hours had been set apart for visitors by invitation, when the principal products of the School were gathered together for inspection. It has been in existence only nine months, and now numbers about sixty scholars, all or most of whom are preparing to earn their livelihood by the graceful arts here taught. Several of the young ladies have already executed designs to order.

The first class, or beginners, have been pursuing under the guidance of Miss Clarke, the elementary course of exercises, first introduced by Mr. Whitaker, the former teacher, in the combination of lines, curves and angles, in any given numbers, into such symmetrical figures as their own ingenuity may dictate. This is something like combining and working up the motives in strict musical composition, or Counterpoint. It sharpens invention, quick perception of relations, &c., from the very outset, while the hand is acquiring freedom, certainty and firmness in all the elementary details of the process. Thus manual routine and free play of the inventive faculty go hand in hand from the first lesson. This class had been practising two months and we were astonished, as we think most visitors must be, at the novel and beautiful, and sometimes exceedingly complex harmonies of form produced by nearly all the pupils; of course, some would look more stiff and timid and mechanical, while others would have the easy grace and decision of native talent; some would show more and some less natural sense of beauty. But few could look through their exercise books without surprise at so many rich varieties of arabesque and Gothic ornamental work.

Others were drawing scrolls, shading and coloring, under the direction of Mr. Bellows, the present principal teacher of the school. Others were drawing upon stone, under the same teacher, and some very clever specimens of lithography have been elicited. Three young ladies were devoting themselves to wood-engraving, under the tuition of Mr. Baker. They were furnished with tasteful drawings by Billings, and seemed quite expert in the use of the graver.

The first practical fruits of the elementary course in designing, first alluded to, were seen in a great variety of original patterns, plain and colored, for calicoes, mouslin-de-laines, &c., some of which have attracted the eye of manufacturers.

But what most astonished us was the activity developed in quite a number of the young ladies in the drawing and coloring of original patterns for house paper. Some of these were truly rich and elegant, and we were pleased to see that they had looked to nature, to the graceful forms of leaves and vines and flowers, in great part, for the elementary hints of their designs. Lessons in Botany, by a young lady, a graduate of the Normal School at Newton, form a part of the course.

We are no critical authority in these matters, and can more easily praise the achievements than point out the short-comings of this busy nursery of artists; but we can safely say that the "School of Design" is stimulating into activity a class of faculties, which, as the example spreads, will do much to surround our homes with beauty and promote a general æsthetic culture. Ornamental designing, though a humble, is a most important province of Art, and affords a very useful and respectable sphere to much fine talent, accompanied by fine sentiment, which is too good for mere utilitarian drudgery, while it has not quite the force to make its mark upon the world in the higher forms of Painting and Sculpture.

ORGANS IN BOSTON. Messrs. Cutler and Johnson, in the Preface to their new collection of Voluntaries say: "In order to give the legitimate effect of a fugue, an organ possessing considerable variety and power is essential. In this respect, Boston is more highly favored than any other city in this country, in proportion to its population. Of the ninety-eight places of public worship in the city, sixty-four contain organs of various sizes. Of this number, twenty-one have three manuals, and from thirty to fifty registers."

MUSICAL EDUCATION DOWN SOUTH. In the Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle we find an enthusiastic letter, describing the "Georgia Female College Commencement," at Madison. Among other things the writer appears to have been ravished by the music of the occasion, which was interspersed at intervals between the spoken "parts" of the fair graduates.

"The examination was enlivened and relieved from the tedium usually felt upon such occasions, by being interspersed with rich treats of music from seven elegant Pianos, which were arranged upon the rostrum, accompanied by the Flute or Violin, both of which instruments are handled by Professor Branham with a skill of execution most ravishing to the soul."

Here are a few of the musical items in the Programme.

Montezuma Grand March—Duet, 3 Pianos. (!)

Lee Rigg—Variations, 3 Pianos.

Come to the Forest—Song, Duet.

Florida Grand March—Duet, 7 Pianos (!)

Hyacinth Gallop—5 Pianos.

Air Swiss—Trio, 7 Pianos (!!!)

Home, Sweet Home—Variations, Flute and Piano.

And so on. A rarer selection of music, on a grander scale of performance, is scarcely to be met with even in the world's great musical capitals. A Trio on seven pianos, we suppose, means that three young ladies played at each piano; that is, it was a piece for six hands, multiplied by seven. This was truly magnifique, and shows that music goes ahead in those regions with a full and triumphant consciousness that "this is a great country." Classical it was certainly, inasmuch as it was given in classes; but then there was no pedantic "old-fogey-ism" of Handel, Haydn, Mozart or Beethoven about it;—the music was all of a newer and more original type.—But hear the letter-writer again:

"If any were not put into raptures on this occasion, it was because they had no music in their souls. We were especially surprised at the perfect time. We suppose that during the evening almost every young lady in the school had a hand at the music; and, whether it were one at a time, or twenty-one at a time, it was the same thing; the time was perfect."

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

The feature in the Fourth Afternoon Concert was the Overture, by GLUCK, to Iphigenia in Aulis. That was an overture!—so clear, so full of marrow, each musical idea so interesting, and so distinctly developed, and the whole so deeply dramatic in its suggestion! Surely that was the opening to a noble tragedy! It is a masterpiece of delicious instrumentation. If it did not excite all that loud applause which follows solos and polkas, we are sure that it was inwardly applauded and enjoyed by many of the audience, and we hold the orchestra bound to give us another and another hearing of it, till it shall fairly be appreciated. This is a part of our musical birth-right, which has by some accident strangely been withheld from us Bostonians until now.

The Andante to Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony was finely rendered, especially the pianissimo; but this was an old story compared to that Symphony in E flat, partly given before, and which we are glad to hear will soon be presented entire.

The selections for the brass instruments were better than usual. That solemn old Chorale was just the thing for them; and the piece from Meyerbeer's "Camp of Silesia" was quite stirring. Give us more Chorales, if you wish to edify us.

London.

Mdlle. CLAUS. Of her morning concert, June 19th, the Athenaeum says:

"It exhibited that remarkable young artist as competent to perform music in every style and of every difficulty. Her programme included specimens by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin and Thalberg;—wider range being hardly conceivable,—since the head and hand that can master compositions by the first and the last named writers must also be equal to the more level and melodious productions of Dussek, Hummel, &c., who occupy the intermediate space. All that Mdlle. Claus wants is what time, and time alone, can give. She is a little rash sometimes in trusting to her memory; every now and then she falters, too, but this merely because she is not sufficiently hardened in explaining her meaning. Her intentions are never doubtful—her readings are never dull—and her feeling is singularly deep for one so young, because it is so simple. The little more grandeur, fancy and pathos which might still be added will come all the sooner because she does not attempt to counterfeit them.—In short, last Saturday's performance, though not without its imperfections, has deepened the conviction that at no distant period Mdlle. Claus may stand alone among female pianists—and approached by very few of the number."

CHAMBER CONCERTS. Herr Molique, at his first concert, played a MS. Sonata of his own, for piano and violin. Chorley speaks of it as "containing too much of every thing," as "extreme in its demands on the ear by reason of the closely intricate science with which it is conducted onwards and its subjects are knit together," but as "excellent because of its first thoughts, which have vigor, character and contrast." The Andante, he says, "contains something like a new form" and but for its "over-solicitous complication" might have been numbered among Andantes of the first class.—So difficult was it as to tax to the uttermost Herr Hallé, the most accomplished classical pianist of the day.

At the sixth of Ella's MUSICAL UNIONS, Beethoven's Trio in C minor, for strings alone, was "led with great nobility of tone and style" by Viextemps. Hallé played Beethoven's third Sonata (op. 29), "to perfection." And there was a Quartet by Mozart, No. 6.

The novelty at the fifth meeting of the QUARTET ASSOCIATION was a Quartet, specified as the Op. 122 of an amateur, Mr. Lodge Ellerton. The same critic says: "The composition, though agreeable, is fade and indistinct;—it is creditable to its writer "according to his order," though "not stout enough to abide exposure" by the side of Mozart, &c.

MADAME PLEYEL's second concert was a remarkable exhibition of those qualities in which she excels,—brilliance and lightness of execution (not excluding power) and exquisite taste in the rendering of sentimental music by composers of the second order. Further, no one besides herself can produce any effect in playing with the tremendous difficulties which Thalberg, Liszt, and Prudent have accumulated in their arrangements and operatic fantasies. Then, she has never played more solid and expressive movements, by such deeper writers as Beethoven and Mendelssohn, so much after Lady Grace's fashion, otherwise so soberly:—for all which reasons she has never pleased us so much as on Thursday morning. As a vocalist of "credit and renown," Madame Taccam-Tasca, who appeared on the occasion, claims a word. Her manner is a somewhat uncomfortable mixture of the frivolity of the old and the exaggeration of the new schools. Her voice is no longer pleasing.—Athenaeum.

Dr. Spohr arrived in town on Tuesday last.—The directors of the Royal Italian Opera promise his 'Faust' for the week after next; and announce a concert, conducted by himself and principally composed of his music, on the 5th of July.

While the Sacred Harmonic Society is preparing Dr. Spohr's second Oratorio, 'Calvary,' for performance on Monday week, the London Sacred Harmonic Society announces Handel's 'Athaliah' as in rehearsal. This Oratorio, it may be noted, contains some of its composer's most delicious writing for a contralto voice,—some of his opera songs and choruses have been transformed by him from secular to sacred uses.

Madame Otto Goldschmidt has left London for the Continent.—The Stockholm papers report a new act of great munificence on her part. She has transmitted to the Government a sum of fifty thousand piastres—10,000 sterling—to be employed in the creation of free primary schools in those localities wherein the number of those establishments is below the wants of the population.

A second series of 'Music and Manners in Germany,' by Mr. Henry F. Chorley, is in preparation. In this a revised portion of the writer's former work having a similar title will be incorporated for the purpose of giving completeness to a series of pictures and notices of the art in Germany, illustrating the period closed by the death of Mendelssohn and the Revolutions of 1848.

From the French papers we learn that a complete Catalogue of Beethoven's works with critical remarks has been recently issued by M. Lenz, a Russian amateur.

SPOHR'S GRAND VIOLIN SCHOOL, being an exact reprint of the latest European editions, with all the author's new revisions and improvements. One volume, quarto. Price, $3.

* Among the many peculiar excellencies of this Violin School one is remarkable, that the Elementary Instructions do not precede the practical portion of the work as in other Schools, but are combined therewith; by this union the pupil is enabled to take the Violin in hand at the first lesson; in fact, he should and must then commence with it. The author's knowledge, as observable in his Preface, is no small addition to the truly practical distinctions of this School; his style is simple, clear, noble, and elegant, alike attractive and useful as a standard to the pupil as to the master.

* The above work has been before the public only one year, yet it has become a universal favorite, and is used in all parts of the Union. During the past year every inquiry has been made in order to ascertain in what way it could be improved and made fully equal to the wants of those for whom it is intended, and from suggestions thus obtained the publisher has been induced to add to and in other ways improve it. It is now pronounced to be exactly what is wanted, and as such it is offered to the public.

RITTER GLUCK.

A REMINISCENCE OF THE YEAR 1809.

(Concluded.)

I was already near the Brandenburg gate, when I saw a tall figure striding off in the dark and at once recognized my eccentric companion. I accosted him:

"Why have you left me so suddenly?"

"It grew too hot and the Euphon began to sound."

"I do not understand you!"

"So much the better."

"So much the worse, for I should like to understand you perfectly."

"Do you hear nothing then?"

"No."

"—It is over!—Let us go. Besides, I don't like society; but—you do not compose—you are no Berliner—"

"I can't imagine what possesses you so against the Berliners. Here, where Art is prized and in a high degree practised, a man of your artist-like spirit, I should think, must feel at home!"

"You are mistaken!—For my torment I am doomed to wander about here, like a departed spirit, in the dreary space."

"The dreary space, here, in Berlin?"

"Yes, it is dreary around me, for no kindred spirit meets me. I stand alone."

"But the artists! the composers!"

"Away with them! They scrutinize and criticise—they refine all away to the finest measure; rummage everything through, to find just one poor meagre thought; in their prating about Art, and the artistic sense, and heaven knows what—they never come to creating; and if for once they happen to feel the necessity of ushering a couple of thoughts into the world, their fearful coldness shows their wide remoteness from the sun—it is Laplandish labor."

"Your judgment seems to me much too severe. At all events, the splendid performances in the theatre must satisfy you."

"I had persuaded myself to go once more to the theatre, to hear my young friend's opera—what is it called?—Ha, the whole world is in this opera! Through the motley throng of dressed up men move the spirits of Orcus—here everything has voice and omnipotent sound—Teufel, I mean "Don Juan"—but I could not even stay through the Overture, which was rattled off prestissimo, without sense or understanding; and I had prepared myself for it by prayer and fasting, since I know that the Euphon is far too strongly moved by these masses and does not give out a pure sound!"

"If I must confess that Mozart's masterpieces are neglected here, in an almost inexplicable manner, yet Gluck's works certainly enjoy a worthy presentation."

"Think you so?—I wanted once to hear Iphigenia in Tauris. As I step into the theatre, I hear them playing the overture to Iphigenia in Aulis. Hem—think I, a mistake; they are giving this Iphigenia! What is my astonishment now, when the Andante, commencing the Iphigenia in Tauris comes in, and the storm follows. Twenty years lie between them! The whole effect, the well-calculated exposition of the tragedy is lost. A calm sea—a storm—the Greeks are cast upon the shore, and there you have the opera! How? has the composer written in the overture at random, to be blown off, like a trumpeter's piece, however and wherever one pleases?"

"I admit the blunder. Still, they are doing everything to exalt the works of Gluck."

"Aye indeed!" said he shortly, and then smiled bitterly and still more bitterly. Suddenly he broke away and nothing could detain him. He had vanished as it were in a moment, and for several successive days I sought him in the park in vain. . . .

Some months had passed, when on a cold and rainy evening I had got belated in a remote part of the city, and was now hastening to my lodgings in the Frederic's street. I had to go by the theatre; the noisy music, trumpets and drums, reminded me that Gluck's Armida was being performed, and I was on the point of entering, when my attention was arrested by a singular soliloquy, close to the windows, where one could hear almost every tone of the orchestra:

"Now comes the king—they are playing the march—O drum, drum away!—that goes right merrily! yes, yes, they must do it eleven times now, else the march will not have march enough.—Ha, ha—maestoso—drag your feet slowly, children—see, there halts a figurante with her shoe-string hanging—Right, now for the twelfth time! and always thumping on the Dominant—O ye eternal powers, that will never end! Now he pays his compliments—Armida thanks him most devotedly—What, again?—Right, there are still two soldiers wanting! Now they go to blustering in the recitative—What evil spirit has banished me out here?"

"The ban is loosed," cried I. "Come along."

I seized my eccentric genius by the arm—for the soliloquist was no other—and hurried him away with me out of the park. He seemed surprised and followed me in silence. Already we were in the Frederic's street, when he suddenly stood still.

"I know you,"—said he. "You were in the park (Thiergarten)—we talked a good deal—I drank wine—got heated—afterwards the Euphon sounded two days long—I have suffered much—it is over!"

"I rejoice that accident has restored you to me. Let us become more nearly acquainted. I live not far from here; what if" . . .

"I can and must go to no one."

"Nay, you shall not escape me; I will go with you."

"Then you will still have to run a couple of hundred steps with me. But you were about to go into the theatre?"

"I wished to hear Armida, but now—"

"You shall now hear Armida! come!"

Silently we went up the Frederic's street: suddenly he turned into a cross street, and I was scarcely able to follow him, so swiftly did he run down the street, till finally he stopped before a mean looking house. He knocked sometime before the door was opened. Groping our way in the dark we reached the staircase and a chamber in the upper story, of which my guide carefully shut the door. I heard another door open; soon he came in with a lighted candle, and the aspect of the strangely garbished room surprised me not a little. Old-fashioned, richly ornamented chairs, a wall clock with gilded case, and a broad, heavily-moulded mirror gave the whole the sombre aspect of antiquated splendor. In the middle stood a little clavichord, on which was a large porcelain inkstand, and near it lay some sheets of music paper. A sharper look at these materials for composing satisfied me however, that nothing could have been written for a long time; for the paper was entirely yellow and a thick spider's web over-spread the inkstand. The man stepped before a screen in the corner of the chamber, which I had not yet observed, and as he drew aside the curtain I perceived a row of beautifully bound volumes with golden inscriptions: Orfeo, Armida, Alceste, Iphigenia, &c.,—in a short a collection of Gluck's masterpieces.

"You possess all Gluck's works?" I exclaimed.

He made no reply, but his mouth drew itself up to a convulsive smile, and the play of the muscles in the sunken cheeks distorted his face in an instant to a hideous mask. With his gloomy look steadily fixed on me, he seized one of the books—it was Armida—and strode solemnly to the piano. I quickly opened it and adjusted the desk; he seemed pleased to see it. He opened the book, and—who can describe my astonishment! I beheld ruled pages, but with no written notes.

He began: "Now I will play the overture! Turn the pages for me, and at the right time!" I promised that, and now he played in a superb and masterly manner, with large handfuls of chords, the majestic Tempo di Marcia, with which the overture sets out, almost exactly true to the original; but the Allegro was only interwoven with Gluck's leading thoughts. He introduced so many new and genial turns, that my astonishment continually increased. Especially striking were his modulations, without being harsh, and he knew how to string upon the leading thoughts so many melodic embellishments, that they seemed continually to re-appear in new and rejuvenescent forms.—His face glowed; now his eyebrows contracted and a long suppressed rage seemed on the point of violently breaking out, and now his eye swam in tears of deepest sadness. Occasionally, when both hands were busy with the ingenious embellishments, he sang the Thema with a pleasing tenor voice; then he had a most singular way of imitating with his voice the muffled tone of the kettle-drum. I industriously turned over the leaves, closely following his looks. The overture was finished, and he fell back exhausted with closed eyes upon the arm-chair. Presently he revived and turning hastily over several empty pages of the book, he said with a muffled voice:

"All this, my dear sir, I wrote when I came out from the kingdom of dreams. But I betrayed the holy to the unholy, and an ice-cold hand fell upon this glowing heart! It did not break; then was I condemned to wander among the profane, like a departed spirit—formless, so that no one might know me, until the sunflower shall lift me up again to the Eternal.—Ha—now let us sing Armida's scena!"

And now he sang the concluding scene of the Armida with an expression, that penetrated my inmost soul. Here too he departed widely from the original; but his altered music was Gluck's scena raised as it were to a higher power. All that hatred, love, despair, madness, can express in the strongest outlines, he compressed together powerfully in tones. His voice seemed that of a youth, for from its deep and muffled quality it swelled up to a penetrating strength. All my fibres trembled—I was beside myself. When he had finished, I threw myself into his arms and exclaimed with stifled voice: "What is this? Who are you?"

He stood up and measured me with earnest, penetrating gaze; then, when I would have questioned him further, he had slipped through the door with the light and left me in the dark. This had lasted nearly a quarter of an hour; I despaired of seeing him again and tried, orienting myself by the position of the clavichord, to open the door, when he suddenly re-entered, in an embroidered gala coat, rich vest, and the sword at his side, holding the lamp in his hand.

I was struck dumb with amazement; solemnly he came towards me, took me gently by the hand and with a strange smile said:

"I AM THE RITTER GLUCK!"

On Universality in Art.

[Second Extract.]

If the past train of observation be just, then we may not fear to accept the definition I have given of a work of Art. It is a work which involves its own end, or is complete in itself. Art is not a term designed to express any particular mode of external activity, but simply to characterize, throughout the whole range of human production, that performance which obeys a purely ideal end, or represents a conception of beauty in the performer's soul. Whatever work of man does not come under this definition, whether it be painting or poetry or sculpture, falls without the sphere of Art. It may be a work of surpassing cleverness, it may greatly excel the work of every other man in the same walk, but it is not a work of Art. It is at best an unsurpassed copy of Nature, and always inferior to the original. Zeuxis may paint natural effects better than Apelles. He may give you such miraculous distances, and so embathe his foliage with the tender freshness of the dawn, that you would swear he knew the very heart of nature, and could utter all her secrets at will. But all this only leaves Zeuxis a painter. It by no means makes him an Artist. For take away a certain effect from nature, and you leave him powerless. To be a first-rate painter one must be a faithful copyist of nature, as to be a first-rate poet one must be a faithful copyist of the human heart. But to be an Artist in either sphere is to do something more than copy. It is to make poetry and painting serve ideas, or express a beauty above nature and beyond the range of our private affections. Zeuxis accordingly has been a zealous student or copyist of nature. He has watched her more wistfully than the spider watches the fly. In the voluminous note-book of his memory, he has recorded all her shifting phantasmagoria, and is quite sure that he will one day seize her with a grasp which all men shall deem immortal.

But the Artist avoids all this fidget. He loves and enjoys nature, but with no sinister design. He enters the chambers of the morning for a present refreshment, and with no view to the scraps he may carry home in his wallet. He watches the lingering glance of the god of day, because it evokes a mystic rapture in his soul which no other natural symbol can, but he has not the remotest intention of reporting the transaction for the newspapers. He may of course be, as to his specific intellectual activity, a painter or a poet, and in either capacity will use these fruits of his observation with admirable advantage. All I wish to say is that so far as he is also Artist, the inspiration of his activity will come from within and not from without, will date exclusively from a supersensuous idea, and not from the most gorgeous landscape the sun ever lighted.

It is irreverence therefore shown to Art, a wrong done its great significance, to call a man Artist merely because he is a first-rate painter, sculptor or poet. Art has no more necessary connection with one form of production than another. It has no respect of persons. It commits itself to no specialities. It is a universal spirit manifesting itself in all forms, but compromised by none. Hence the Artist knows no shibboleths, is destitute of all exclusiveness, is in fact modesty itself, feeling himself to be a mere minister and representative of that holy and divine spirit which forgives every sin but self-conceit. To give outward form to inward substance: to give natural body to spiritual conception: such is the office of Art within the entire realm of human production. Who that enters upon this lofty career, but feels his soul purified of all petty and personal ambitions, of all mercenary lusts? For his labor acknowledges no more any outward object, acknowledges no object but the fullest possible expression of beauty.

This is the exact distinction between work, or mercenary labor and Art, that the workman or artisan finds his inspiration without him, in the necessities of his physical and social life: while the Artist finds his within him, or in his ideal. The artisan works for physical and social subsistence, thus from compulsion, and therefore poorly. The Artist works only to satisfy an inspiration, thus from attraction, and therefore divinely. His inward spirit is the exclusive source or object of his activity: his outward organization its means or instrument. Thus in so far as his activity is concerned, he is complete or perfect in himself: while the artisan who finds his inspiration without him, either in the necessities of his nature or his social position, is perpetually incomplete, like a house without an occupant, or a body without a soul.

These considerations explain why men so much dislike mere toil or compulsory work. It is servile and imitative. It is always enforced by some bodily necessity or social duty, by some exigency of one's natural or social position. Aesthetic activity, the activity of the Artist, on the other hand is free and original. It springs not from necessity or duty, but purely from taste or delight. It has an exclusively inward genesis. It proceeds from within to without. It is in every case the embodiment of an idea, and therefore complete in itself. Thus the Artist, the man who is striving to actualize an idea, inevitably feels a sense of human dignity or worth to which the mere paid laborer is a stranger.

MME. PERSIANI, TAMBURINI, &C. The Editor of the Savannah Republican writes home to his paper thus from Dresden:

"I am not sure whether it was a piece of good or bad luck to find here the principal artists of the opera in St. Petersburg, who are returning from their winter's engagements in the Russian capital. These people always seem to be afflicted with some indisposition, and to demand much waiting for and caresses. One night Pozzolini, the tenor, was sick—no opera;—on another, Tamburini, the basso,—no opera again; and last Persiani, the soprano—again no opera. I suppose that the feeling which prompts these veteran artists to tread the stage again, may resemble that which keeps the merchant at his task, after his fortune is made.—Application to business becomes almost a necessity, to say nothing of the honest pride of continuing a successful business.

"Persiani is now near fifty years of age, with an ample income—looking on the stage young forty. Her hand and arm are exceedingly beautiful, her whole action admirable to the last degree.

I should doubt if she had lost more than a single note of her voice. Her high notes are pure and silvery, but rather thin. She manages her voice with the most consummate skill. Tamburini's voice is exceedingly impaired. He is now sixty years of age, with an income stated at eighty thousand francs a year. He shows in everything, the finished art of an "old stager." His acting as the Count in the Sonnambula, and as the Sergeant in the Elisir d'Amore, left nothing to be desired. His fat and red jowls and fair round figure, are jolly enough. Pozzolani is a very fair and pure tenor, with rather a repulsive face and ungainly manner. His voice is husky and disagreeable in the ordinary recitations, where conversation is introduced. Rossi is a barytone of medium quality, but also perfect in his acting—and as Doctor Dulcamara, absolutely without a peer."

GREGORIO ALLEGRI. This composer was born at Rome, in 1590, and died there in 1663. He was a singer in the papal chapel, and is considered even still, in Italy, one of the most excellent composers of his age. He was a scholar of Nanini. His Miserere, one of the most sublime and delightful works of human art, has particularly distinguished him. It is even now sung yearly, during Passion week, in the Sistine chapel at Rome. This composition was at one time esteemed so holy, that whoever ventured to transcribe it was liable to excommunication. Mozart disregarded this prohibition, and, after two hearings, made a correct copy of the original. It was engraved and published in London in 1771, and it appeared in 1810 at Paris, in the Collection des Classiques. In 1773, the king of England obtained a copy, as a present from the Pope himself. According to the opinion of Baini, now or lately the leader of the choir, maestro della cappella in the Pope's chapel, the Miserere of Allegri was not composed for all the voices, but only the bass of the eighteenth or twenty-first parts; all the rest is the addition of successive singers. But in the beginning of the eighteenth century, the existing manner of singing it was established as a standard at Rome by the orders of the then reigning Pope. A full score of it has never existed. — Biographie Universelle.

Robert Schumann's Musical Life-Maxims.

LIII. If you can find out little melodies on the piano, it is all very well. But if they come of themselves, without the piano, then you have greater reason to rejoice, for then you stir the inmost musical feeling. — The fingers must make what the head wills, and vice versa.

LIV. When you begin to compose, make it all in your head. When you have got a piece all ready, then try it on the instrument. If your music came from your inmost soul, if you have felt it, then it will take effect on others.

LV. Acquire an early knowledge of directing; watch good directors closely; and form a habit of directing with them, silently, and to yourself. This brings clearness into you.

LVI. Be circumspect in your own life, as in other arts and sciences.

LVIII. By industry and perseverance you will always carry it higher.

LIX. From a pound of iron, bought for a few pence, many thousand watch-springs may be made, whereby the value is increased a hundred thousand fold. The pound which God has given you, improve it faithfully.

LXI. Art is not for the end of getting riches. Only become a greater and greater Artist; the rest will come of itself.

LXIII. Perhaps only genius fully understands genius.

LXIV. Some one maintained, that a perfect musician must be able, on the first hearing of a complicated orchestral work, to see it as in bodily score before him. That is the highest that can be conceived of.

LXV. There is no end of learning.

VINETA.

FROM THE GERMAN.

[VINETA is the name of a lake on the island of Rügen, in the Baltic. Tradition says, it sprang up on the site of a ruined city, and that the bells thereof may be heard ringing from below the water. A friend has furnished us the following two translations of the poem, made by different hands. The first preserves the measure of the original.—Ed.]

From the lake's unfathomed waters ringing,
Evening bells sound faintly through the air;
Thus to mortals wondrous tidings bringing
From the fair old wondrous city there.

Low it rests, with earth no more connected,
Waters now its lonely ruins lave;
Still, from pinnacle and spire reflected,
Golden sparks are mirrored in the wave.

And the boatman who, with eye enchanted,
Once hath seen the light, at sunset clear,
Ever seeks the magic spot, undaunted,
Heeding not the rocks that threaten near.

From the heart's unfathomed depths, a ringing
Comes to me like faintly sounding bells;
Ah! it cometh, wondrous tidings bringing,—
Of the love once cherished there it tells.

To those depths a beauteous world is given,— Sunken there its ruins still remain;
Still they shine like golden sparks of Heaven,
In the mirror of my dreams again.

Then, beneath the waters disappearing,
Would I sink in yon reflection fair,
And, as if angelic voices hearing,
Fain would seek the wondrous city there.

THE SAME—ANOTHER VERSION.

From the Ocean's depths unsounded
Evening bells still faintly chime,
Telling how the beauteous city
Stood there in the olden time.

Sunk beneath the restless waters,
Still remain its ruins gray;
Still its towers, as from a mirror,
Give back sunset's golden ray.

And the seaman, on whose vision
Once that witching gleam hath shone,
Ever steers his vessel thither,
Though huge rocks around are strewn.

From the spirit's depths unsounded
Bells to me still faintly chime—
Ah! they whisper wondrous tidings—
Of its love in by-gone time.

There a beauteous world has perished,
Brightly still its ruins gleam,
Shedding oft rich hues of heaven
O'er the mirror of life's dream.

In those depths I fain would plunge me,
Drown me in the golden light—
And it seems an angel calls me
Into that old city bright.

GRISI IN "LE PROPHETE."

The moment Grisi appeared on the stage as John of Leyden's mother, leading her son's betrothed into the presence of their haughty fendal lord, it was evident that she was the very personage imagined by the dramatist. In her plain, unadorned, 'sad-colored' attire, she looked to perfection the comely matron of humble life, simple and timid, but with something in her countenance and manner indicating the strength and energy which belong to the character. She was very quiet in this scene; standing behind Bertha, and echoing her petition, she did not accompany her words with Viardot's rustic curtsies, which had such a quaint and comic effect; but her air of meek humility was more true to nature than the more demonstrative manner of her precursor. The scene in the third act, where Fides appears as a forlorn wanderer, begging alms in the marketplace of Munster, was most beautifully acted. Beneath her mean and squalid attire there was still that air of distinction which so remarkable a heroine can never lose; and the tone in which she repeated her simple supplication, "Pieta, pieta!" was pathos itself. The meeting with Bertha, a wandering pilgrim like herself—the subdued, maternal tenderness of Fides, contrasted with the young woman's burst of girlish rapture—was finely represented on both sides, Madame Castellan's Bertha being throughout a charming performance. But it was in the great scene in the cathedral that Grisi's triumph was complete. The mother's wild scream, when she sees in the splendid figure of the Prophet—the impostor, the object of her utter detestation—her own lost son—the struggling passions with which she hears him, looking in her face, coldly ask the bystanders what "this woman" wants; and her utter helplessness when she sinks on the ground, and suffers him to wring from her a confirmation of his denial that he is her son—were given with that intensity of power which Grisi, of all our musical tragedians, alone possesses. The audience seemed electrified; and, when the scene closed, their enthusiasm burst into shouts of applause, reiterated for many minutes.

In regard to the vocal part of the performance, it was some disadvantage that the music is written for a voice of a lower register than Grisi's; but this disadvantage was much slighter than we had expected. Her voice, though a soprano, never was a high one; its quality has always been full and voluninous, and its low notes particularly rich and mellow. It has lost something of its flexibility and brilliancy in the upper part of the scale; but its lower notes are better than ever, and it may now be regarded as the finest mezzo-soprano on the stage. Such being the case, the music of Fides suffered little in passing through her lips. She made some unimportant changes in passages here and there, but they were made with skill and judgment, and on the whole the text was substantially adhered to, with no other injury than an occasional weakness of tone in some of the lowest notes. But, with this slight drawback, her singing was as admirable as her acting; and we are convinced that, whoever may assume the character of Fides, no one will eclipse Grisi so long as her powers continue to be what they are now. — London News.

Music in Cincinnati—Importance of Musical Clubs.

In the Cincinnati Daily Citizen we find the following remarks. Their truth applies to very many places, which have not a musical reputation, and perhaps to some which have. Good elements exist in many and many a place, which are as good as lost without the mutual genial stimulus of association.

"MUSICAL CLUBS. — A correspondent of Dwight's Journal of Music, writes:—

"You ask me, what musical items I have gathered on the short trip, which I have just made westward? Alas, one can travel from Dan to Beersheba as in old times and find all is (nearly) barren. But the singing master is abroad, and in some of the larger places, Cincinnati, Chicago, Milwaukee, Cleveland, &c., I am told that the seed is sown and that sometime or other the harvest will come. Heaven grant it."

"This is a musical city—that is, so far as a desire to cultivate the science of music, and the power to appreciate its charms can establish its claim to that title. Talent of a high order is to be found in its professionals and in some of its amateurs; yet, from want of that great essential, association, it is not apparent to the stranger. If the musical talent of Cincinnati was concentrated in one, or more "musical societies," the correspondent above quoted, could have judged for himself, and needed not to be told 'that the seed is sown.'

"As far as we know, there is no society of this nature in the city, outside the ranks of our German friends; and we are cognizant of the fact, that a desire for the formation of one exists in some of our professional musicians. Why not organize one?

"The arts of painting and sculpture cannot flourish without the aid of Art Unions, or academies, or artist's societies. Musical talent runs to waste, unless it is brought into some available form, in an organized body."

To the above we take the liberty of adding an extract from a letter, which we some time since received from the proprietors of the principal Music Hall in Cincinnati:

"Having been for some years engaged in the piano business here, and having also, since last fall, been the owners of the principal Concert Hall of this city, we have had occasion to note particularly the taste in regard to amusements and entertainments generally, and although negro concerts and popular music, popularly rendered, still draw the largest houses and pay the most surely, we yet observe that each year classical and scientific performances become more esteemed and appreciated, and really fine musicians better repaid for visiting us. Were papers like yours more widely circulated and read than as yet they are, we doubt not that this improvement would become still more clearly and rapidly manifest, and not our musicians only, but our citizens generally be the gainers."

Music of Summer—Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

Musical journalizing in these July days, with the thermometers racing on great heats, amid the hot bricks and altogether unmusical circumstances of the city, hardly seems the thing. At least, so sang the little bird to us, this morning, that swung upon the tree in our neighbor's garden near our window. Dear warbler, we will follow thee anon to the green fields and breezy hills;—but for some space yet must we "fast in fires." Meanwhile is not Art in close affinity with Nature? And Music above all, has she not embodied in immortal harmonies much of the purest essence of the country and the summer? Therefore in lieu of feeble, feverish beatings of the brain for novelty, we make no excuse this time for falling back upon old memories and impressions of that wonderful music that has many times transported us, even in winter, to the delights of summer in the woods and fields.

Remember, these our notes were taken down some twelve or fifteen years ago, and doubtless would appear quite imperfect on a present re-examination of the music. But we doubt if we could convey the spirit of it much more truly now, than we did then, when feeling was the better part of knowledge.

"The 'PASTORAL SYMPHONY' is called the highest achievement of descriptive music. Beethoven composed it in the long summer afternoons, which he spent in a rural spot just out of Vienna, seated upon a style, and surrendering himself to all the sounds and sights and sensations of the country, so grateful to the tired denizen of the city.

"Sensations on arriving in the country," is the title which he has prefixed to the first movement, the Allegro. And in this he is true to the genius of Music, in not attempting to describe the country, but only the sensations with which its blithe free air, its cool green spaces, its far-spread smiling landscapes, and its myriad intermingled voices of birds, insects, cattle, men, with the thousand-fold accompaniment of wind and water and the universal hum, inspire one. The melody has a light, tilting motion, which calls up at once that almost-dizziness with which the too strong pulse of nature overpowers us. The successive phrases steal in upon the almost listless reverie of the hearer. He heeds no single object; but all the things of summer and the country chime in sweet confusion with the rhythm of his thoughts. There is a pulsing, a throbbing through the whole movement, which every one will understand, who has wooed nature alone. The mingling harmonies swell and subside like a crowd of waves: now it is an over-full and stunning rapture, and now it reels and ebbs away, the fainting of too much ecstasy. As to pictures, the mind is free to imagine what it will. It is idle to go to music for a description of nature; but sometimes a description of this music is helped out by an allusion to nature. Thus when a snatch of melody lights like a sunbeam on the topmost notes of the flutes and oboes, thence glides down through the violins, the seconds, the tenors, the deep, full violoncellos, till finally the double basses convey it down to depths inaudible, the musical hearer, who can scarce contain his pleasure, may be excused if he try to make his neighbor see it, by telling him to imagine himself stretched upon a grassy slope in a summer afternoon, dreaming of all, attentive to nothing round him, till he is seduced from his own vague feeling, and led on a chase over the sunny meadows by some travelling shadow, that comes up from behind him, and sweeps on before him till it has measured the whole visible horizon, and is lost in the distance, just as that wandering melody measured the whole compass of the orchestra; or by some sudden breeze that bends the grass before him, and leads him on in its wake, till he can see no further;—and if this sentence sins against rhetoric by its mixed metaphors, so much the truer is it to the music, so much the more like a summer afternoon in the country. Those acquainted with the technical structure of a Symphony, will best recognize the passage which we mean, if we call it the counter-theme, or middle subject of the first division of the Allegro. And perhaps it will be well, (regarding all thus far said as only a general characterizing of the whole movement,) to attempt a more orderly description of it.

"Let it be understood, then, that every Symphony is cast in a certain uniform mould; that its mechanical form is conventional. Haydn invented, at any rate perfected it; and Beethoven could accommodate his crowded thoughts to it without much sacrifice; just as Byron declared that the stream of his inspiration leaped and sparkled all the more vigorously within the rocky bounds of rhyme and the Spenserian stanza. In the Symphony it is the first movement only which is strictly Symphonic. This is commonly an Allegro, consisting of two divisions. The former contains all the simple themes or motivi, and is always repeated. The latter is the working up of these themes into all manner of transformations and combinations; and it is here that the skill and science of the artist are put in requisition; his problem being to stick to his text, and never repeat himself, to develop the motivi of the first division into inexhaustible novelties. Attend well, then, to the first division of the Allegro, (which for this very reason is always repeated,) and you have the key to the whole labyrinth of harmonies into which it introduces you. It begins always with the main theme or tune of the piece, then modulates gradually into the fifth of the key, which gives an answering melody, the counter-theme, or middle subject, then through a somewhat lengthened cadence, often enriched with several new melodies, returns into the first theme, modulates as before into the counter-theme, and winds away through the same lengthened cadence, not to return again, but to pass into a new world of endless transformations, into the second division, where forms are varied and multiplied without end; but in each one you still recognize the old features of the first themes; always novelty, but no new subjects. Such is the skeleton of the Allegro, or first movement of a Symphony; which is always in the Symphonic form. Then follows the slow and thoughtful Andante or Adagio, which is commonly in the Rondo form; that is, an air repeated three or four times, only each time with a more florid accompaniment. Awhile it dallies in the graceful, playful form of the Minuet or Trio, or fantastic Scherzo; and then it gives full reins, and lets excited fancy spend itself in the rapid, wild Finale.

"Such is the form of the Pastoral Symphony. Gardiner says that the ground-tone of the all-pervading hum in the open air is what is marked in our scale, F natural. The Allegro of the Pastoral commences in F. If now it were possible to detect, not only this ground-tone, but also the ground theme or melody, not only the key-note, but also the tune of Nature's music, it would be no more than what the instinct of genius has done in the opening theme of this Allegro. Beethoven seems to have caught the very tune of the fields. That is, he has caught their spirit; and in him it passed into melody. The spirit, the breath of Summer, in the mild June afternoon, came over him, as over her own harp, (for such he was, a harp of nature, by his whole organization,) and drew from him her own melody. Herein lies the genius of the whole; the discovery of this one melody; it is getting into the country. It is a very simple song; but it touches the right feeling; if any one has any love of nature in him, it transports him through that feeling to the scenes of its sweetest converse, where it first had birth. Beautiful is the way in which this air is introduced. At first a mere snatch of it, just a phrase of a couple of bars, from a single instrument, as if some wandering zephyr sung it as it passed by; then a long hold upon the last note, as if surprised and wondering what will come of this. Anon it is answered in another quarter; kindred phrases blend with it; different instruments repeat it with fuller harmonies; it melts away in the distance, and, when we think it gone, it comes up again from the deep basses; it resounds in full octaves from the whole band; it fills all things; it is the tune of Nature! Out of this simple air all the rest follows of course; all the successive melodies and modulations flow out of it and return back into it by the same necessity by which all the parts of a landscape seem to date from and illustrate every single part; 'we are all one, though many,' they seem to say; the one you look at is looking at another as if that were lovelier, and they all point you from one to the other, till you are lost in the whole and know not which is loveliest; each most lovely because it lives in the whole, and does not obtrude itself. This is the feeling we have with nature, in the open fields; this sense of one in all; this wandering through an infinite maze, bewildered and refreshed at once. Such is the effect of this simple melody and all which it conducts to. Buoyantly and lightly it creeps up over us and whirls our thoughts away with it in graceful dance over the sunny grassy plains and hills afar, till we forget ourselves in blissful reverie, mingling our essence with the wholesome universal air, blending with the scene, and feeling the whole landscape with as much thrilling sense as we feel our own body. There is a slight drowsiness in the melody; the going to sleep of disturbing individual thoughts, while the mind wakes to the sense of universal harmony; the closing of the eyes upon vulgar glare, and escaping into the milder halo of beauty.

"The tide has reached the full, thrilling through every pipe and string of the whole orchestra, and is now ebbing away, when a new subject is introduced. To the vague succeeds the definite. Some particular phenomenon awakes us from our reverie. It is thus we always enjoy beauty in nature and in art; we oscillate between the sense of unity and of variety. The parts seduce us from the whole, though only to lead us back to it again. We can no more remain in that first mood than a melody can go on, or even complete its own scale, without shifting from its key-note upon the chord of the dominant. And so the theme modulates into the counter-theme above described. First there is a disturbance in the rhythm; its smooth flow is crossed by a sort of shudder in the harmonies; like a ruffling breeze brushing across the glassy transparency of running water. Once, twice — it comes from the mysterious horns, and the last time with the expectant discord of the dominant seventh. The key is decided — the new melody traverses the orchestra from highest flutes to deep as the double bass can carry it; that first stir of the breeze has changed the whole scene;

"Lo! where the grassy meadow runs in waves!"

"And now,
Among the nearer groves, chestnut and oak
Are tossing their green boughs about."

"And 'see, on yonder woody ridge
The pine is bending his proud top."

"The cloud sails over, a shadow sends across the plain, which we dreamily watch till it is lost. In a third phrase, a jubilant rapturous strain, we exult in the fullness of wild life. The heart of nature throbs too close and overpoweringly. The tide of rapture turns and ebbs away in the long cadence of a fourth melody, which tilts between the key-note and the dominant, softer and softer, dying away, till all is calm again, so that you can hear once more that first simple air, the constant tune of nature. And so on, the whole four melodies are repeated from the beginning, making the ear quite familiar with them; and then in the second division they are transposed and multiplied and blended together in an endless maze of harmony. Turn where you will, you meet some floating fragment of these melodies; everything is a reminiscence of one or more of them; a thousand mirrors reflect, however colored or distorted, their expression; and, in the gay confusion, every glance and tone of summer and the country are suggested. Transported by the tune, the mind is free to roam and feast itself at pleasure upon all the fancied resemblances which it can trace, as in the veins of marble, or in the coals upon the hearth, not bound to see them twice alike. One expression, however pervades the whole. It is all buoyant, peaceful, full of life; the whole air sparkles and twinkles with tiny sounds and voices, like fairy bells. It betrays a deep love of nature. It is not the mere cheerfulness of a child; not all sensation, like the sunny Haydn; but the restoring spell of the green fields exerted upon a deep and thought-sick mind. It is the poet's sense of nature; the poet quenching his restless longings in a world that does not contradict, but smile and sing to his ideas; the poet, who brings to the feast of beauty as much as he receives. The lord of this sweet pastoral creation is no light-hearted Adam in Paradise, no idle swain cheered by bright weather, but rather Endymion, the shepherd prince, who pined in secret for a Goddess and found sympathy only in the woods and fields. Haydn's descriptive pieces are Idyls, simple, cheerful pictures out of common life. They paint the actual merely. Beethoven's make the outward world a mirror of the soul. He does not copy the forms, but communes with the spirit of nature. Nothing could well be more cheerful and tranquil than this first movement; but it took a Beethoven to compose it. Others may have clear senses and observe minutely; but lovers and mystics and deep-souled men have always painted nature with most truth. They alone see the Naiad in the fountain, and hear the oaten reed of Pan in the woods.

"But, to resume the thread of the story. From the first 'sensations on arriving in the country,' we may suppose our wanderer to sink back into himself. The Andante is called the 'Walk by the brook-side;' a sombre, melancholy strain, in the same slow, wide-winding Siciliano measure, with the little Symphony in the 'Messiah.' There is a mingling of low gurgling melodies flowing on continually in one rich, cool harmony; and clear above all this, one high part sings on musingly to itself, ever and anon pausing and taking up the tune again. It is a song without words; with the purling of the stream, and the rustling of the leafy arches overhead, and the chirping of the birds for an accompaniment; a man absorbed in his feelings, while dreamily the waters chime in with their involuntary tune. As a motto to the whole might stand the famous stanza from the Fairie Queene:

"The joyous birds, shrouded in cheerful shade,
Their notes unto the voice attuned sweet;
Th' angelical, soft, trembling voices made
To th' instruments divine response meet;
The silver-sounding instruments did meet
With the base murmur of the water's fall;
The waters' fall, with difference discreet,
Now soft, now loud, unto the wind did call;
The gentle, warbling wind low answer'd to all."

"By degrees, insensibly, the song drops into a more and more absorbed and melancholy key. Mechanically following the winding of the brook, he enters into deeper and cooler shades: the mingling accompaniment, the murmur of the water, the mysterious trembling of the wind-harp in the pines, become more and more like living intelligences, responding to his mood. What is the burthen of that melancholy song? What is it that he pores over in his mind, while the woods and rocks seem half to understand? What is the sweet tormenting doubt, he longs yet fears to have resolved? Answer him, ye viewless spirits of the shade, ye Oreads and Naiads, ye Fauns and Echoes! All is still; and bark! the earnest, flute-like voice of the nightingale calls through the silence! the cuckoo and the quail chime in! He hails the omen, relapses into the old tune of his thoughts again; but only for a moment; for now he emerges into the summer sun, and nature's gay variety delivers him again from himself.

"Now follows the joyous Scherzo, describing the festivities and dances of the villagers, which we imagine our wanderer to be watching from some high station. The thunder storm bursts over them; and for a while all the elements are mingled, all is hurry and confusion. As the last thunders roll away and the last scattering rain drops patter down irregularly, how solemnly and thoughtfully a reminiscence of the old tune of the Andante emerges from the darkness, together with the welcome light of day. Wonderful is the music which follows. All things glitter with the crystal drops — the setting sun pours in his parting benediction beneath the clouds, filling the earth with showers of golden light. How crystal-clear and fresh and trembling with faint joy is every harmony! From all the hills echo the horns of the herdsmen calling home their flocks. These give the movement to the whole; light, pattering, measured steps, ever and anon crowding upon one another, keep time to it. These together form the descriptive accompaniment, while over all rises a religious strain of childlike gratitude and wonder, the hymn of the heart, in the great cathedral where the golden cloud-curtained West forms the oriel window, and the voices and echoes of every happy living thing, the choir.

"We feel that this Symphony answers the whole question about the descriptive or imitative powers of music. It shows us how far, and in what way, outward nature may be conveyed in music. Abounding as it does in such allusions, we do not feel that any part of it is artificial and forced, or a perversion of music to other than its legitimate uses. And that for this reason: that it does not literally copy nature, but only utters the poet's feeling of nature, which, like every feeling, can summon up a thousand shapes and scenes by its enchantment. If such music in Haydn is often only cold and outside imitation; in Beethoven it is interpretation of nature.

"In strict truth, music cannot imitate nature, since nature imitates music. Music as an art is first born with the higher sentiments of man — nature without man does not contain subject enough for it. But throughout all material nature we discern glimmerings of a higher idea, strivings upward towards that perfection only revealed in man. Those curious veins in marble and mahogany are not for nothing; the human groups we trace in them seem to be incomplete developments of the pervading laws of form, first sketches predicting that perfection of form which shall appear in man, and still more in man's ideal executing itself in statues of the gods. So with sounds. All the material laws of sound are tending towards the highest art or music. In nature they already produce an imperfect music; in man they attain to Art. Let man give utterance to his own high feeling of nature, or of the harmony, the unity in variety, of all things, in worthy strains of music, and unconsciously that music will suggest all those feeble imitations and predictions of the same, with which the tuneful air of nature swarms. Thus we have nature in music, and yet music the language of feeling, which we have all along assumed it to be. Sing the feeling which you had with nature, and you are at once transported to her lap. This Beethoven does. Nature lives to him. He penetrates to the heart of every subject and brings out its latent music. Every thing in nature has a correspondence to something in the soul of man. This correspondence a deep and earnest soul not only sees, but feels; and every feeling has its melody; thus every object has its music.

"But, as was said before, nature gives out her deeper meaning and her music only to those who have a corresponding depth of life. Nature is more to the poet, than to other men; and it took all the mystic depths and soul-stirring knowledge of Beethoven, so to feel the spirit of nature, until it became a melody in his mind, as he has done in this Pastoral Symphony.

"In this music we have the sunny side of Beethoven; here his genius disports itself in its lightest and most comprehensible style. And yet even this is no unworthy overture to the vast and mysterious drama which his more characteristic works unfold. Even while we yield ourselves up with him to the mild exhilaration of this summer afternoon ramble in the country, we are not without forebodings of the mysterious and almost supernatural character of our genial guide; something about him shakes our soul to the very centre."

TOM MOORE. There could scarcely be a more welcome announcement to the general mass of music-lovers, than the following, which we copy from the Boston Pilot. "Moore's Melodies," with Stevenson's music, are in their way "classics;" at all events, they have intertwined themselves with the sweetest memories of home and pleasant evenings of all who speak the English language, and who have loved to hear it wedded to that higher universal language of the heart, which Music is.

"THE IRISH MELODIES OF THOMAS MOORE. Tom Moore, glorious Tom Moore! Ireland's sweetest bard and the world's most favorite songster! Our readers will receive with delight a paragraph of intelligence which we have to communicate, namely, that the enterprising music publisher of this city, Oliver Ditson, in connection with Mr. Donahoe, have in press 'Moore's Irish Melodies,' accompanied with the music as it originally appeared from the pen of Sir John Stevenson.

"The public are furnished with numerous editions of the 'Irish Melodies,' but in a form which always gave pain to their gifted author.

Music and poetry were wedded in the heart of Moore; to him they were one and inseparable, and nothing gave him greater distress than the sight of his 'Irish Melodies' crowded together in one volume, unaccompanied by the Notes with which they were always associated in his own mind.

The edition about to be issued will be a treasure of invaluable worth to every Irishman as a testimony of the genius of his country; and to every lover of music, as the truest offering with which to approach the shrine of his devotion. For ourselves, we look with no small degree of pleasure to the time of its publication. Irishmen and the friends of Erin may well be proud of Moore, and though

"The harp that once thro' Tara's halls
The Soul of music shed,
Now hangeth mute on Tara's walls
Because that Soul hath fled," yet the note it struck and the thrilling tones it gave forth will live for ages in this volume of 'Irish Melodies.' We are to have the words and those stirring national airs within the covers of one volume. The book will be ready in two or three days."

Musical Review.

SCHNEIDER'S Practical Organ School, &c., &c. pp. 99. Boston: O. Ditson. Price, $2.50.

This is altogether the most important work that has yet appeared in this country for young organists. Both in precept and in illustration it is very rich. It offers a choice and full collection of the best kind of organ music, in short forms, for ordinary church service; including Preludes (in two and three parts) by Rinck, and Voluntaries (sixty-three in number) by Rinck, Schneider, Hesse, Handel, Beethoven, Pergolesi, Bach, and others. These are all pieces of impressive beauty and in genuine organ style.

Besides the music, there is a large body of general information given, about the instrument, the manner of its construction, the mode of playing and of tuning it, the use of the pedals and the stops, with exercises in fingering, and about the elements of music generally. An appendix embodies the more elementary portions of Schneider's excellent Theory of Harmony.

The Belles of Boston: Galop Fantastique, for the Piano. ALFRED JAELL. pp. 11. Price, 50 cents. G. P. Reed & Co.

One of the fluent, sparkling productions of this light-fingered favorite, which no doubt the belles will duly appreciate; and happy will that one be, who can approach the author's facile grace in playing it.

Gems of German Song. Seventh Series. G. P. Reed & Co.

No. 4. Where is the German Fatherland? REICH-ARDT.

No. 5. Du Geist der Wolke, (Thou Spirit of the Cloud.) A. KREISSMANN. With Translation by HENRY WARE.

We overlooked these two in our last notice of the "Gems." The first is one of the glorious patriotic songs of Deutschland, glorious in its music and its words.

Mr. Kreissmann's song—we think it can be no mere fancy of our own—is more in the vein of some of Schubert's wild and deep creations, than we had supposed it possible for another to write. This certainly is high praise. It is a simple, solemn, true song; best suited to a tenor voice.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL. The work progresses steadily and rapidly. Before Saturday night the slating will be completed, and then, the operations being à l'abri—from weather or other possible interruption, the time of opening can be safely and accurately fixed.

Such a work as this, open from the beginning to public inspection and miscellaneous criticism, can hardly be expected to escape the dilemma of the man with his ass and son, or the painter who invited criticism on his picture. Fortunately, the architect has the moral of these fables by heart, and will succeed in pleasing at least himself and his advisers.

One point in the arrangements which has provoked the most confident censures in one or two learned gentlemen, is the style and disposition of the Orchestra. We feel little doubt that it will soon vindicate its peculiar excellencies. In the mean time let us describe it.

The stage (which is not yet laid) is curved in front, its greatest projection into the hall from the lowest of the orchestra platforms being twelve feet; from the rear of this these platforms (eight in number, and of an aggregate depth of twenty-four feet,) commence rising rearward to the level of the organ floor; the upper one being on a level with the floor of the first balcony, so that on the few occasions when a choir exceeding two hundred in number shall be present, the surplus can be conveniently and appropriately seated in the nearest balcony seats; and on such occasions as shall attract a great crowd, from one to two hundred of the audience can be accommodated with orchestra seats. The rise of each platform is one foot,—the first one (which is the stage) being four feet above the hall floor.

But the greatest charm of the contrivance, is that by which the stage may be approached on its own level at three points from the orchestra rooms, (at each side and in the centre,) thus securing artists against one of the greatest trials to which they are ordinarily exposed—that of mounting steps just before singing or playing. It is especially from artists that this arrangement has already met with the warmest commendation and approval. By no other arrangement is a choir heard to such advantage,—by no other can a large number of persons be so perfectly conducted. It was after very great deliberation and patient research that this plan was elected and decided on, and there is no point in the distribution of the interior, in which the architect and directors feel more confidence than in this. A minor incidental advantage not yet named, is the fine effect on the eye.

I meant to describe the eminent advantages of the auditorium over other halls known to us. But I have used too much of your space already, and will only name one particular. The corridors, which traverse the entire length of the two sides of the hall, on the three stories, giving forty-two doors of entrance to the hall, secure a complete exemption, to listeners to music or worship, from that greatest of all trials to persons possessed of nerves, of walking in the room in the midst of song or service. From the end corridor-doors, at the four corners of the hall, the entire floor can be seen at a glance, and the late-comer's modesty, as well as the audience's temper, is spared the trial of his wandering all over the house for a seat. He discovers the vacant seats from his reconnoitering hole, walks outside to the door nearest to it, and quietly takes his place without disturbing any one.

A MUSICAL LIBRARY. We find the following in a recent number of the London Leader:

"We learn from a correspondent, that LOWELL MASON, Esq., of Boston, United States, has purchased of the heirs of the late composer RINCK, of Darmstadt, the whole of his large and valuable library, and it is now en route via Rotterdam to Boston. Only lately, the Theological Library of the celebrated Neander was purchased at Rochester, New York, and we now congratulate our American friends on this new addition to their treasures, through the liberality and public spirit of the purchaser, who has done so much to create a knowledge and love of the science of music in his native city. The library consists of—

"1. Various Works in the History, Biography, and General Literature of Music, including sets of the various musical periodicals in Germany during the last fifty years.

"2. Theoretical Works—very extensive collection—indeed, all the books on the Science of Music which have been published in Germany.

"3. Books of Church Music, Masses, Motets, &c., with many old and valuable books of Chorals from the sixteenth century down to the present time.

"4. Organ Music—an extensive collection by German writers.

"5. Scores of Operas, and the Vocal Works, especially of the older German school.

"6. Very many educational Works, Singing Schools, School Song Books, &c.

"7. Much Manuscript Music, including a collection of Psalms for double choir by Rinck, and other valuable Organ and Vocal Music which has never been published.

"8. Autographs by many of the German composers.

"9. A large Gallery of Portraits, many of which are now exceedingly rare."

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The programme of the eighth and last concert (June 28th) was as follows:

PART I.
Sinfonia, "Im Freien," Ferd. Hiller.
Aria, "Non mi dir," Madame Clara Novello (Don Giovanni) Mozart.
Concerto, Violin, M. Vieuxtemps, Beethoven.
Romance, "A peine au sortir de l'enfance," Signor Gardoni (Joseph) Mehul.
Overture (Jessonda) Spohr.

PART II.
Sinfonia in A minor, No. 3, Mendelssohn.
Aria, "Hide me from day's garish eye," Madame Clara Novello, Handel.
Duetto, "Bella Ninfa," Mme. Clara Novello and Signor Gardoni, Spohr.
Overture (Leonora) Beethoven.
Conductor, Mr. COSTA.

Says the Times:

"The European reputation of Herr Ferdinand Hiller—who has distinguished himself as a composer in almost all the higher branches of the art, and who, as the successor of Mendelssohn in the direction of the famous Gewandhaus concerts at Leipzig, and, more recently, as Kapellmeister and principal of the Conservatoire at Cologne, has acquired one of the most honored names among the teachers of the art in Germany—imparted a special interest to the first performance in England of his symphony in G major. The design of Herr Hiller in this elaborate work was to convey, through the universal language of music, his impressions of country life and scenery. So far he has imitated the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven; but with the mere design all resemblance to that immortal inspiration ceases. Herr Hiller thinks for himself, and disdains to be a copyist. As we never heard his symphony before, we cannot pretend to give a decided opinion of its pretensions as a work of art. It is enough to say that the impression we received from a first hearing was highly favorable. The opening movement, allegro con moto, ('In the fields,') delighted us by its freshness and spontaneity of thought; and the intermezzo, a lively allegretto, ('In the valley,') by its quaintness and simplicity. The adagio, ('In the wood,') contains some beautiful passages, amidst a prevailing vagueness of character, which a closer familiarity would, doubtless, dispel. The finale, ('Upon the mountains,') a vivacious movement of great vigor, appeared to us to be less immediately clear in plan than the others; nor did the principal themes impress us so strongly as those of the preceding movements. That the entire symphony, however, is the work of a master, thoroughly conversant with all the secrets of his art, cannot admit of a question."

JOSEPH JOACHIM. "Of his precocious talent as a boy, of the influence of Mendelssohn upon his studies, of his appointment to share with Liszt the duties of Kapellmeister at the court of Weimar, and of his gradual advance to the high position he now enjoys in his profession, we have previously spoken. Although only twenty-one years of age, Herr Joachim enjoys the prestige of a name, and possesses the acquirements of a master. As a performer on the violin he stands in the first rank; and, as a composer, he has already won a place among those who have done much for the progress of the instrument.

"The concert was of first-rate pretensions. The programme was strictly 'classical,' and one of the principal features was a grand orchestra—rivaling that of the Philharmonic Society in strength and efficiency—led by M. Sainton, and conducted by Herr Ferdinand Hiller, a musician of acknowledged eminence. The performances of Herr Joachim included: Beethoven's concerto in D, (the only one written for the violin by that great composer), a fantasia on Hungarian airs, and a concertstück in G minor, composed by himself, and the 24th caprice of Paganini, originally intended as a solo study, to which an introduction and orchestral accompaniments have been added. . . . In the concertstück in G minor, which consists of a single movement, Herr Joachim has put forth all his strength as a musician, and has succeeded in producing a composition of high character and great interest, in which breadth of outline, fine melody, skilful adaptation of the passages to the instrument, and rich and elaborate orchestral treatment, are all exhibited in the most favorable manner. For mechanical difficulties, at once original and striking, the concertstück of Herr Joachim surpasses anything that has been composed for the violin, except, perhaps, the Allegro Pathétique of Ernst, to which, in other respects, it bears no resemblance.—Times.

OXFORD COMMEMORATION FESTIVAL. On the first day (June 22d) was a Sacred concert in the theatre, consisting of selections from St Paul, &c. The principal singers were Clara Novello, Locky, Miss Williams, Standig, Sims Reeves and Mrs. Messent.—On the second day a miscellaneous Concert: Sofie Cruvelli failed to fulfil her engagement; but Mlle. Clauss more than consoled the audience. The gem of the concert was admitted to be Clara Novello's Bel Raggio from Semiramide. Joachim's fantasia on the violin, and Bottesini's Concerto on the contra-basso were "astounding."—Musical exercises on the conferring of degrees of Doctor and Bachelor of Music followed.

STERNDALÉ BENNETT'S CLASSICAL PIANO CONCERT. The pianoforte pieces consisted of Beethoven's Trio in D, op. 70, played by Mr. Bennett, with Messrs. Joachim and Piatti; Paradies' third Sonata in E major; Handel's Chaconne in G; Sebastian Bach's Sonata in E, for piano and violin; and Mr. Bennett's new Sonata Duo for the piano and violoncello, played by himself and Signor Piatti. Among these pieces, Paradies' Sonata was peculiarly interesting; this composer's name is almost forgotten now-a-days, yet he was a great man in his time. He was the master of Clementi, and one of the "fathers" of the pianoforte. Mr. Bennett's Sonata Duo is a very fine work; it is beautifully written for both instruments, and, being exquisitely played in both parts, its effect was charming. Some pretty vocal pieces were performed by Miss Louisa Pyne, Signor Murras, and Mrs. Endersohn, particularly Mr. Bennett's graceful and tender ballad, "To Cloe in Sickness," which Mrs. Endersohn sang with great feeling.—Daily News.

WILHELMINA CLAUSS. "Vivian" talks so pleasantly about her, that we must give her place again:

"Her Matinée on Saturday last drew a full and loving audience, who welcomed with effusion the young angel of the chords; for, to say the truth, this young incarnation of the Sensitive Plant is one of the idolatries of our present season: she is one of those happy stars which, once seen, become a sentiment and a passion. Our most eminent music critic has taken her severely, but, as I believe, with the best and rarest kindness, to task, for some rather ostentatious failures in her more ambitious attempts. She is young enough in years, and, I trust, in spirit, to profit by counsels as full of generous wisdom as they are eminently deserving of respect. As for me, who merely represent the popular breath, I blow her a kiss, (she was nearly devoured last Saturday by the old ladies near the platform,) and whisper into her ear, to cultivate by self-denying and severe study a claim to that higher kind of applause which subsides into a more tranquil admiration. One rare pleasure attaches to her playing: it seems not so much an exhibition as a ministration, and this love winged by a genius so airy and so delicate will surely carry her far."—Leader, June 26.

OPERA. At her Majesty's there had been little new. Mlle. Wagner had left England sine die. At the Royal Italian, the event has been GRISI's assumption of the rôle of Fides, in the Prophète, in which the Wagner was to have made her début. (For a description of this see third page of this number.)

Germany.

COLOGNE. The Zeitung, of June 18th, has the following:

"HENRIETTA SONTAG, who, at the end of Summer, will undertake an artistic journey to America, has invited the talented and popular composer, CARL ECKERT, whose opera "William of Orange" enjoys so high a reputation, to accompany her thither. It will not be forgotten that Eckert last season was joined with Ferdinand Hiller in the direction of the Italian Opera at Paris."

DRESDEN. A new Oratorio: "David," by REISSIGER, has been produced. It is called his hest work.—The Missa Solennis of EMIL NAUMANN, so successfully brought out last winter by the Singacademie at Berlin, was performed in the Court Chapel.

BALLENSTEDT. A grand two days festival, at the end of June, under LISZT's direction, was to unite the chapels of Weimar, Dessau and Ballenstedt. To this end the Duke of Bernburg had given the use of the hall of the castle, holding about 3,000 persons. The programme for the first day promised: the Overture to Wagner's Tannhäuser; Recitative and Aria from Figaro, by Frau Kästner; a violin Concerto of De Beriot, played by David; Duett from the "Huguenots;" Grand Choral Fantasia, of Beethoven; the finale to Euryanthe; and Beethoven's Ninth or Choral Symphony. For the second day: Overture to "King Alfred," by Raff; the "Love-feast of the Apostles," by Wagner; the "Harold Symphony," by Berlioz; Overture to Struensee, by Meyerbeer; and Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Nacht.

WIESBADEN. The list of operas played here during the past season is quite rich, viz.: Freyschütz, Oberon, Jessonda, Don Juan, Zauberflöte, Fidelio, Robert, Huguenots, Prophète, La Juive, Linda, Lucia, Fille du Regiment, Stradella, Martha, Il Barbiere, Czar und Zimmermann, Der Wilschütz, and even the old Tancredi. The latest novelty was a grand opera by Selindemeisser, called "The Avenger"; and the "Vale of Andorra" was to follow.—At a Sacred Concert in the great Electoral Hall, Psalms of Marcello, Handel's Dettinger Te Deum, and Beethoven's C minor Symphony were given.

ST. PETERSBURG. A most successful Concert was given here by Mlle. EMMA STELB. "This young and lovely pianist, a pupil of Chopin and Henselt, plays, not Thalberg, Liszt, Wallace, or De Meyer, but compositions of Mendelssohn, Henselt and Chopin.

WILDER'S SCHOOL MUSIC. A Collection of Thirty-six New and Beautiful Songs, arranged for Schools and Juvenile Classes. By L. WILDER, Teacher of Music in the Brooklyn Music Schools, &c.

This work has already been adopted in the Schools of Brooklyn, New York, &c. Retail price, 18 3-4 cents.

CANTICA LAUDIS: OR, THE AMERICAN BOOK OF CHURCH MUSIC. By LOWELL MASON, Professor in the Boston Academy of Music, Editor of the Boston Handel and Haydn Society's Collection, Carmina Sacra, and other of the most popular Music Books in the country; and GEORGE JAMES WEBB, Professor in the Boston Academy of Music, and Editor of many valuable Musical Works.

The increased satisfaction with which it was received, and the unprecedented success of this book, MASON AND WEBB'S LATEST WORK, as well as the warm commendations it has received from the Musical Profession generally, establish it as the best and most attractive collection of Church Music which even these celebrated authors have ever produced. It contains a greater amount, as well as variety, of truly beautiful new tunes, anthems, chants, and other pieces, than any similar work; besides a copious collection of the standard old tunes. The Elements of Vocal Music have been newly and most carefully prepared, and to adapt it more particularly to CHOIRS and SINGING SCHOOLS, about Two Hundred Solfege Exercises and Progressive Lessons have been added. In addition to numerous testimonials from the press, it having been pronounced the "MOST VALUABLE BOOK OF CHURCH MUSIC EVER ISSUED," it has received from every section of the country the unqualified approbation of more than ONE HUNDRED PROFESSORS AND TEACHERS OF MUSIC. Retail price, 88 cents.

JUST PUBLISHED,

MARX'S MUSICAL COMPOSITION. The Theory and Practice of Musical Composition. By ADOLPH BERNARD MARX, Doctor of Music, &c. Translated from the third German Edition, and edited by HERMANN S. SARONI.

A. B. MARX holds such high rank in Germany as a writer upon the subject of Musical Composition, that any recommendation of his great work to those who are at all acquainted with the musical literature of the land which is emphatically the home of music, would be superfluous. It is without a rival as a treatise upon this subject, thoroughly scientific and yet adapted to popular comprehension.

The present translation is beautifully printed in 406 octavo pages, and bound in English cloth. Retail price, $2.50.

NEW HYMN AND TUNE BOOK.

TEMPLE MELODIES. A Collection of nearly all the Standard and Popular Tunes, in connection with Five Hundred Favorite Hymns; arranged as a Hymn and Tune Book for Vestries, Social Meetings, Congregational and Family Worship, &c. By DARIUS E. JONES.

This work has already been introduced, and is used with great satisfaction and profit in the vestries of many Churches and in the Congregations of some, while the publishers have received numerous recommendations from Clergymen and others. Those who love the old tunes, and who deem it a desirable object that as many as possible should unite in the singing, especially at social meetings, will find this exactly the book wanted.

NEW & VALUABLE MUSIC BOOKS

RECENTLY PUBLISHED BY

OLIVER DITSON,....BOSTON.

SPOHR'S GRAND VIOLIN SCHOOL, being an exact reprint of the latest European editions, with all the author's new revisions and improvements. One volume, quarto. Price, $3.

* Among the many peculiar excellencies of this Violin School one is remarkable, that the Elementary Instructions do not precede the practical portion of the work as in other Schools, but are combined therewith; by this union the pupil is enabled to take the Violin in hand at the first lesson; in fact, he should and must then commence with it. The author's knowledge, as observable in his Preface, is no small addition to the truly practical distinctions of this School; his style is simple, clear, noble, and elegant, alike attractive and useful as a standard to the pupil as to the master.

Czerny's Exercises in Velocity. (30 Etudes de la Velocite), preceded by Nine New Introductory Exercises, and concluded by a New Study on Octaves, (composed expressly for this edition,) for the Piano Forte. From the Nineteenth London Edition, with Notes. By J. A. HAMILTON. In three Numbers. Price of each, 50 cents. Complete in one volume, $1.25.

* Calculated to develop and equalize the fingers, and to insure the utmost brilliancy and rapidity of execution.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION OF

The Seminary Class Book of Music, designed for Seminaries, High Schools, Private Classes, etc., containing Elementary Instructions, Vocal Exercises, Solfegeios, and a copious selection of Secular and Sacred Songs, Duets and Trios. By E. L. WHITE and T. BISSELL.

* The above work has been before the public only one year, yet it has become a universal favorite, and is used in all parts of the Union. During the past year every inquiry has been made in order to ascertain in what way it could be improved and made fully equal to the wants of those for whom it is intended, and from suggestions thus obtained the publisher has been induced to add to and in other ways improve it. It is now pronounced to be exactly what is wanted, and as such it is offered to the public.

The above books can be obtained in large or small quantities of the publisher, 115 Washington St., and of music dealers and booksellers generally throughout the United States and Canada.

THE OPERA BEFORE MOZART.

[From the "LIFE AND WORKS OF MOZART," by OULIBICHEFF.]

I. ORIGIN OF OPERA, A. D. 1600.

The application of music to theatrical representations goes back as far as these representations themselves. Already with the Greeks music was inseparable from tragedy and comedy; in the Middle Ages it bore a part in the sacred farces, which were called Mysteries, spiritual pieces and sacramental actions; at a later time they used it in interludes and masques. In the ballets they had to have it; and after the pieces had assumed a more regular character, it served, as in our days, to fill up the interacts. Sometimes too, they introduced it into a work as a supplement or an episode. But none of these applications of music in theatrical pieces produced the musical drama, or was even the beginning of the same. Neither of them was a part of the fundamental principle, that song is the natural language, or the proper form of truth in Opera, as rhythmical verse is in Tragedy, and that for this reason it must never be interrupted, lest there arise a poetic contradiction and a lie. For the rest, there was more lack of knowledge how to set about it, than of correct æsthetic ideas. As yet there was no style suited to the theatre, and no one who would have understood the need of it. The dramatic style was of no advantage, so long as music did not identify itself with action, but appeared only as something superadded, which might be introduced or left out at arbitrary pleasure. Hymns and choruses of devils in choral song, popular melodies, dancing tunes, an alternation of instruments and sometimes a sort of musical recitation, full of the most nonsensical extravagance, like the Ballet comique de la Roynne, for example:—more than this the public taste did not desire, and in this spectacle everything was in perfect keeping with everything else. Poet and musician could embrace like brothers; neither had aught to object to the other, nor any cause for envy.

On the whole this style was still better than the madrigal style, which prevailed on the stage toward the end of the sixteenth century, of which the Antiparnasso d'Orazio Vecchi, played in Modena in the year 1581, affords a proof. In this commedia armonica the choruses and monologue together are written in madrigals. Imagine the hero of the piece relating his sorrows or his love in a fugued air for five voices! The singers were stationed behind the scenes, and the actor, who for the sake of more complete illusion had to observe a singing attitude, performed, as I suppose, a corresponding pantomime.

Several noble Florentines, persons of mind and taste, with GIOVANNI BARDI, Count of VERNIO, at their head, keenly felt the ludicrousness of this application of the madrigal style to the theatre, and the injury that could not but accrue therefrom to the dramatic art. Count VERNIO and his numerous train of friends and protégés formed among themselves a literary circle, one of those thousand "Academics" with and without names, which at that time began to cover the peninsula. All these persons were Hellenists, Latinists, Bellettrists, Philologists and Archæologists, as well as dilettanti; but it seems that these associates were far better versed in Sophocles and Euripides, than they were in counterpoint. For this reason they must have had even less taste than others for the learned music of their time, which was so little favorable to dilettantism and which, to be enjoyed, required the studies and special knowledges of a professor. Especially offensive to them was the more than inhuman treatment, to which the contrapuntists subjected the poets. We have already seen what a disturbing effect the old fugue style had, not only upon the poetic harmony, but also upon the whole grammatical construction. They repeated the words in infinitum; they lengthened out syllables without rhyme or reason; they changed long into short and vice versâ; they dismembered phrases without any mercy; they flung into your ear at the same time the beginning, middle and end of a sentence; the text was nothing but a maimed and undistinguishable corpse, of which it might be said without metaphor: disjectæ membra poetæ. For a long time had this insolent contempt, or rather this juggling with the words excited the downright ill will of the literati. To reform the misuse of the music, as it was, would have been of little consequence; the fugue in its very nature was incorrigible. They had to annihilate it; they had to create a new music, which sounded differently from counterpoint and differently from the popular melodies, since these were not worthy to be united with the noble and classic poetry, which, no doubt, our beaux esprits of Florence wrote.

But whence should they derive the elements of this innovation? What music should they choose? With whom should they league themselves against the living musicians, if not with the dead, from whom all light and wisdom emanated? So they conjured up the spirit of the Greek music into the hall of the academic fraternity of the palace of Vernio, as the old lawgivers of Harmony had also done six or seven centuries before. This time the spectre answered unintelligibly to the questions put to it. They amused themselves no more with commenting upon Boethius; they let theory alone, and held on exclusively to some ideas, which appeared as certain as they were clear, and from which they could derive an immediate and practical advantage. It was then clearly proved, that the Greeks recited their theatrical pieces with musical accompaniment from beginning to end; that they possessed instruments, which supported and accompanied the voice; that their choruses sang in chorus and their principal characters alone; that their song-speech differed not much from the rising and falling of the voice in words; that they had, properly speaking, no rhythm, &c., &c. These points fixed, and under the personal guidance of Count VERNIO, VIN-CENZIO GALILEI, the father of the great GALILEI, and one of the most zealous champions against the music of the day, made an attempt at a Monody (song in one part, solo) or declamation by means of notes. He recited, as well as he could, a passage from Dante, the episode of Count Ugolino, accompanying himself with the lute; and the whole academy clapped its hands with rapture at the this time genuine re-birth of the ancients. All were of opinion that the modern counterpoint would have to crumble into dust before this phantom, which had about as little form as substance, and which was baptized with the name stilo nuovo, stilo rappresentativo or recitativo, and musica parlante. There were, as history informs us, many persons, who made merry about Galilei and his rude style. These were ignoramuses, Contrapuntists and Melodists, who understood nothing of the speaking music, because it talked Greek to them, which to these people was the same as Hebrew.

Highly elated by this success in a small sphere, the society of Vernio resolved to undertake lofty invention on a grand scale, namely on the theatre, which they were to remould, reducing the music to silence and the poetry to singing; since the latter had for a long time ceased to sing, although it obstinately insisted that it sang. The plan was no sooner sketched than it was put into execution. RINUCCINI, one of the poets of the company, made the poem; two other members, who called themselves musicians, PERI and CACCINI, to whom MONTEVERDE afterwards added himself, set the declamation and the orchestral accompaniment to notes, and all Florence, full of admiration, applauded the successive representations of Dafne, Eurydice, Arianna, Orfeo and other pieces, which are justly considered as the beginning of opera, although no play in the world could be less like it.

At the same time we must not overlook the fact, that at the time of Giovanni Bardi, the works of PALESTRINA and ALLEGRI already existed; there were church Concertos by VIADANA, which, without ceasing to be church-like, were yet very melodious; there were the madrigals of LUCCA MARENZIO, in which some grace and elegance glimmered through the fugue; there were the madrigals of MONTEVERDE, which had more and better melody than those of MARENZIO; there were even the pretty Neapolitan songs and others, of which we have spoken; in a word, there was good music. To pique oneself then upon so poor a discovery as the stilo nuovo, and prefer it greatly to other productions, some of which were excellent, others genial and full of art, and others again pleasing and intelligible to every one, one must needs not only not trouble himself about music, but not even feel it. From this it is clear, that the notion of these moderns turned upon a literary reformation, whose results would surely kill the music and only keep the words alive. They meant to exercise the right of retaliation upon the musicians.

But, I shall be asked, since Count VERNIO and his friends were such poor music-lovers, why did they have their theatrical pieces sung in this way, when the worst ordinary declamation would have been a thousand times better? But do not forget that this protector of writers was himself a very zealous Hellenist, and that in this capacity he must have seen the perfection of the dramatic art in an indissoluble union of poesy with song; a song, to be sure, which was the slave of the words, without melody and without harmony, precisely as that of the Greeks was. He deceived himself as we see, as well in his view of the drama in general, as about the means of the lyric drama in particular; he was deceived altogether; and it was his very errors, his prejudices as a scholar, that led him to so true and so logical a conclusion, in an inverse sense, to-wit: that what was needed on the stage before all was a speaking music (speaking in every sense; that is to say imitative, analogous, expressive in itself, and therefore just the opposite of his music); and secondly, that the music must never suffer any interruption, after it has once fairly engaged in the action. For VERNIO this meant as much as no harmony, no melody and no musical expression. But to us it means their uninterrupted continuance. To the inventors of Monody, then, belongs the singular glory, of having set forth indeed the true principles, but with a perverted explanation, and if possible a still worse application. It was with them precisely as it was with the alchemists. They found nothing of what they sought, neither the antique song-speech, nor the Greek tragedy, nor its wonderful effects; but the pursuit of this sort of philosopher's stone opened the way to very interesting and valuable discoveries of another kind. Apart from the archæological reveries and the absurdity of the means they employed, there lay something very rational in the fundamental thought of these Florentine scholars. To restore to the poet his right of being understood, and to knit music to the piece by lasting and indissoluble ties, the necessity whereof no one until then had comprehended, was virtually expressing the great principle of lyric-dramatic truth in its whole extent. An enlightened and fruitful principle, which would necessarily in a later epoch and in more skilful hands bring masterpieces to light. For the learned world it was enough, to have spoken of the path into which it would be best to strike; but there they were destined to stand still and not point out the line of march. All the rest was the affair of the musicians.

It is true, there was a very learned man, MONTEVERDE, who from the outset mingled in the stilo nuovo enterprise. Monteverde was the renovator of another kind, and as such exposed to the censure of his brethren. The chagrin occasioned by these criticisms, which frequently were too well deserved, the hope of distinguishing himself in a new career, and perhaps some prompting devil or other, induced him to make speaking music, and while he wished to surpass Peri and Caccini, he spoke even much worse than these men.* It was a just punishment for his apostacy. For a vain idol he had renounced the worship of counterpoint, to which his calling and his real feelings led him. The intolerable theatrical composer afterwards became an excellent first chapel-master to the Church of St. Mark in Venice.

While the Florentine society was applying the representative style to the profane drama, a Roman nobleman, EMILIO DEL CAVALIERE, made an attempt at Sacred Drama, or Oratorio.—Geniuses are sometimes met with, as well as elegant wits. The Oratorio was a continuation of the old "Mysteries" or "Sacred Transactions," which were no longer played, but which continued to be sung in some of the churches at Rome, to attract the multitude. By an exception, however, or a favor, the reason whereof history does not disclose, this sacred drama of Cavaliere's, which was called L' Anima et il Corpo (The soul and the Body), was produced in Rome with dances, decorations and all the conditions of an actual play, in a theatre, which lies in the immediate vicinity of the Church of Santa Maria della Vallicella. Cavaliere's Recitative appears to me somewhat less bad than that of the Florentines, inasmuch as it approaches nearer to the church song. The choruses are not worth talking about.

A third form, which the representative music soon assumed, was the Chamber Cantata or reciting Drama, which, connected from the first with the fate of the opera, underwent all its gradual modifications, produced masterpieces under the pens of CARISSIMI and SCARLATTI, and as a form became extinct in the wonderful Orfeo of PERGOLESE.

The introduction of speaking music had an equally immense result in the sacred as in the profane drama. How are we to explain the applause bestowed on this monotonous and soporific recitation, this tedious psalmodizing, whose form and accent the Russian beggars alone seem to have preserved. This is not the most graceful manner, I admit, of begging alms; but, I maintain, it is the surest way to get it. The most confessed miser could not resist such an appeal two minutes. And yet the beau monde of the seventeenth century endured this singing, which lasted whole hours long, yes, and applauded it, was in raptures, inspired, enchanted with it! Was it the music of PERI and CACCINI, that produced this? No, certainly not; one must be more than credulous, to believe that. The men of that time had nerves as well as we; and if anything in the opera pleased them, surely it was not the music; but many other things, which claimed their interest and their feelings, prevented their receiving the entire impression of this music, and made them as it were insensible. The opera at that time was an amusement for princes, a rare and brilliant spectacle, reserved for festival occasions only, whereat the whole pomp of the Court and splendor of the most festal gala was unfolded. Eurydice, for example, was given during the festivities on occasion of the marriage of Henry IV. with Maria di Medicis. If one had the honor to be admitted to festivals of this sort, he felt too comfortable and too happy; at all events the eyes were much too busy, to allow of analyzing the elements of a play with a calmly attentive and critical spirit. The ensemble of the spectacle delighted the beholders, and this delight extended also to the music, to which they scarcely listened.

Moreover, one fact stands established, which proves to demonstration into what contempt the speaking music fell with the Italians from the moment that the novelty was over. After the opera had descended from its lofty sphere, and become transformed into a mere industrial enterprise, the Impresa, which happened about the middle of the seventeenth century, the entrepreneurs in their announcements mentioned neither the name of the poet nor of the composer. On the contrary the name of the machinist was printed in big letters. So words and music passed for nothing in the opera! Naturally an exhibition, so entirely empty in both those respects, could only interest and sustain itself by great scenic outlay. Recourse was necessarily had to all the childish tricks, which catch the eye; mythological divinities were suspended by cords from heaven, or ascended through trap-doors out of Tartarus; the stage swarmed with nymphs and satyrs, whose gambols, peals of laughter, jokes, and amorous toyings charmed the public; and, to crown all these wonders, they made whole squadrons of cavalry manoeuvre on the stage in pieces, in which the heroes of Greek and Roman history appeared; the public was more interested in the horses than in the riders, as might be expected. Between these two classes of persons there was not an equal chance. The singers did not sing and scarcely played, whereas the horses of the seventeenth century may be supposed to have possessed some of the talents of our horses.

The play in Italy, then, was constructed precisely like that afterwards in France, which the contemporaries of Louis XIV regarded as the general focus of the fine arts, and as the wonder of wonders. QUINAULT, the king's twenty-four violins, and above all the money of the king, gave to BAPTISTE LULLI in fact some advantage over his Italian predecessors; BOILEAU was not the less the best judge in France, when he said, that no-where can one have such costly ennui, as at the Opera.

Berlioz's Opera: "Benvenuto Cellini," and Liszt at Weimar.

We translate from the correspondence of the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung an outline of the plot of BERLIOZ's opera, brought out by LISZT, with his usual hospitality to new things, at Weimar. The writer's own impressions of the music, and of Liszt's management in the favored position he now occupies, will also be read with some interest.

"Giacomo Balducci, treasurer to the Pope, has a beautiful daughter, Theresa. Two lovers seek her hand: Fieramosca, sculptor to the Pope, and Benvenuto Cellini, a Florentine goldsmith. The first is favored by the father, the latter by the daughter. While Balducci has left his house, having been summoned late in the afternoon to the Pope, Cellini slips in to his sweet-heart; and while they sing a tender duet, Fieramosca too arrives. He watches them and overhears Cellini ask his love to betake herself with her father at nightfall to the square Colonna; it is Carnival time, and Cassandro, a Roman comedy-manager, is to bring out a new comedy there, and while all are unsuspectingly enjoying themselves, Theresa is to be abducted by two monks, one wearing a brown, the other a white cowl. These two monks are Cellini and his pupil Ascanio. Suddenly Balducci comes home; he is angry at his daughter's staying up so late, and in his astonishment leaves the door open, behind which Cellini quickly hides himself. Theresa, who had been aware that they were overheard by Fieramosca, sees the latter on her father's entrance conceal himself in her sleeping chamber, and so excuses her late sitting up, on the ground that a strange man has slipped into her chamber; while Balducci investigates the matter, Cellini escapes; but Fieramosca is dragged out, and the women and maids of the neighborhood called in, who hunt him about the room and drive him out.

"After an Aria of Cellini, in which he utters some harmless reflections on his art and his beloved, there rings out a chorus of goldsmiths, probably the friends and workmen in Cellini's atelier, for he is treating them all. But they have drunk so deeply, that the landlord will not trust any more. Then Ascanio appears as a saving angel; he has obtained gold for Cellini from Balducci at the order of the Pope; but Cellini is not to come into possession of it, unless he takes an oath to finish on the morrow the statue, for which Rome has so long waited. (This statue is neither more nor less than his Perseus). Cellini and his comrades take the oath, to be sure, but at the same time also swear to help carry off the old Balducci's daughter. Fieramosca and his friend Pompeo, a bully, have overheard them and resolved also to don the monk's dress agreed on for the disguise of Cellini and his pupil. Cellini and Fieramosca meet in the crowd in the same dress; they commence operations. Pompeo meddles and is stabbed by Cellini; this causes a general confusion. Ascanio lands Theresa safely in Cellini's dwelling. Fieramosca, taken for Cellini, is put in prison, but soon set free again, while they start off anew in search of Cellini. (End of the second act.)

"Cellini seeks refuge, exhausted, in a house, but leaves it at break of day, to join a procession that is passing; the monks' hoods, harmonizing with his own dress, divert the suspicion of the people and he gets safely home, where he finds Theresa and Ascanio. But the joy of meeting is of short duration. Balducci and Fieramosca come, burning with rage, to take away Theresa; Cellini defends her with his sword; then comes the Cardinal with his train, who having investigated the matter, reproaches Cellini with having taken the gold without completing the statue; as a punishment for this and for the abduction of Balducci's daughter, he tells him that another person shall complete the statue; Cellini defends himself to the utmost and, mounting the pedestal with upraised hammer, threatens to dash it in pieces at a blow. This brings the Cardinal to terms, and the artist promises to cast the statue before morning for him.

"In the fourth and last Act, Fieramosca comes to Cellini again and wants to draw him off from his work by challenging him to a duel. Cellini offers to fight it out on the spot; but the other declines, since, should he kill Cellini in his own house, he would be indictable for murder. So, notwithstanding Cellini's work is so pressing, he betakes himself to a rendezvous in the garden of the cloister of St. Andrew. In his absence an emeute breaks out among his workmen, which Theresa tries in vain to quell, and only the re-appearance of Fieramosca, causing Theresa to suspect that her lover is killed, and the imparting of this suspicion to the rebellious workmen, diverts their wrath from Cellini and upon Fieramosca; they jostle him and shake him; then a lot of gold falls from his pocket; he promises it to them if they will at once enter his service; but the workmen, indignant, are on the point of throwing him into the melting furnace, when Cellini appears. He had waited in vain for his cowardly challenger, who only wanted to make him lose time and fail to keep his promise; to punish him, the leather apron is tied about him, and he is compelled to help Cellini's work. The work goes happily on; the Cardinal finds his statue finished and blesses the bond between Cellini and Theresa.

"This story, as a whole, is excellently suited for an opera. The love of Theresa and Cellini affords lyric moments, and the dramatic element pervades the whole: the second Act with its stirring adventures on the Colonna Square, the drinking choruses, the masquerade, the duel, the finale,—verily a less gifted composer than Hector Berlioz might have better found his account in such a libretto. Until the second finale I enjoyed it pretty well. The Duett of Theresa with Cellini in the first Act, consisting in its first half of motives to the introduction of the overture to the Roman Carnival; the Terzetto following it, where Fieramosca, imagining himself unseen, overhears the plan of the abduction; the Drinking Chorus in the second Act, were numbers, of which the musical and in part the melodious design and execution were somewhat easily followed. But in the second finale all went topsy-turvy; and from that point I fared, except in a few single passages, like one waking for a moment out of a deep sleep, to turn over on the other side; I had a few lighter moments in the second finale, when the women during the comedy of Cassandro mutually admonished each other to rest; in the third Act, at the song of the monks: Rosa purpurea, &c.; also in the fourth Act, in Ascanio's Arietta, some melodious flights were perceptible; but alas, the clearness lasted only a short time and the earlier disconsolate condition took possession again of the hearer. Yet the composer excites sincere admiration by his iron industry, by his often astonishing instrumental effects, and by certainly very ingenious intentions, which however his poverty in melodious musical thoughts could not bring to pass. The overture to the opera itself, and the overture, immediately following the finale of the first Act, to the Carnival of Rome, stood out beneficently and invitingly like oases from this musical desert. The orchestra played them under Liszt's fiery and masterly leading, with distinguished effect and with artistic feeling. The singers also did what was possible to accomplish the impossible; a feat reserved to the gods alone; since to shape a well ordered melody out of notes and accords is the composer's business. I hazard the bold assertion, that frequently a musical thought, which would have been quite intelligible in itself, was murdered in the germ by the most strange and far-fetched harmonies, which allowed the ear no repose and made any pure and undisturbed emotion quite impossible.

"The Weimar public seemed disposed to condemn Liszt for bringing out this opera, and the dissatisfaction was again and again expressed rather loudly; i. e. not exactly in the theatre and during the representation, but in other public places where the vox populi feels more at home. But they were unjust. Apart from the fact that we live in a time, when so very few operas are written, of whose representation it can be predicted whether it will pay for the trouble, Liszt has within a short time brought out two of the most celebrated and ingenious works, the Tannhäuser and the Lohengrin of Richard Wagner. Only one who is himself a musician and who knows the difficulties which these operas present, can rightly estimate and admire Liszt's high artistic effort; and if any stage is pledged to study uncommon and less taking operas, and to produce them even in case that the public does not relish them, it is by all means a Court Theatre, supported, like this, solely by an art-appreciating prince, and opened for the honor and true interest of Art, and not for idle love of show and just to tickle the ears. In harmony with this view, Liszt has comprehended his position only too well and has most brilliantly justified the confidence which the Court has placed in his insight. In other places lighter and more pleasing operas are given, and even they fall through; this has been the case of late years with all French operas except the Prophète of Meyerbeer; out of Italy there comes really nothing more, and the German composers have been seeking since the birth of Christ for good opera texts, in the want of which most of the theatres have necessarily gone to the ground. Little as "Benvenuto Cellini" has taken with the public, still that public remains properly indebted to Liszt's efforts to call into life the works of celebrated composers, even when the reigning taste does not approve them and when he has to risk the mingling of some discordant sounds in the concert of praise which he has been used to hear from his very childhood."

So much, for the present, of Liszt and his encouragement of new things at Weimar. Of Richard Wagner, and of his operas above named and his radically new theory of Opera (and in fact of Musical Art altogether), we shall soon take an opportunity of informing our readers so far as we have been able to inform ourselves.

THE ARTIST.

BY C. P. CRANCH.

He breathed the air of realms enchanted,
He bathed in seas of dreamy light,
And seeds within his soul were planted
That bore us flowers for use too bright,
Unless it were to stay some wandering spirit's flight.

With us he lived a common life,
And wore a plain familiar name,
And meekly dared the vulgar strife
That to inferior spirits came —
Yet bore a pulse within, the world could never tame.

And skies more soft than Italy's
Their wealth of light around him spread,
And tones were his, and only his —
So sweetly floating o'er his head —
None knew at what rich feast the favored guest was fed.

They could not guess or reason why
He chose the ways of poverty;
They read no wisdom in his eye,
But scorned the holy mystery
That brooded o'er his thoughts and gave him power to see.

But all unveiled the world of Sense
An inner meaning had for him,
And Beauty, loved in innocence,
Not sought in passion or in whim,
Within a soul so pure could ne'er grow dull and dim.

And in this vision did he toil,
And in this beauty lived and died. —
And think not that he left his soil
By no rich tillage sanctified;
In olden times he might have been his country's pride.

And yet may be — though he hath gone —
For spirits of so fine a mould
Lose not the glory they have won;
Their memory turns not pale and cold —
While Love lives on, the lovely never can grow old.

The large hall in the school-house of the Public Latin School in Boston has recently been quite tastefully and handsomely fitted up, under the auspices of the Latin School Association, which is a society composed of the alumni of this time-honored institution. The walls have been decorated with niches painted in fresco, before which stand casts of the statues of the Laocöon, Minerva, and the Apollo Belvidere, and busts of Seneca, Socrates, Homer, Virgil, Cicero, and Demosthenes. There is also a fine bronzed cast of Flaxman's Shield of Achilles. There is a portrait of old John Lovell; and a number of engravings, neatly framed, illustrating classical subjects. Many of these are the gifts of individual members of the association. On a scroll at one end of the hall, opposite the clock, is the legend "1635," the date of the foundation of the school. — To-Day.

"NEGRO MINSTRELSY." We confess to a fondness for negro minstrelsy. There is something in the plaintive "Dearest May," in the affectionate "Lucy Neal," and in the melodious "Uncle Ned," that goes directly to the heart, and makes Italian trills seem tame. It is like Ossian's music of memory, "pleasant and mournful to the soul." "Dearest May" has become classic — a sort of Venus Africanus, with "Her eyes so bright they shine at night,

When the moon am gone away."

And "poor Lucy Neal," the Heloise of darkies, her very name has become the synonym of pathos, poetry and love. The whole world is redolent of the sweet and plaintive air in which her charms are chanted; and the beauty of her shining form often comes over us like a pleasant shadow from an angel's wing.

"Oh if I had her by my side,
How happy I would feel."

And as for poor "Uncle Ned," so sadly denuded of his wool, God bless that fine old colored gentleman, who, we have been so often assured, has "Gone where the good niggers go."

On Universality in Art.

[Third Extract.]

Art is nothing more than the shadow of humanity. To make the ideal actual in the sphere of production, in the sphere of work, is the function of the Artist. To make the ideal actual in the sphere of life, is the function of Man. Talent, a healthy organization, knowledge of history or of the past achievements of the race, and an intercourse with nature and society wide enough to educate him out of all local prejudice, these no doubt are indispensable conditions of the Artist's worthy manifestation, but they no more create or give him being, than the elements of nature give being to man.

What the Artist does for us is, not to repeat some laborious dogma learned of nature or society, but to show nature and society everywhere pregnant with human meaning, everywhere pervaded by a human soul. His business in a word is to glorify MAN in nature and in men. All our sensible experience proceeds upon the fact of a unitary and therefore omnipresent soul or life within us. Were this soul or life finite like my body, were it finited by other souls as my body is finited by other bodies: were it in short an intrinsically heterogeneous soul in my body to what it is in other bodies: then all sympathy between me and universal nature would be impossible. Not only would my fellowship with man in that case obviously cease, but my eyes could no longer discern the glories of the earth and sky, nor my nose inhale the fragrance of innumerable flowers, nor my ears drink in the myriad melodies which are the daily offering of earth to heaven. For the splendor of the morning and evening landscape, the fragrance of flowers, and the melody of birds, are not substantial things having their root in themselves; they are merely masks of a certain relation between me and universal nature, of a certain unity between my soul and the soul that animates all things. The landscape is not glorious to itself, nor the flower fragrant, nor the bird melodious; they are severally glorious, fragrant and melodious only to me. The fragrance of the rose, the splendor of the landscape, the melody of the bird, are only an overt sacrament or communion between my soul and their soul, between God in me and God in them. Because an infinite or unitary life animates all things, we never come into outward contact without our inward unity flashing forth in these delicious surprises.

Now the Artist is saturated with this sentiment of universal unity, this sentiment which binds all nature together in the unity of a man, and he ever strives to give it a perfect expression. Why does he not succeed in doing so? Why does no painter, no poet, no sculptor succeed in snatching the inmost secret of Art, and so making his name immortal?

It is because the inmost secret of Art does not lie within the sphere of Art, but belongs only to Life. Art or doing, as I have said before, is itself but a shadow of the eternal fact which is life, or action. To live or to act is more than to produce: hence the technical Artist has never succeeded and never will succeed in achieving the universal empire which belongs only to Man. The poet, painter or musician is not the perfect man, the man of destiny, the man of God, because the perfect man is so pronounced by his life or action rather than by his production. He is not constituted perfect by any work of his hands however meritorious, but simply by the relation of complete unity between his inward spirit and his outward body, or what is better, between his ideas and his actions.

[Fourth Extract.]

Let us embalm the Artist therefore in our regard for his prophetic worth. Let us freely honor the poet, painter, clergyman, ruler, lawyer, mechanist, for his humanitarian worth, in that his labors have given our earthly life a positive aspect, or changed it from the condition of a mere port of entry to heaven and hell, into an independent kingdom making heaven and hell jointly tributary to itself. But let us honor none of these men for his own sake. None of them is perfect in se. None of them exhibits the image of Deity. None of them presents that perfect union of the opposing elements of human nature which constitutes sovereign manhood, and which shall therefore characterize the man of the future. They all exhibit, as I have said, the equilibrium or indifference of these elements, rather than their active union; exhibit in fact a compromise of them, rather than their full and cordial concurrence. They all more or less limit the good element by the evil one, or measure their devotion to the public weal by their own private advantage. No clergyman in the land obeys the pure inspirations of God as manifested in his own soul, but only as sanctioned by certain traditional formulas approved by his sect. No lawyer enforces the principles of absolute justice, but only so far as embodied in certain existing standards. No poet declares the whole truth that trembles upon his soul, nor any painter the ineffable beauty that dazzles his inner vision. For poet and painter, lawyer and priest, are obliged before all things to secure a living upon the earth, and yield to their inspirations only so far therefore as consists with that prime necessity.

These men consequently do not fulfil our human aspiration. They have indeed carried the world onward: to them human history has been indebted for all its vivacity and sweetness: they have preserved our life from indolence, stagnation, and putridity: they may therefore be called true Providential men, men to whom the Lord has accommodated His stature in the past. They are not the Lord, or the complete divine man, but accommodations of him adapted to the conditions of our ignorance, or to the imperfect evolution of human destiny. They are harbingers of the perfect man, the nearest approximation permitted by our infirm science, but they are by no means his veritable self. They bear indeed precisely the same relation to him that the present path of the ecliptic does to the equator, which is a relation of decided obliquity. Philosophers tell us that when the earth shall have attained her true poise upon her axis, the path of the ecliptic will be coincident with the equator, and the rigors of winter and the fervors of summer consequently will alike give place to a new and perpetual spring, which shall bathe the whole earth in gladness. So when humanity shall have attained true moral poise, these men who have hitherto been her ecliptic, who have marked the place of the divine footsteps, who have belted the earth with a Providential lustre, will give place to the equatorial or perfect man, who shall completely reconcile the still disunited elements of good and evil in a new individuality, which shall carry the dew and fragrance of God into every commonest nook of our daily life, and absorb alike the parched aridity of the saint and the rank fecundity of the sinner in the unity of integral man.

Gluck and his Operas.

We took occasion, from the performance at one of our Summer Afternoon Concerts of the Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis, to call up the memory of this renowned and, as he is often styled, "sublime" composer. We introduced him to our readers first in a fantastic light,—that strange, eccentric apparition of him which stood in the chambers of the imagination of his still more eccentric, but appreciating admirer, Hoffman. We propose now a prosaic, literal account of the man and his doings;—a brief abstract, in fact, of what may be read more fully in Fétis, Dr. Burney, and other musical historians.

CHRISTOPHER GLUCK was born, in obscurity and poverty, in the Palatinate, it is generally supposed, on the 14th of February, 1712; though even the year of his birth is matter of much doubt. Neither is his father's profession known. They removed to Bohemia, where at an early age, the boy was left fatherless and without means. But with rare force of mind and will, and a natural instinct for music, he profited by the musical sphere which surrounded him in Bohemia, where in schools and families everybody played or sang. He learned several instruments, and went from place to place, a mere itinerant street musician, anticipating apparently no higher destiny.

But chance led him to Vienna, where he found means of studying harmony and counterpoint. From there he passed in 1736 to Italy, and placed himself under the instructions of San Martini. In four years he felt in a condition to write for the theatre. His first opera, entitled Artaserse, was brought out at Milan, in 1741; it was followed by Ipermestre, and Demetrio, at Venice, (1742); Demofonte, at Milan (1742); Artamene, Siface, Alessandro nell' Indie, and Fédra (1743-4.)

All these works were in the then fashionable Italian style, which in some respects seems to have been not very far unlike the Italian style in fashion now. That is, it was the style dictated by the singers, filled with the ambitious cadenzas and brilliant melodic common-places in which they loved to display their vocal powers; while less regard was had by the composers to dramatic truth and unity of subject. These first efforts placed Gluck high among composers in this line, and in 1745 he was called to London to write two works for the Opera there. In these he failed; Handel declared them detestable and was prepossessed ever after against the merits of Gluck. In London, too, he was engaged to arrange what was called a pasticcio:—a poem set to musical morceaux out of different operas. This first led him to his new ideas of dramatic truth; for he discovered that music, which was very effective in one connection, failed to be so in another; that there should always be a fitness between the music and the words and action.

Accordingly he renounced the Italian School, of which it was said, that "the Opera was a Concert, with the Drama for a pretext."

Returning to Vienna, Gluck composed not only operas, but symphonies, for which latter form he found himself unfitted; music without words was not particularly his vocation. So he set about repairing the defects of his general education, devoted himself to languages and literature, and sought the conversation of fine persons; in all of which he found himself confirmed in his idea of the necessity of a reform in dramatic music.

His growing reputation recalled him in 1754 to Italy. There he wrote several more operas, among others the Clemenza di Tito (a subject afterwards chosen by Mozart,) the Antigono, and the Telemacco. A chorus in this last furnished him afterwards with the motive to his overture to Iphigenia in Aulis; and the overture to Telemacco became the overture to his Armida.

We now come to the period of his great masterpieces, in which he fully wrought in the spirit of his new idea, and in which alone he lives to us and to the music-lovers of ages yet to come. At Vienna, between 1761 and 1764, he opened this grand series with Alceste, Paris et Hélène, and Orfeo. All his operas before these were but preliminary to the true and full exercise of his genius; mere stages of his wandering apprenticeship in false schools. And now he was forty-six years old, when he attained to clearness of thought and purpose and to the full summer of his creative powers. Of course, in such a revolution as he was undertaking, the coöperation of a poet was indispensable. This he found in Calzabigi, who wrote the libretti of the pieces above named. We translate from M. Fétis:

"Less rich in poesy than Metastasio's dramas, but more happily disposed for music, the poems of these operas present dramatic situations of the finest effect. Nothing could be more favorable to the inspirations of the musician than the fine scenes, where Alceste consults the oracle about her husband's fate and devotes herself to save him; nothing is comparable to the magnificent tableau of the second act of Orfeo. In this second act Gluck has attained his highest pitch of sublimity. From the first ritornel, the spectator has a forefeeling of the whole effect of the scene about to pass before his eyes. The perfect gradation of sensations observed in the chorus of demons, the novelty of forms, and above all the admirable pathos, that reigns throughout the song of Orpheus, make this scene a chef-d'œuvre, which will resist all the caprices of fashion, and always be considered one of the finest productions of genius."

The scores of these three operas, with the Italian words, were engraved at Paris in 1769. To the Alceste and the Paris et Hélène Gluck prefixed dedicatory epistles in which he unfolded his ideas of dramatic music, in a much briefer manner than Herr Richard Wagner has been doing in our day. The first of these we translate and let Gluck be his own expositor:

"In setting to music the opera of Alceste, I have proposed to myself to avoid all the abuses which the short-sighted vanity of singers and the excessive complaisance of composers have introduced into the Italian Opera, and which, from the most grand and beautiful of spectacles, have made it the most tedious and ridiculous. I sought to reduce Music to its true function, that of seconding Poetry in strengthening the expression of sentiments and the interest of situations, without interrupting the action or chilling it by superfluous ornaments; I believed that music ought to add to poesy, what is added to a correct and well-composed design by vivacity of colors and a happy harmony of lights and shadows, which serve to animate the figures without altering their contours. I have guarded myself carefully therefore against interrupting an actor in the heat of the dialogue, to make him listen to a tedious ritornel [piece of instrumental symphony], or arresting him in the middle of his discourse upon a favorable vowel, whether to display the agility of his fine voice in a long passage, or to wait for the orchestra to give him time to take breath for a cadenza.

"I have not thought it my duty to pass rapidly over the second part of an air, when this second part was the most important, in order regularly to repeat the words four times; nor to finish the air before the sense is finished, so that the singer may show his ability to vary a passage at his will and in several manners.

"In short, I have wished to proscribe all those abuses, against which good sense and good taste have long cried out in vain.

"I have imagined that the overture should forewarn the spectators of the character of the action about to be placed before their eyes, and indicate its subject; that the instruments should be brought into play only in proportion to the degree of interest and of passion; and that it was important above all things to avoid in the dialogue too marked a disproportion between Air and Recitative, so as not to cut short the period in the wrong place, or interrupt the warmth and movement of the scene mal à propos.

"I have believed, too, that the greatest part of my labor should be reduced to seeking a beautiful simplicity, and I have avoided making a parade of difficulties at the expense of clearness; I have attached no value to the discovery of a novelty, unless it were naturally given by the situation and really indispensable to the expression; finally there is no rule, which I have not felt it my duty to sacrifice, if need were, in favor of effect.

"These are my principles; fortunately the poem lent itself marvellously to my design. The celebrated author of Alceste, having conceived a new plan of the lyric drama, had substituted for flowery descriptions, for useless comparisons, for frigid and sententious moralities,—strong passions, interesting situations, the language of the heart and an ever-varied spectacle. The success has justified my ideas, and the universal approbation, in a city so enlightened [Vienna], has demonstrated to me that simplicity and truth are the grand principles of the beautiful in all the productions of the Arts," &c., &c.

True Canons of Criticism these, beyond dispute, which every would-be intelligent habitué of the Opera will do well thoroughly to consider and digest. We must suspend here our narrative of Gluck until next week. Fairly to understand his position and influence in the development of the Lyric Drama, one should know something of its history from the beginning. We have commenced therefore, in the present number, translating a very intelligent and succinct view of the origin and history of Opera up to the time of Mozart, contained in the admirable biography by a Russian, from which we have heretofore given some instructive extracts.

LECTURES ON MUSIC. We copied some time since a notice of Mr. WILLIAM HENRY FRY'S project of a course of lectures, on a gigantic scale, to be delivered in New York, so soon as tickets shall be subscribed for to the amount of $10,000, to enable him to illustrate his topics by practical performances of specimens of the various styles and forms of musical composition. For this he would employ: 1. A corps of Principal Italian vocalists; 2. A chorus of one hundred singers; 3. An Orchestra of Eighty performers; 4. A Military Band of Fifty performers.

Mr. Fry is a gentleman, who has enjoyed, for an American, rare musical opportunities; is possessed of enthusiasm, taste and large general culture; has himself composed an opera or two in the Italian style, of considerable merit; and more recently, while residing in Paris, has corresponded in a very lively and instructive manner with the N. Y. Tribune and other papers, upon musical, æsthetic and social matters. We have not the pleasure of his personal acquaintance; but from all we hear of him, we think it for the interest of musical taste in this country that his lecture enterprise should go on, to his own heart's content; and we are glad to learn that his subscription paper, so far, shows good promise.

An idea of the ground which Mr. Fry proposes to go over in his lectures, may be gathered from the following

SYLLABUS.

LECTURE 1. Introduction to the general subject,—Music. Musical sounds; definition and characteristics. Music as a language. Its history; its universality. Formation of sounds. Exemplifications, vocal and instrumental.

2. Acoustics. Music as a science at different periods and among different nations. Melody and Harmony. Examples of curious music,—the ancient and the rude. The earliest written choruses. Performance of some remarkable ones by the grand chorus. Simple and scientific music;—the popular and the true meaning of these epithets discussed and illustrated.

3. The voice. Intonation in speaking and singing distinguished. The different qualities and capacities of the masculine and feminine voice. Exemplifications by the principal vocalists and the chorus. Method and style. Sources of expression.

4. The Ballad,—sentimental and descriptive music. Its variations among different nations. National songs, their distinctive features, poetical and musical. Vocal illustrations with and without accompaniments.

5. The Orchestra. All the instruments explained; their past and present treatment by composers practically demonstrated by the great orchestra. Sinfonia and overture. Military Music. Illustrations by the military band.

6. Church, Oratorio, and Chamber Music. Subjects, meanings and aims of the several species. The organ, piano, harp and guitar. Styles of different composers. Performance of selections from rare, curious and great works.

7. Nature and Progress of Musical Ideas. Similarities in the melodic phraseology of different composers,—how far referable to the nature of the art. Improvements in Orchestration, and the general scope of Music. Exposition of the different schools of Music, exemplified in the compositions of old and modern masters. Palestrina, Jomelli, Puccini, Gluck, Handel, Piccini, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Rossini, and others. The difference between formal and inspired music.

8. The Lyrical Drama. Origin of the Opera. Its progress and peculiarities on the Italian, German, French and English stage. Defects and merits of the Opera in general, as an exponent of dramatic character, passion and action. Selections from various operas illustrative of these topics.

9. The Lyrical Drama continued. Considerations of the fitness of the English language for dramatic music. Exemplifications in recitatives, arias, etc. The Ballet, its characteristics.—Orchestral illustrations of them. General considerations of the proprieties of the lyrical stage. Its traditions, requisite reforms, capabilities and influences.

10. The connection between literature and oratory and music. Music as part of a collegiate education. The national defects of intonation and pronunciation. The connection between music and its public diffusion with the national taste in other arts. Its connection with health and morals:—the family circle and society. The dignities and shames of art. The actual relation of the artist to private and public life. His rights under American Institutions contrasted with his disparagement under the ancient and feudal system. American Music. The Artistic Future.

The following hymn, by the Rev. CHARLES T. BROOKS, of Newport, R. I., was sung at the Festival of the Alumni of Harvard College, on Thursday last.

Tune—Portuguese Hymn.

The God of our fathers, whose providence led
Their wilderness-wanderings, when exiles they fled,
Looks down on their children benignantly now,
And his benison breathes on each reverent brow.

The fair plant of Learning they brought o'er the waves,
Nursed by Faith and by Liberty, towers o'er their graves;
And with health in its branches, the heaven-honored tree
Shades to-day their glad myriads, the grateful and free.

A vision of majesty sweeps o'er the scene;
A voice of old time haunts these arches of green;
The souls of the dead—the immortal—here breathe,
And their peace to unborn generations bequeathe.

May the Lord of Sabaoth, who stretched forth his hand
His people to lead to this bountiful land,
Guide the tribes of their sons, as the ages roll by,
Through their pilgrimage here to the promise on high!

Germania Serenade Band.

The sixth Summer Afternoon Concert, which took place last week, was uncommonly rich. The entire Symphony in E flat, by HAYDN, was performed with much spirit, precision and careful regard to light and shade. In the pianissimo passages, especially, the little orchestra evinced conscientious thoroughness of drill, in spite of the tropical weather.

This Symphony is one of the twelve known among our older musicians as the "Salomon Set," which Haydn wrote in his riper days for the concerts of M. Salomon in London. It is one of the most ingenious, elaborate and beautiful of the tribe; so full of variety, so piquant in its themes and clear and logical in its development, that in spite of its great length, (occupying over half an hour in the performance,) it seemed short to the delighted listeners.

The Allegro is introduced by a solemn roll of the drum, opening a grave movement; and then the most quaint, lively, cunning little theme sets out in the violins and is worked up with masterly skill of counterpoint and instrumental coloring. The Andante, a very long movement, is singularly beautiful and unique in its style, and full of enchanting variety. The Minuet, at least on a first hearing, was less striking; but the Finale, with a short, sententious subject, closely woven into the different parts in fugued style, impressed us as deeply, as any thing we ever heard of Haydn, with a feeling of his power. Of course this Symphony must be played again; it is due to the audience that they should have an opportunity to understand it, which can only be by repeated hearings, in the case of works of this magnitude. Verily we Boston music-lovers have thus far been denied an essential part of our musical birth-right. We have had the Symphonies of BEETHOVEN (for which we cannot be too thankful;) our education, so to speak, began with Beethoven, at the top of the ladder; while of his noble predecessors, HAYDN and MOZART, there has been performed here almost nothing,—at least until very recently. We know not of a greater service which an orchestra can do us now—whether it be the Musical Fund, or the Germania, or any other—than to begin systematically to make us acquainted with the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart. To this little orchestra, now in the field, many of these are much better suited than would be the massive C minor and No. 7 of Beethoven, or the Jupiter of Mozart. Where truth and delicacy of outline is the main desideratum, such a band may well undertake to interpret some of the best creations in this form.

At the concert before the last, several of the little pieces from SCHUMANN'S piano forte Album were performed by the brass instruments, as arranged by Mr. SUCK. We were not able to be present.

Yesterday, Gluck's immortal Iphigenia overture was to be repeated; also an arrangement for orchestra, by Mr. Suck, of Schubert's Lob der Thränen ("Elogy of Tears.")

The "Musical Times" and "Musical World" are hereafter to be united, and published weekly, at three dollars per annum, by Messrs OLIVER DYER and RICHARD STORRS WILLIS. This arrangement is to commence with a new volume on Saturday, Sept. 4th. Here are editorial talent, means and machinery enough for a good musical paper, and we sincerely hope it will take a high position and find abundant support. Each number is to contain four pages of Music.

The last number of the World contains two political campaign songs, one for the Whigs and one for the Democrats!

"Musical Review and Choral Advocate." This is a monthly publication, published at 50 cts. per year, in New York, by F. J. Huntington and Mason & Law, 23 Park Row. It bears the names of LOWELL MASON and I. B. WOODBURY, as corresponding editors, and contains selections of music and articles about music, chiefly, though not exclusively, sacred.

The last number is enriched by a piece of Prize Music, called the "Song of Spring," the publishers having offered a premium of fifty dollars for "the best plain vocal composition in four parts." The award was made by a competent committee to GEORGE F. ROOT, Esq., who offered two pieces, both decided by the committee to be superior to all others. The "Spring Song" is certainly very creditable to a native composer, and the Review promises the other piece.

Another similar prize is yet to be awarded, for the best Essay on a given musical topic.

Prizes for musical compositions appear to us as among the best means of stimulating native musical talent. We command the example to our "Harvard Musical Association," to our Musical Institutes, and indeed to our time-honored Universities, which, to make good so broad a name, ought to include Music among the other "humanities."

The "Excellent Art of Musick."

"AMPHION ANGLICUS. A Work of many Compositions, for one, two, three and four Voices: with several Accompanements of Instrumental Musick; and a Thorow-Bass to each Song: figur'd for an Organ, Harpsichord, or Theorboe-Lute. By Dr. JOHN BLOW."

One knows not which most to admire in the seraphic Doctor: his large sense of the dignity of his art, or the well-rounded, Ciceronian vernacular in which he has couched his meaning. Decidedly his paragraphs are worthy of a place among elegant extracts. The modesty, too, of the concluding sentences, stands in rich contrast with the aforesaid big-wigged portrait, and with the series of poetical rhapsodies addressed to the author, which he has printed after the Dedication; one of which is headed: "To the Most Incomparable Master of Musick, Dr. JOHN BLOW; Occasioned by his obliging the World with his Inimitable Amphion Anglicus."

Altogether the book (lately donated to the library of the Harvard Musical Association) is a curiosity. Many a prima donna of the present day would shrink from the vocal roudades, and passages with which these old songs bristle; and that tenore would have to have more virtuosity than most of our "negro melodists," who should undertake to sing, for instance, the song of "The Fair Lover and his Black Mistress," commencing: Oh! Ni-grocella! &c.]

To Her Royal Highness, the Princess Ann of Denmark:

MADAME: The excellent Art of Musick, was thought by many of the Wisest Ancients, to have derived its Original immediately from Heaven; as one of the First, most beneficial Gifts of the Divine Goodness to Mankind: thereby to draw and allure, the old, rude, and untaught World, into Civil Societies; and so to soften and prepare their Minds for the easier reception of all other Accomplishments of Wisdom and Vertue.

The most Learned of the Ancient Heathens, the Greeks, were so much of this Opinion, that they carried their Veneration for this Admirable Faculty too far. They believed they could not do it right, but by assigning to it, for its Protection and Improvement, some peculiar tutelary Gods of its own. Nay, when to all the other Ornaments and Perfections of human Life, they seldom appointed more than one single Deity to preside over each of them, to Musick alone they allotted a greater number of Guardian Divinities than to any of the rest; some of the Male, but most of the Female and Fairer Sex.

They were indeed mistaken, when they bestowed on it these Fabulous Honours; and they made but ill Gods and Goddesses of those Men and Women, who would have done excellently well if they had only passed for Patrons of it, or Inventors in it, as they really were.

But in all times of the truer Antiquity, even amongst God's own peculiar People, we find this most instructive and delightful Skill did always meet with its due and deserved Honours, short of Idolatry, and within the bounds of Sobriety and Decency.

Thus we read in the Holy Scriptures, not long after the History of the Creation, the Name of the Man is Solemnly recorded with Renown, among the Founders of Nations, who was the first Inventor of the Harp and the Organ.

And undoubtedly, there was never any Age of the true Church afterwards, whether Jewish, or Christian, wherein the Sacred delights of Musick were not admitted, to bear an eminent Part in the Worship of the True God.

In the Jewish Church, it is certain, that even before the Temple it self was built, while it was yet only in Design, God Inspir'd David, the Man after his own Heart, to Compose before-hand, the Hymns and Divine Anthems that were to be Sung in it.

And the choice of the Person for that Work, was infinitely for the dignity of the Art: Since no less a Man, than the chief of their Monarchs, and the greatest of their Conquerors, was ordained by God, to be their Poet and Musician on that occasion.

And it were easy to prove, that the same Celestial Spirit of Musical Concord and Harmony, was all along cherished and entertained in the Christian Church, during the very best Times of its purest Doctrines and Devotions.

It will be enough, only to mention one undeniable Instance, That, in the Primitive Age, during the cruellest Persecutions, in their most Private and Nightly Assemblies, the Christians of that early Time, as Pliny informed Trajan, remarkably distinguish'd themselves, by their alternate Singing of Psalms, and Spiritual Songs.

Such, Madame, have been always the Employments of the Sublime Art of Musick, to teach and cultivate Humanity; to Civilize Nations; to Adorn Courts; to Inspirit Armies; to Inspire Temples and Churches; to sweeten and reform the fierce and barbarous Passions; to excite the Brave and Magnanimous; and, above all, to inflame the Pious and the Devout.

For these Reasons, it has all along receiv'd the Encouragement and Favour of the Greatest, the Wisest, the most Religious, the most Heroick Persons of all Ages. And it seems but reasonable, that it should be so, that they should principally take upon them the care of this High-born Science of Tuneful Sounds and Numbers, whose Souls are more elevated than others, and seem most to partake of that Natural, and Divine Harmony, it professes to Teach.

You see, Madame, what undoubted Title Your Royal Highness has to the Patronage of this Art. It is Your own by many rightful claims, not only for your High Birth and Royal Dignity, but for something, that is even yet more Your own; for that admirable temper of Spirit, that harmonious sweetness of Disposition, that silent Melody, and charming Musick of Your whole Life.

After I have said this, it cannot be denied, but that, by inscribing these Papers to Your Royal Highness, I have chosen the worthiest and most excellent Patroness for these 'my Studies, that this Nation, or Age has produc'd. Yet I must still confess, while I applaud my self for the happiness of my Choice, the ambition of it puts me into Confusion; I am ashamed to think, that to such a Patroness I can present so very little, either worthy of the Art I admire, or of the Glorious Princess to whom I dedicate all my Muses.

But for that part, which concerns Your self, Madame, Your own Goodness and Benignity, has set my Mind at ease, by Your generous Invitation and favourable Promise, of accepting the low Present I now offer, and your Gracious Assurance of a perpetual Protection to its Author.

And that also, if any thing can, may possibly enable me to supply the other Part better for the future, and lift up my Genius to something more becoming the Majesty of Art it self.

The two most Noble ends of Musick Vocal and Instrumental, being either to raise and nourish the tender, and the Generous Passions of Love, Friendship, and Honour, among Men; or to animate our Affections, and to kindle the ardour and zeal of our Devotions towards God: I must own, that what I now lay at your Royal Highness's Feet, consists only in some weak Performances of the first kind.

I will make no Apology for the Subjects of any of them, tho' they are generally conversant about Love-Affairs; since the diversitements and delights of those softer Affections, when conceiv'd in pure Thoughts, and cloathed with innocent Expressions, have been always allowed in all Wise and Good-natur'd Polite Nations; and never any where Condemn'd by the truly Good and Honourable part of Mankind.

I dare affirm, that nothing but the unsociable sullenness of a Cynick, would ever exclude secular Musick, so qualified, out of Civil Societies; as nothing but the perverse sowness of a Fanatick, would ever drive Divine Musick out of the Church.

But yet, lest a Work of this Nature, tho' perhaps not blameable in it self, either for the Matter, or the manner of it, should however seem to fall below what is due to Your Royal Highness's Greatness of Mind, and consummate Vertue: Give me leave, Madame, to tell You, I am preparing, as fast as I can, to make some amends for this, by a Second Musical Present, upon Arguments incomparably better: I mean my Church-Services, and Divine Compositions.

To those, in truth, I have ever more especially consecrated the Thoughts of my whole Life. All the rest I consider but as the Blossoms, or rather the Leaves; those I only esteem as the Fruits of all my Labours in this kind. With them I began my first Youthful Raptures in this Art: With them, I hope calmly and comfortably to finish my days. Nor will my Mind be ever at rest, till I have offer'd them up to God, for the Publick use of the best Church in the Christian World, under the Propitious Authority of Your Royal Highness's Name.

May it please Your Royal Highness,
I am Your most Humble, most Dutiful, and most Devoted Servant,

JOHN BLOW.

OPERA BEFORE MOZART.

[From the "LIFE AND WORKS OF MOZART," by OULBICHEFF.]
II. PROGRESS IN ITALY—INTRODUCTION OF MELODY —ASCENDENCY OF THE SINGERS—THE OPERA SERIA.

We cannot follow all the improvements, advances and transformations of the lyric drama. This is the task of history. Ours consists in briefly depicting the spirits of the epochs and in finally indicating wherein every one of these has contributed to prepare the epoch of MOZART. We leave in the background facts and names, with which we presuppose the reader already familiar, and speak only of the general tendencies, which the lyric drama obeyed among the Italians and the French, the only nations, which before MOZART could boast of possessing a national opera.

Italy, which already swarmed with celebrated musicians and intelligent dilettanti, hastened to shake off the intolerable burden of an everlasting Recitative without character and without instrumentation. Already had STRADELLA, CARISSIMI, CESTI, CAVALLI, appeared; SCARLATTI followed them. Names dear to every friend of music. These gave the world the genuine, the grand secret of the dramatic style:—a Recitative, which already began to adapt itself to grammatical, logical and rhetorical intonation; a Recitative, which spoke the natural speech; and what was more and better, Melody, Airs. The thenceforth purely natural in melody shaped itself to the Ideal, that is, to the natural in its highest perfection, which is superior to the primitive song in euphony, in beauty of forms and variety of expression, as in the number and choice of the accords, out of which it sprang. Through this alone the music of the theatre became for all feeling souls that wonderful, enchanting, omnipotent art, of which the men of earlier times had had some presentiment, but no knowledge. The Italians prostrated themselves before this new god, who was to subdue the world to them; they introduced song into the opera; gradually they sacrificed to it all their old idols, both Olympus and Tartarus, the machineries and the dance, yes, even the horses. Yet a little while, and we shall see the drama itself made an offering to it.

The extraordinary enthusiasm, with which the above-named composers inspired their countrymen, must not surprise us. These men correspond, in the progress of melody, to PALESTRINA. On the other hand, one is astonished, when he looks through the vocal compositions of CARISSIMI, at finding them, in spite of their great simplicity, more fresh and full of happier invention, than a multitude of airs which date from the eighteenth century. A simple figured bass accompanies them, and there is sometimes in this bass more harmony than in the orchestras of a period which very aged people yet remember. Our task must limit itself to pointing out the causes of this relative and local inferiority in the most musical country in the world, at a time when art had received an immeasurable impulse in other countries, which till then had only played a very modest part in the history of Music.

In proportion as dramatic melody enriched itself by new turns and passages, the talent of vocal delivery developed with it, and began to react upon the work of the composers. The singers, who before had formed one soul with these, now made a class by themselves. They had their own interest, strictly separate from that of the mäestro and the poet, whereby they soon knew how to domineer over both. Of all the delights, which music has power to produce, the most prominent, or at least the most universally felt is the charm of a beautiful voice, united with that brilliant mechanical facility, which is called virtuosity. When once the dilettanti had tasted this enjoyment, (I mean the great mass of dilettanti, to whom artists owed their fame and income,) they became rather indifferent, as a general rule, to all the rest. If the music is only of such a sort, as to allow the favorite artist to produce all his means of seduction and enchantment; if the drama only affords an opportunity, no matter how, for arias and duetts for the principal tenor and the prima donna, then the music is declared good enough, the piece rational enough. The singers understood their advantage and made the most of it. Since they knew better than the mäestro both the extent of their own personal means, and the possibilities of solfeggio in general, with all the finesses of the trade, by which it succeeds in winning over the public, it soon resulted that a large space in the composition of an opera was allotted to them. What they received from the mäestro as cantilena, they returned to him in embellishments or floriture and bravura passages. Scarcely were they in possession of the most indispensable part of song, when the luxury of passages announced itself; which we may see from the Orontea of CESTI, where we find such in the first theatre airs ever composed.

This growing preponderance of the interests of execution over the united interests of the score and the libretto had with the Italians the inevitable consequences of their superiority in the art of singing, which they created, in which they so early distinguished themselves, and which they so passionately loved. It perfectly explains the fate of Opera in their land.

The melodists of the seventeenth and at the beginning of the eighteenth century had to deal with singers, who were yet children and scarcely knew the A B C of the bravura. So far from submitting to their influence, they on the contrary formed them by their instruction and examples. They were the masters in every thing; they freely followed their own inspirations as intelligent and creative artists, and indeed the more so since the Italian music had not yet those settled forms, which have since so distinguished it and set a national stamp upon it. Besides a beautiful song, the mäestri could show their cleverness in other respects, in the accompaniments, the choruses and duetts; for we must remark that STRADELLA, CARISSIMI, SCARLATTI, and after them the immortal LEONARDO LEO, were good melodists, as well as learned harmonists and contrapuntists. They were complete men for their times. Hence, in spite of their venerable age, they have retained a youthful aspect, and even to-day serve for the admiration of artists and the study of musicians.

But these great melodists neglected a very essential part of song; we mean the Rhythmo-poëia or measure. Their vocal phrases, contracted and as it were isolated from one another by too frequent cadences,* lacked symmetry, and did not fit themselves to periods. Just so it was with the arias as a whole. The scholars of SCARLATTI and of LEO remedied this defect; they gave to the vocal sentence the development, which it required; they divided the aria into two parts; they introduced the da capo or repetition of the first part; they lengthened out the ritornel at the beginning and end; and the melody grew beautiful with new charms in the works of VINCI, PERGOLESE, HASSE, and a crowd of other distinguished composers, of the brilliant Neapolitan school.

Upon these happy completions, which established the dramatic melody in all its rights, a revolution was necessarily consequent, both in the art of music, which they simplified in many respects, and in the art of singing, which they enriched and to which they lent an incalculable importance. The little piecemeal phrases of the old masters still required imitation and a mixture of the fugued style with the operatic pieces, which compelled the singers to a strict and literal execution of the music; in regular, numerous and richly developed periods, however, imitative forms and an intricate accompaniment were not applicable, or at least seemed not to be. Hence they thought it well to reduce the accompaniment to its simplest harmonic expression. An intelligent and in fact the only just idea. Anything better in this kind at that time would have exceeded the insight as well as the powers of the whole body of living composers. The simplification of the accompaniment,—that was the way to open a free path to the further progress of vocal melody; but on the other hand it left the singers perfectly free play, and founded the dominion of the incidental matter, since on the smooth and elastic basis of a succession of natural chords it enabled the artist to undertake and execute every thing. From that time forward the singers decidedly gained the advantage over the mäestro, and in possession of the privilege of the da capo they became accustomed to consider the score a collection of themes, whose merit depended solely on the variations, which the science, talent and inventive spirit of the performer understood how to attach to them.

* I must here remark, that I always use the word cadence according to its etymology, and understand by it the conclusion, the point of rest to the musical period.

The sort of co-operation, reserved to a singer in the composition of an opera, does not need perhaps to be defined. The singer can and must require to have his means consulted and made available, without injury to other claims, since upon that in a great degree depends the success of the work. In this respect the interests of the composer are closely interwoven with his own, and there can be no conflict between them; a peaceful understanding secures to both their mutual advantages and all goes forward admirably. This union, founded in the nature of things, was soon reversed in Italy. The singers, who as virtuosos became continually greater, the more ignorant they were as musicians, felt themselves all at once strong enough to prescribe to the composers the outline, the intentions, the embellishments, the expansion, the whole economy of a piece of music. They commanded, in a word, as a master commands his journeymen. If one would survey at a glance the consequences of this exchange of parts, he has only to consider what the gracious will of the singer in general represents, who frequently is nothing but a machine, usurping the most important rights of the artist and undertaking the intellectual part of the work. This gracious will represents invariably the taste of the time, the accepted forms, the turns and passages that are willingly listened to, the means which experience has shown to please; it represents the routine and nothing else. For it is a settled case, that inasmuch as the public can desire nothing but that which pleases it, and can be pleased with nothing but what it knows, the singers on their side will constantly prefer an everlasting rumination of that, which is accompanied by infallible applause, to new conceptions, which perhaps do not please, or if they do please, might confer more honor on the composer than on themselves.

I know that the ear is as much a thing of habit, as it is unsteady; the first, because it is easily offended by unwonted impressions; the second, because it is easily wearied by the eternal repetition of one and the same thing. But there were the singers who could satisfy the need of timely innovations much better than the mäestri, without injury to the forms, which routine had gradually consecrated and made in a certain manner national. Since the art of singing was progressive, every generation of virtuosos came along with a stock of ornamental melody, vocal embellishments and bravura pieces, in quantity and quality far surpassing the stock of their predecessors. The composers were compelled to conform to these new conditions. New singers, new music; such was in Italy the rule, to which the intelligent BURNESY subscribes without the least limitation. In this way the opera was manufactured in a great part out of melodic common-places, which never changed, and out of a certain number of unvarying floriture, since it depended on the amount of executive means and the caprices of the fashion. When a prima donna, or a musico of note left the stage or the world, they took with them the collective works of their fame into their places of retirement, or their graves. To wish to publish works of this sort, would therefore have been altogether unnecessary. They copied them, distributed them, either whole or in single numbers, among the dilettanti, so long as they found applause, and they were almost never printed. Before an edition could have been got ready, no one would have cared for them any more. That with these elements and this system of composition music never was fresher, more engaging, more adapted to the passing moment, than that of the Italian opera in the eighteenth century, will readily be comprehended under these circumstances. Always the same, and always new; but therein also lay the reason why this music appears emptier and flatter than that of any other epoch. The fashion of yesterday always appears older than that of a hundred years ago.

But what became of musical Tragedy, of the ancient sorrow, under the dominion of the modern Orpheuses? When Tragedy saw that no one longer thought of her, neither the poet, nor still less the mäestro, least of all the singers, she forsook the lyric stage, scarcely after the prologue to Euridice had invoked her thither, and vowed in her anger never more to set her foot upon the Italian theatre; and faithfully she kept her word. They wished her a happy voyage and put the Opera Seria in her place, which was about as tractable as Tragedy was intractable, being half society and half concert, in which the singers, for the quieting of their consciences, brought forward I know not what erotic and heroic nonsense, while the spectators wandered about from box to box, partook of refreshments, conversed or paid their court to the ladies. But attention! The concert begins. The Soprano enters, announced by a pompous ritornel. The deepest silence ensues, every body listens, and as soon as the number is over, a stormy applause follows, whereupon every one returns to his previous entertainment, which the music has only interrupted for a moment. How naturally mäestro and singers expended their whole power upon the few principal numbers, which made up the whole opera, while the others merely served to fill out the remainder of the musical evening, which lasted very long, and to make the tete-a-tetes, that were carried on, inaudible to the neighbors! Accordingly the mäestro very carelessly prepared arie di sorbetti (airs during which they ate ice-creams), which were assigned to the subordinate subjects, and were always good enough, seeing that nobody listened to them. Hence it comes, that in spite of many beautiful and lovely single numbers, the old Italian repertoire does not contain a single work sustained in such a manner, that the different parts make up a whole of any worth; hence too the extraordinary fruitfulness of the mäestri of that time, some of whom composed as many as two hundred operas, not one of which has outlived its author.

We may with truth then say, that the Italian opera, as a theatrical action or branch of the dramatic art, found itself on the way of decline even before it properly had got to be an opera, since the first castrati who sang upon the stage, were contemporaries of PERI and CACCINI. Is any other proof required, that the Italians never have taken hold of the musical drama, in earnest? The very sight of those heroes and lovers, who were not even men, disturbed even the shadow of illusion and transformed a serious and noble play into a clumsy parody; or, if such creatures sometimes awakened sympathy, it certainly was not the tragic sympathy. I can find no expressions to add to the philanthropic pity of the historians for these unfortunate victims, as they maintain, of music; but I would vindicate music from a reproach, which it is far from deserving. Music was not only innocent of this infamy, but she protested with her whole might against a custom, of which she herself was the first victim. Can we in reality comprehend the advantage or the satisfaction, which the Italians found and still find in giving men's parts to the highest vocal register? To women belong the Soprano and Contralto; to men the Tenor and Bass: that is the natural order, which under all the combinations of the vocal accord is the most advantageous in four-voiced composition, as it is incomparably the most agreeable to the ear. What is gained by setting in the place of an indispensable middle voice another first voice? The gain is for me, I repeat, a mystery; the loss is all too evident. One principal disadvantage lies in this, that the arias of the first subjects are all struck off to the pattern of one voice. A second disadvantage is, that the duets and trios lose in coloring and effect. The tenor is either wanting altogether or it is banished into a subordinate part, where in the ensemble pieces, with the bass, it has to express the rage of tyrants or the feelings of paternal love, and contrary to its nature is excluded from the part of the first lover, which all the dramatic and musical fitnesses point out as its own. This is the third disadvantage, which there is nothing to compensate, for the Tenor is the voice above all others indicated by nature for the expression of love; it is among all sounds, which nature and art can produce, the most exquisite and penetrating. Finally, to complete the measure of disadvantages, the bass voice, that true ground-pillar of harmony, that mighty expression of majestic and terrible parts, is wholly banished from the Opera Seria!! One seeks in vain for the cause of such great musical barbarism and simplicity, since one knows by experience that the finest artificial voices never equal, nor can equal a fine woman's voice, and that, if we must have the one folly or the other, the present practice, of giving the first male part to the alto-ist, is far preferable to that of placing the soprano in the hands of a half man. With some forty years, I am yet old enough to have seen the fair remains of this once so flourishing institution. I have known more than one musico, and among others in Dresden the celebrated SASSAROLI, who in his day perhaps possessed the finest falsetto voice in Europe. I confess, that in the church this voice had an extraordinary effect, because the vast resonance of the place tripled its power and concealed its quality; but in the theatre it sounded almost intolerable; it had, like the voices of almost all castrati, that very strong and sharp falsetto ring. Poor SASSAROLI! I fancy I yet see him before me with the helm of the Curiatii upon his head, and that enormous bulk, that cyclopean build, rudis indigestaque moles, measuring the floor with great strides, gesticulating like a gigantic puppet, all the while cooing like a flute hidden in the belly of a contra-basso, and all this against BENELLI (Horatius), the greatest singer and greatest actor next to TALMA, that I ever saw or heard. By a fortunate though strange anomaly, the Italians who could not dispense with the castrati in the Opera Seria, did not, so far I know, admit them into the Opera Buffa, where they would at least have been one buffoonery more.

In consequence of these abuses and these bizarres customs, the music of the Italian theatre had sunk into a kind of formalism, from which it never since has risen. It had assumed a national type, which appeared and still appears to its adherents as the type of perfection.

BLOSSOMS.

BY ROBERT HERRICK.

Fair pledges of a fruitful tree,
Why do ye fall so fast?
Your date is not so past,
But you may stay yet here awhile
To blush and gently smile,
And go at last.

What, were ye born to be
An hour or half's delight,
And so to bid good night?
'Twas pity nature brought ye forth,
Merely to show your worth,
And lose you quite.

For you are lovely leaves, where we May read how soon things have
Their end, though ne'er so brave;
And after they have shown their pride,
Like you, awhile, they glide
Into the grave.

Spohr's Oratorio, "Calvary."

[From the London Times, July 6.]

The last performance of the Sacred Harmonic Society, for the present season, took place yesterday evening. There was a large attendance, in spite of the elections and the unreasonably hot weather. The oratorio was Spohr's Calvary. The composer himself was among the audience, and his appearance was hailed by an unanimous outburst of applause.

Calvary is the second sacred oratorio composed by Spohr. Its first title was Des Heilands Letzte Stunden—in English, The Last Hours of the Saviour. It is a real oratorio—in other words, a sacred musical drama. The incidents are chosen from the life of the Redeemer; the story commences after his betrayal by Judas Iscariot, and terminates with the crucifixion and the events immediately subsequent. Since it would run counter to the religious notions of this country were Jesus made to declaim and sing, as in the original, the English adapter, Prof. Edward Taylor, has put the words of the Savior into the mouth of John, the Apostle, besides making several other alterations to conciliate similar prejudices. Under its new title of Calvary, Spohr's second oratorio was first performed here in 1837, at the Hanover-square Rooms, and afterwards at the Norwich Festival, for which, in 1842, the composer expressly composed his third and last—The Fall of Babylon. Calvary has been less frequently given than either The Last Judgment or The Fall of Babylon, and was never produced by the Sacred Harmonic Society until last night, when it was received with enthusiasm—a tribute to the merits and position of its author.

The oratorio of Calvary is in two parts; the first comprises the betrayal of the Saviour by Iscariot, his trial and condemnation to death; the second includes the crucifixion, the tempest, and the burial. The personages (according to Prof. Taylor's English version) are John and Peter, the Apostles—Judas Iscariot, Mary, Caiaphas, Philo, Nicodemus, Joseph of Arimathea, and witnesses. The choruses are divided among the disciples of Jesus, the Jewish priests and people. The oratorio opens with a short overture, in the fugued style, very grave and learned; the key is C minor, and the principal theme is alternated with a brief chorale. The poetical idea seems to be the strife between the Christian Apostles and the unbelieving Jews. The first chorus "Gentle night" (in A flat), a prayer of the Apostles for Jesus, interspersed with solos, is melodious and beautiful. The horror and despair of Judas, after betraying his master, are powerfully depicted in the next piece, a bass recitative and air (in A minor), "Woe, horror, grief," the peculiarity of the latter being a perpetually moving bass, contrived with the skill of a profound musician. A soprano solo (in the major key), which follows—"Though all thy friends prove faithless," where Mary declares her devotion for the Redeemer, has all the tuneful freshness of Azor and Zemira—one of the earliest and most captivating of the operas of Spohr; the chorus, for female voices, which accompanies it, adds materially to its charm. An air for John (in F sharp minor), "What do I see?" where the apostle describes the oppression of Jesus by the multitude, is gloomy and expressive: and the following song of Peter (in E flat), "Tears of sorrow," in which the cowardly disciple confesses the shame he feels at having denied his master, is equally effective in its way. A very grand chorus of the disciples (in C), "O, thou Eternal God," comes next, and contains a masterly fugue, written in four parts, with perspicuous clearness, and much more sparing of modulation than is the ordinary custom of Spohr in his elaborate pieces. The rest of the first part is comprised in a grand scene, the incidents of which are the arraignment of Jesus, the declarations of the accusing witnesses, the denunciations of the Jewish priests, the intercession of Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea, the impatient fury of the people, the adjuration of the High Priest Caiaphas, the reply and the ultimate condemnation of the Saviour. This is treated in a highly ingenious manner, by means of choruses, solos, and recitatives, in which the latter preponderate so much, however, that (as in the scene of Belshazzar's feast in the Fall of Babylon) the effect of the whole is somewhat prolix. The two choruses of the priests and people—"Shame, shame" (in D minor), and "Upon us be his blood" (in A minor)—are nevertheless, very striking and characteristic; while the anathemas of the priests, during the examination of the witnesses, stand out in bold relief.

The second part opens with a chorus of the disciples, in the same key, and with the same subject, developed at greater length, as the song in the first part, in which John describes Jesus led into captivity. Here Prof. Taylor has made a great mistake in altering the original words, which allude to the "supposed language and demeanor of the priests." Spohr had evidently a direct intention in repeating the music of the air alluded to; but this intention becomes altogether lost in the irrelevant passages from the prophets which the English adapter has substituted. The chorus of the priests and people, "King of Israel" (in G minor) mocking Jesus on the cross, is exceedingly dramatic; and the soprano air for Mary (in A flat), "When this scene of trouble closes," with its effective passages for the horn, and an elegant obligato accompaniment for a solo violin, is one of the melodious gems of the oratorio. Not less beautiful in its way is the trio for female voices (in E), "Jesus, heavenly master," where the vocal part writing, and the orchestral arrangement are equally perfect. The remainder of the second part is included in another grand scene. The prominent incidents are the crucifixion, in which the suffering, meekness, and resignation of Jesus (described by John, in Prof. Taylor's version), are mingled with the prayers of the disciples—the tempest, where the priests and people, awestricken by miraculous appearances, are terrified into contrition—the burial, under the auspices of Joseph of Arimathea—and the apotheosis of Jesus, by the disciples, which brings the oratorio to a conclusion. The plan of this is managed with the utmost skill; but, as in the first part, the recitatives are too lengthy, and the whole is too carefully spun out. The choral description of the tempest, however, (in spite of the palpable allusions to the overture to Guillaume Tell) is very fine; and the final hymn of the disciples (in C major), "Beloved Lord," a broad and magnificent piece of choral writing, is a worthy climax to a great, although unequal work.

The general impression left by the oratorio of Calvary is somewhat monotonous, in spite of its many beauties. Its chief fault is that it contains nothing absolutely new. The composer is prodigal of his mannerism, his orchestration is labored and cloying, his modulation inordinate, his use of chromatic harmony inordinate, and a general want of contrast is felt throughout. A single piece unaccompanied, or merely accompanied by the stringed quartet, would be an exquisite relief; but this is not in Spohr's power; he cannot abandon his darling orchestra, but, by continually showing that he is one of the greatest masters of instrumentation, he ultimately succeeds in proving that he lacks one great secret in the art of applying it. Where almost every piece is full, or nearly full, at the end not one is full enough where fullness is indispensable. The ear becomes satiated, and the mind fatigued, with such an incessant and superfluous display of the riches of harmony and orchestral coloring. It is because we find these peculiarities more strongly developed than in the other two oratorios that we are disposed to pronounce Calvary inferior to The Fall of Babylon, and far inferior to The Last Judgment, the finest of all the sacred compositions of its author, and one of the grandest and most lasting of his musical works. On the other hand, it should not be forgotten that, whatever may be its weaknesses, there is possibly no other living composer capable of writing an oratorio of such magnitude and pretensions. Many of the pieces will most probably live when the oratorio itself is forgotten; and of how few works of the same order, putting aside those of Handel and Mendelssohn, can even as much as this be said!

Song of Caroline Von Gunderode.*

FROM THE GERMAN.

It is all drear and sad;
Nothing more makes me glad;
Odors no odor bring,
Breezes no quickening;
Poor heart, how sad!

All is so still and gone;
Heart and soul left forlorn;
Seeking I know not what,
Resting not, knowing not Whither I'm borne!

One master mould of clay
Stole all my thoughts away;
Since I its beauty felt,
Near me it still hath dwelt,
Mine, though away.

One sound my heart still hears,
One that my spirit cheers;
Soft as a flute, one word
Soundeth on since 'twas heard,
Stoppeth all tears.

Spring's blossoms all are true,
They all come back anew;
Not so doth Love, alack!
That cometh never back,
Fair, but not true!

Can love so love-less be?
Can mine so stay from me?
Joy sit so heavily,
Hugging inconstancy?
Sad bliss for me!

Phoenix of loveliness!
Thou on bold wings dost press
Far to the sun's bright beam;
Little disturbs thy dream
My lone distress!

Her Majesty and Prince Albert were present at the Performance, at the St. James Theatre, of Schiller's Don Carlos, and, to some purpose, as the following story shows, or pretends to show: One of the characters in Don Carlos has occasion to make the remark, "Die Königinnen lieben schlecht" ("Queens make poor sweethearts"); on which (according to the London correspondent) her Majesty leant forward, put her hand on the Prince's arm to attract his attention, and sweetly smiled in his face a denial of Schiller's calumny on female royalty!

MR. JENNISON'S ADDRESS — SCHUMANN'S ALBUM — MARIE WIECK — CHURCH MODES.

—, July 21st.

Will you give Mr. S. Jennison a shake of the hand in my name for his "Music in the Past Half Century"? It delighted me highly. The true spirit. Your criticism pleases me also very much and you will, I hope, take it not ill, when I beg you to go on so and to either overlook trifles of little waltzes, &c., entirely, or at once tell their place in musical literature. Now I do not think it prudent, here, at once to come out with full force upon such poor cripples, as the critics in Germany do, but it would do well perhaps to define in a leader the rank on the scale of musical merit they are entitled to, and then gradually to turn out the rough side. Your criticism on Schumann's "Album" might have been a little longer and more special; but I feel I am too partial to the great, sublime, little thing. It has given me too much pleasure since it came out from heaven down among us earthen mankind, and I love it too dearly, therefore I cannot get tired playing and hearing about these little pieces. Those three marked with * speak to me more of heaven than anything in the book; and then between heaven and earth, connecting both, come those two, Frühlings and Rundgesang; and as representatives of an ideal life in this world there is nothing better than Frolicher Landmann (Happy Farmer) and Erinnerung (Recollection). How strange and expressive that Fremder Mann (Stranger Man) speaks of a village peasant boy's fears and hesitation to approach the stranger that beckons him! And that Knecht Ruprecht, how beautiful! But earth in all its glory has no better expression in the whole book than that Weinlese-zeit, Froliche Zeit (Vintage time, joyous time.) Is it not bacchantic, free and wine-inspired? But why speak about all these things to you, that feel all as fresh as any one!

I have a letter from FRIEDR. WIECK, father of Frau CLARA SCHUMANN and MARIE WIECK. You know that Clara Wieck has been since long considered in Germany as the best of female pianists, and the letter of their father will tell you, that he already thinks Marie superior to her sister.

What do you think of their prospects if they should come here? They are artists of the highest rank. Do you think people will appreciate Marie? I do not; may be in your few large Eastern cities, but what for the entire South, and West, and the interior? They never will employ a Barnum or somebody to sound the trumpet before them; they are too true Artists (and Jenny Lind was she not disgusted with Barnum's doings?) and will never submit to posting up, paying trumpet-sounding agents, &c., &c. And then the piano requires a certain power of fancy, to hear into its tones what you hear out of the singers or the string and even more the wind-instruments, with their full, swelling tones, which the mass of people do not possess. There moreover is scarcely any body south of New York, that takes interest in classical music, and if Marie Wieck plays some Henselt or Liszt or Thalberg it is testimoniū causa — to show off. And then how does she play them!! But hear his letter, of which I give you some extracts:

"Your warm Art-letter from such a distance has rejoiced me, and that, with many others from all parts of Europe, has ripened the determination in me, to go this summer to M., and there complete my Method together with the little Exercises. . . . At home I cannot work upon it, since the young singers, whom I am forming after Jenny Lind's method not to scream and bawl, and my Marie and Cecilie, who already in many pieces, by their noble, broad, fine, free, and highly graceful and correct touch, are far preferred to Clara; besides visits of artists from all quarters, concerts, and the routine of an artistic life, claim all my time. I write these lines from Leipsic, where just now my Marie and my songstress, Fraulein Wölfel have created an enthusiasm, and will continue notwithstanding Sontag's presence. The Neue Zeitung will show you what interesting soirées Marie has been giving in Dresden. W. advises me to go with Marie and Louise Wölfel to America. But is America yet ripe for exhibitions of Art so fine and noble, and which evidently are not of the taking order?"

I am constantly conversing with you about something or other, sometimes even quarrelling. Yes, why do you not revere more the old church modes (Kirchentonarten), and those sublime chorals, that are really more than the stammerings of mankind's childhood? Why, I am exclusive. I say, a believer in the Protestant faith acts or feels inconsequently by singing or admitting of any other church music than the choral, and then, for choir use, the motetts of the masters. The puritanism of the Lutheran can have nothing to do even in music with the pomp, the higher flights of a well fed fancy or imaginations of the Roman Catholic. S.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 31, 1852.

Gluck and his Operas.

In our last we briefly sketched the early life, through what may be called the Italian period, of the great reformer of the lyric drama, up to the time that he became settled in his new principles of dramatic truth, and illustrated them in the maturity of his powers, at the age of forty-six, in his Alceste and Orfeo. A. D. 1761-64. We copied his own statement of these principles in his epistle dedicatory prefixed to the Alceste. It seems, however, that these works were far from universally appreciated, though he had the court and powerful amateurs enthusiastically on his side. Of this he complains in another preface, to the Paris et Hélène: "The half-learned, the doctors of taste, i buongustai, a race unfortunately too numerous, and at all times a thousand-fold more fatal to the progress of the arts than are the ignoramuses, have declared against my method, which, should it become established, would annihilate their pretensions.

"They have thought it possible to pronounce upon Alceste after informal rehearsals, badly directed and still more badly executed; they have calculated in a room the effect this opera might produce in a theatre: with about the same sagacity that some men once, in a city of Greece, wanted to judge at a few feet distance of the effect of statues made to be placed upon tall columns. One of these delicate amateurs, who have put all their soul into their ears, finds an air forsooth too rough, or a passage too hard or unprepared, without thinking that in the situation, this air, this passage, are the sublime of expression and form the happiest contrast."

"The traits which distinguish Raphael from the crowd of painters, are in some sort insensible; slight alterations in the contours will not destroy the resemblance in a head in caricature, but they will disfigure entirely the face of a beautiful person; I want no other proof than my aria of Orpheus: Che faro senza Euridice? Make the least change there, whether in the movement or in the turn of expression, and this air will become a mere puppets' tune. In a work of this kind, a note more or less sustained, an alteration in force or movement, an appoggiatura out of place, a trill, a passage, a roulade, may ruin the effect of an entire scene. So when a work made according to my principles is to be performed, the presence of the composer is, so to say, as necessary as the sun is to the works of nature; he is the soul and life of it; without him all is chaos and confusion," &c., &c.

This last idea, as well as that of making music the handmaid of poetry (see first letter) have been pushed to the extreme by the modern more than Gluck (as Liszt would have it), Richard Wagner, who has kindled up such a war between the musical conservatives and radicals in Germany. Of him hereafter.

In 1765, Gluck wrote the music of an opera, now forgotten, for the marriage of the emperor Joseph II.; in which the archduchess Amalia sang the part of Apollo; the other archduchesses, Elizabeth, Josephine and Charlotte represented the three Graces; and the archduke Leopold sat at the clavichord. He attempted also one or two comic operas, without much success.

He knew that in France dramatic truth was more considered than on the Italian or German stage: and he chose the Iphigenia of Racine as "the fittest subject for the uniting all the interest of tragedy to the grand effects of an impassioned and dramatic music." He finished it the same year at Vienna and got a friend, attached to the French legation, to write to the administration of the Opera at Paris and procure him an engagement to produce it there. The letter, which entered into some details of Gluck's system, was published in the Mercur, and became the signal of the great war between the Gluck-ists and the Piccinists. There was opposition to his coming, but through the influence of Maria Antoinette, he was at length invited and the first representation of the Iphigenia in Aulis at the Opera took place on the 19th April, 1774. Gluck was then sixty years old. The effect was prodigious. This was followed by the Orfeo and the Alceste, rearranged to Italian words and to a fuller conformity with his new principles. The same success. Gluck was now the musician. He was forced to make his rehearsals public; and yet thousands of the curious had to be turned away. The composer himself however conducted as if in perfect privacy on these occasional. Anecdotes are told of his singular whims, his independence, &c., which added quite as much to the piquancy of the rehearsals, as did the novelty of the music. "Grand seigniors and even princes might be seen crowding round him to present him his surtout and his perruque, when it was finished; for he was in the habit of throwing off all that and covering himself with a night-cap, as if he were about retiring to rest."

The lovers of the old French music, of Rameau and Lulli, which was all dramatic action and effect, found Gluck's Iphigenia too Italian; whereas the admirers of the Italian school, of Jomelli and Piccini, which was all melody, all for the singer, found the opposite fault with it. These latter, determined not to yield the field undisputed to this bold innovator, imported PICCINI into Paris and set him to writing rival operas. Then broke out a violent war of parties. The chiefs of the Gluckists were Suard and the Abbé Arnaud, and generally the literary men, who felt their own importance flattered in Gluck's theory. The leading Piccinists were La Harpe, Marmontel, d'Alembert, &c. The fashionable world entered warmly into the dispute. Hot from the theatre, the antagonists renewed the discussion night after night at supper parties. Fétis tells an anecdote of one of the performances of Alceste:

"Mlle. Levasseur played the part of Alceste. When this actress, at the end of the second act, sang that sublime verse: Il me déchire et m'arrache le cœur (He rends me and tears out my heart), some one in the audience cried out: 'Ah! Mademoiselle, you tear out my ears!' His neighbor, transported by the beauty of the passage and the manner in which it was sung, replied: 'Ah! monsieur, how fortunate, if it is to give you a new pair of ears!'"

The merits of this strange controversy will be made more intelligible to our readers in the sequel of the article, which we are translating in the first part of our paper, on the progress of the "Opera before Mozart." Its fury only abated when Gluck finally returned to Vienna in 1780. Meanwhile he had produced, in 1777, his Armida, which only slowly made itself appreciated, and his second Iphigenia (in Tauris), which electrified all Paris at once by its marvellous dramatic power. Gluck was sixty-five years old when he wrote it! His rival Piccini had written an opera on the same subject; but, in spite of many beauties, it is said to have borne no comparison with that of Gluck.

Gluck died, by apoplexy, at Vienna on the 25th of November, 1787, leaving his heirs a fortune of 600,000 francs. A true instinct led him to the French stage, as the true field for his genius, so essentially dramatic. In Italy and even in Germany, where the pleasure found in Opera was a purely musical pleasure, it was many years before he was appreciated. The poet WIELAND was one of the first of his countrymen to do him justice. He wrote of him as follows: "Smitten by one of the most beautiful of the maxims of Pythagoras, he has preferred the Muses to the Sirens; he has substituted for vain and false ornaments that noble and precious simplicity which, in the arts as in letters, has ever been the characteristic of the true, the beautiful and the sublime." At this day Germany, at least with the exception of Vienna, which seems to have been over and over again Italianized, holds the RITTER GLUCK in veneration only second to that paid to Bach and Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, and it is common to speak of him as the father of the true lyric drama.

Gluck's principles, sound as they are in the main, are open to criticism, especially in the matter of subordinating music too much to a mere illustration of the words. In his own operas, this notion necessarily broke very often the musical flow and unity of the whole. It was a sacrifice of musical to dramatic form; whereas the operas of Mozart, who was the very incarnation of music, while they are abundantly dramatic, are at the same perfectly musical. The question of the true relation of music to poetry is raised anew by the extravagant positions of Richard Wagner; and as he has pushed Gluck's doctrines to the extremest limit, we shall find in him, when we come to notice him more fully, all the negative criticism which Gluck's principles require. Meanwhile we conclude this sketch with an extract from the musical reminiscences of the English actor and singer, Michael Kelly, who met Gluck in his old days in Vienna:

"A number of foreign Princes, among whom were the Duc de Deux Ponts, the Elector of Bavaria, &c., with great retinues, came to visit the Emperor, who, upon this occasion, signified his wish to have two grand serious operas, both the compositions of Chevalier Gluck, — L'Iphigenia in Tauride, and L'Alceste, produced under the direction of the composer; and gave orders that no expense should be spared to give them every effect.

"Gluck was then living at Vienna, where he had retired, crowned with professional honors, and a splendid fortune, courted and caressed by all ranks, and in his seventy-fourth year.

"L'Iphigenia was the first opera to be produced, and Gluck was to make his choice of the performers in it. Madame Bernasconi was one of the first serious singers of the day, — to her was appropriated the part of Iphigenia. The celebrated tenor, Ademberger, performed the part of Orestes, finely. To me was allotted the character of Pylades, which created no small envy among those performers who thought themselves better entitled to the part than myself, and perhaps they were right; — however, I had it, and also the high gratification of being instructed in the part by the composer himself.

"One morning, after I had been singing with him, he said, 'Follow me up stairs, Sir, and I will introduce you to one, whom, all my life, I have made my study, and endeavored to imitate.' I followed him into his bed-room, and, opposite to the head of the bed, saw a full-length picture of Handel, in a rich frame. 'There, Sir,' said he, 'is the portrait of the inspired master of our art; when I open my eyes in the morning, I look upon him with reverential awe, and acknowledge him as such; and the highest praise is due to your country for having distinguished and cherished his gigantic genius.'

"L'Iphigenia was soon put into rehearsal, and a corps de ballet engaged for the incidental dances belonging to the piece. The ballet-master was Monsieur De Camp, the uncle of that excellent actress, and accomplished and deserving woman, Mrs. Charles Kemble. Gluck superintended the rehearsals, with his powdered wig, and gold-headed cane; the orchestra and choruses were augmented, and all the parts were well filled.

"The second opera was Alceste, which was got up with magnificence and splendor, worthy an Imperial Court.

"For describing the strongest passions in music, and proving grand dramatic effect, in my opinion, no man ever equalled Gluck — he was a great painter of music; perhaps the expression is far fetched, and may not be allowable, but I speak from my own feelings, and the sensation his descriptive music always produced on me. For example, I never could hear without tears, the dream of Orestes, in Iphigenia, when in sleep, he prays the gods to give a ray of peace to the parried Orestes. What can be more expressive of deep and dark despair? — And the fine chorus of the demons who surround his couch, with the ghost of his mother, produced in me a feeling of horror, mixed with delight.

"Dr. Burney (no mean authority) said, Gluck was the Michael Angelo of living composers, and called him the simplifying musician."

Mlle. LEHMANN. We have already spoken of the anticipated visit to America of this young Danish cantatrice, the sister of Mr. Lehmann of the Quintet Club. By permission of Mr. Ryan, we copy now a portion of a letter to him, written by our townsman, C. C. PERKINS, Esq., who had the pleasure of hearing Mlle. L. last summer in Copenhagen.

"You ask me to tell you if F. and I heard much music during our delightful tour in the North of Europe last summer. To this I must answer no; for we were out of season to hear even the little music which other months bring, to thaw out those frozen regions. What we did hear gave us great pleasure, and I shall always retain a most grateful recollection of the agreeable evening spent at Lehmann's house in Copenhagen, where we heard his sister, Mlle. Lehmann sing. Mlle. Lehmann has an engagement at the opera house in her native city, and as that establishment was closed at the period of our visit, we could not otherwise have had the pleasure of hearing her. Her whole appearance is prepossessing, and her manners graceful and pleasing. She is besides this very obliging and sang to us the whole evening, in many kinds of music, showing the varied range of her "repertoire." We had the grand Scena, Prayer and Aria from the Freyschütz, given with fine power and sentiment, and in many songs of Lindblad and Mendelssohn, Mlle. Lehmann showed us that her feeling and rendering of the graceful and pathetic in music were equal to her appreciation of the sublime and terrible.

"Her voice is a mezzo soprano of great compass, very true in intonation, and charming in quality. Of course in a small room it is difficult to judge of the effect she might produce in the opera house or concert room, but one can be sure of the presence of fine artistical qualities, leaving a lasting impression on all those who like ourselves may have had the opportunity of hearing Mlle. Lehmann."

Musical Review.

Moore's Irish Melodies, with Symphonies and Accompaniments by Sir JOHN STEVENSON. Boston: Oliver Ditson. Quarto. pp. 200.

Here we have them, the beautiful old songs, the favorites, complete; — elegantly printed, elegantly bound, with a well-engraved portrait of "Tom Moore," a brief memoir of his life and an account of the origin and composition of the songs. It is perhaps the best edition ever published, and certainly the cheapest, the price of the volume being but three dollars. The "Irish Melodies" originated in "a desire to secure in one collection, and in a form that might not pass away, the numerous National Airs known among the wild and beautiful scenery of Ireland." Of the arranger of the music, Stevenson, Moore himself says in a letter:

"Through many of his own compositions we trace a vein of Irish sentiment, which points him out as peculiarly suited to catch the spirit of his country's music. In those airs which he has arranged for voices, his skill has particularly distinguished itself; and though it cannot be denied that a single melody most naturally expresses the language of feeling and passion, yet, often when a strain has been dismissed, as having lost its charm of novelty for the ear, it returns, in a harmonized shape, with new claims on our interest and attention; and to those who study the delicate artifices of composition, the construction of the inner parts of these pieces must afford, I think, considerable satisfaction. Every voice has an air to itself, a flowing succession of notes, which might be heard with pleasure, independently of the rest, — so artfully has the harmonist, (if I may thus express it) gavilled the melody, distributing an equal portion of its sweetness to every part."

Here they are all! Great favorites they have been, sweet spiritual visitants in many a household, and perhaps the first revelation of the power of melody to the childhood of many of us; though lately, in our middle age, they have been almost supplanted and made obsolete by the fashionable arias of Italian opera, by the romantic German songs, and by the popular "Negro Melodies." But they belong to the genuine, undying people's music, and it is well to gather up their notes in a convenient, nice form and make them common. They must not and they cannot be forgotten. We have but to glance over a few of their titles to find that we are reopening whole charmed volumes of memory. "Erin, the tear," and "The Harp that once thro' Tara's Halls," and "The meeting of the Waters," and "Love's Young Dream," and "the Young May Moon:"—these, to name no more, are sure suggestions of some of the most sweetly sad and some of the merriest hours in the not wholly buried past of thousands of us, old and young.

Eva's Parting. Words by MARY A. COLLIER.
Music by F. JAMES. Geo. P. Reed & Co.

Every music publisher must have his "Little Eva" song just now; and all the minor composers are as busy on this theme, as if it were the one point of contact for the time being with the popular sympathies. Verily "Uncle Tom's Cabin" has much to answer for, in calling forth such a rank crop of musical weeds. For these things seek the sun, not by virtue of their music, but by virtue of their titles, and so make music play a slavish part.

The piece before us, however, is better than most of them. It is a pure, simple, unpretending melody, with some character, well adapted and well arranged.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

THE GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY have engaged the new Boston Music Hall for a series of ten evening concerts, commencing with the first Saturday after the hall is opened, (probably about the middle of November;) also for every Wednesday afternoon during the winter.

THE SUMMER AFTERNOON CONCERTS will be suspended for the present, until Wednesday, Sept. 8th, the day having been changed on account of the rehearsals of the Musical Fund Society. Tickets remaining out retain their value.

The musicians do well to allow themselves some weeks in these dog-days, for the recreation of their powers. They have worked long and hard in the public service, and no class of persons more need or deserve a portion of man's natural birthright, which is one of God's best blessings, the privilege of free and genial intercourse with nature. The music will be all the better in the autumn.

Last week, the overture to Iphigenia was again played, with increased delicacy of light and shade, and increased appreciation of it on the part of the audience. Schubert's Eloge des Larmes, too, as arranged by Mr. Suck, was very beautiful. Truly Franz Schubert had the divine gift of melody, thoroughly German as he is in his harmonies. The other overture, new to us, though old in fact, by the Ritter Seyfried, was by no means uninteresting; and the set of Labitzky waltzes were nothing less than luscious in their luxury of instrumentation.

Yesterday afternoon's programme, (the last for the present,) was equally rich and choice, embracing Rossini's overture to Otello, a couple of the little "Album" pieces of Robert Schumann, and the first and second movements of Mozart's last Symphony, commonly called the "Swan" (so said the programme); besides waltzes, brass music, &c.

The little orchestra has made a decided success, improving steadily through eight weeks in the quality of its performance, and introducing a Boston audience in that time to quite a catalogue of the best kind of music, hitherto unknown to most of us. In taking leave of them for the present, we have only two hopes to express: (1.) That they will on no account fail to renew these pleasures in September, and if possible with an increased force, at least of one or two instruments; and (2.) That the ambiguous and perplexing name of "Germania Serenade Band" may be exchanged for a better.

MME. SONTAG'S Secretary, Mr. E. B. Ullmann, called on us a few days since, confirming the report of her intention to sail for this country in the latter part of August, after singing a few nights at Her Majesty's Theatre. Mme. Sontag will commence her concerts in New York in the latter part of September. She is to be accompanied by Mr. CHARLES ECKERT, late sub-director of the Italian Opera in Paris, as her director, and probably by Sig. LUCHESE, a distinguished tenore, Sig. FERRANTI, the baritone, from Her Majesty's, and Mlle. ROSA KASTNER, who is one of the first female pianists of the day.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. Rossini's Otello was given on the 6th, with nearly the same cast as last year, Sig. GALVANI as Rodrigo being the novelty. The Times finds in him the common fault of young singers, that of singing at times so loud as to damage the quality of his voice, but otherwise accords him high praise.

The Desdemona of Grisi, the Otello of Tamberlik, and the Iago of Ronconi, are among the most finished performances of the operatic stage. The three popular artists were never more completely themselves. Grisi's voice was as fresh and strong, her energy as overpowering, and her acting as full of tenderness and passion, as ever; Ronconi endowed the character of Iago with a force and individuality of which the author of the libretto was perfectly guiltless; and Tamberlik, in Otello, exhibited the vigor, manliness, and romantic bearing which so well become the part. The great effects of the performance were the finales to the first and second acts, where Grisi was the prominent feature—the duet between Otello and Iago, in which Tamberlik and Ronconi rivalled each other in repeated displays of vocal excellence, and the former, at the end of the cabaletta, "L'ira d'avverso fato," gave his famous C sharp in alt (a note possessed by no other tenor) with a power and resonance that electrified the audience, and elicited a unanimous encore—and the duet of the last act, in which the acting and singing of Grisi and Tamberlik were equally beyond reproach. The scene in which Otello kills Desdemona, and then stabs himself, was admirably managed by both artists, and brought down the curtain with the loudest applause, followed by a double recall for Grisi and Tamberlik.

The first act of the Barbiere (with Mario, Ronconi, Tagliafico and Castellan) succeeded Otello and protracted the performance till nearly one hour after midnight.

Spohr's Faust was to be given on the 13th.

HER MAJESTY'S. Lumley has succeeded in engaging SONTAG for a few nights previous to her sailing for America. This may prove an offset for many discomforts.

The Athenæum says of BASSINI in Maria di Rohan:

"His voice seemed more strained and uneven in the lachrymose cantabiles of Donizetti than it was in the more animated melodies of 'Il Barbiere,'—while the want of neatness in his phrasing and his mistaken method of taking breath became doubly evident in movements permitting the performer to slacken tempo, to pause, and to exaggerate tone and accent for the sake of intense tragical expression. But we have long felt that, let the music essayed be ever so antipathetic, a real singer will therein show himself a singer; and thus we are not surprised at change of occupation failing to metamorphose Signor de' Bassini into a complete or an accomplished vocal artist. As an actor his effects were confined to the last scene alone. This he gave with that extreme Italian passion which stops at nothing,—careless if the play of features become grimace, or the impassioned gesture verge upon grotesque caricature. Much as we relish this for its earnestness—for that very courage which does not pause to consider when 'the rapids are near,'—we feel that in 'Maria di Rohan' Signor de' Bassini merely presented one burst of rage and jealousy, such as might belong to 'Parasina,' and half a dozen other historical or brigand Italian stories,—and that he never touched the French noble of the ancien régime, so wondrously conceived and executed by Signor Ronconi. In his Chevreuse the tragedy is made tremendous by the courtly framework in which it is set;—the catastrophe becomes all the more fearful for its breaking out in the midst of a society polished, ironical,—but half sincere. Thus, while we do not question the new comer's force of dramatic execution, we have yet to learn whether he possesses the actor's highest gift—variety and fineness of conception. In a London Opera-house we cannot imagine Signor de' Bassini to be generally as serviceable as Signor Colletti—taking acting and singing in combination."

Mr. Lumley, it is said, will retire at the close of the present season, and henceforth devote himself singly to the Parisian branch of his enterprise. The French Government have lately increased the subvention of the Opera, and it is even said, means to indemnify him for the heavy loss which he sustained from the ruinous influence of the political events of the last two years in Paris.

ROYAL ACADEMY CONCERTS. The object of these has been to exhibit the students of the Academy as singers, players and composers. The last for the season took place July 3d, when were performed a MS. overture ("Merry Wives of Windsor") by T. B. Gilbert; another ("The Water Nymph") by O'Leary, and Macfarren's Cantata ("Leonora"), besides a variety of pieces vocal and instrumental, to show the executive proficiency of of the pupils, which, according to the Athenæum was not what it ought to have been, and utterly incompetent to the rendering of the "desperate and difficult crudities of such a work as Leonora."

BRITISH SCHOOL OF VOCALIZATION. London papers speak highly of this attempt of Mr. French Flowers, to establish a true school of singing. Mr. F. maintains that the voices of the English are as beautiful as those of foreigners, when properly cultivated. He lately gave an exhibition, with twenty-four of his pupils, who performed selections from the most admired classic operas. Casta Diva, Non mi dir from Don Giovanni, &c., were sung with élat.

HANDEL'S ORATORIOS. J. A. Novello has just completed in numbers the vocal score, with organ or piano forte accompaniment, of "Solomon," uniformly with the beautiful and cheap editions of the "Messiah," "Creation," &c., for which there is already a considerable sale in the United States.

MADAME AND HERR GOFFRIE'S Annual Concert took place at Willis's Rooms. The pieces played by Madame Goffrie were Beethoven's surpassingly beautiful sonata No. 3, dedicated to Haydn; the Andante con Variazioni, from the same author's magnificent Kreutzer Sonata; and Schullhoff's well-known piano forte version of the Carnival of Venice. The fair pianiste executed the whole of the Haydn Sonata by heart; and this was no easy task, for the work consists of four movements, and is not only very long, but, at the same time, replete with melodic variety, harmonic complexities, and contrapuntal intricacies. . . . Madame G.'s abilities were again most effectively displayed in the air with variations, the violin part of which was exquisitely played by the deservedly renowned Herr Joachim; and she also showed great digital dexterity in Schullhoff's Carnival of Venice for the omission of which, however, we should have felt grateful. Herr Joachim, besides the air with variations, favored us with a very clever romance of his own with piano forte accompaniment, and Bach's vigorous and highly ingenious fugue for violin solo, in G minor. His exhibition of both were most masterly. . . . The vocalists on this occasion were Mme. Falconi, Mlle. Magnier, Miss Ellen Rowland, Mr. Swift, and Herr von Osten. An air by Desanges and a ballad by Frank Mori, were the pieces in which Mme. Falconi and Mrs. Swift exhibited their powers to advantage; and Herr von Osten, a German tenor of continental celebrity, possessing an excellent voice and much musical feeling, made a most favorable impression. — London Post.

PARIS. The Hungarian band, under M. Kalozdy, have been playing at the Théâtre des Variétés.

EMILE PRUDENT, the pianist, has returned from London, intending to devote some months to study and composition previous to another season there.

MEYERBEER has been some days in Paris. The illustrious composer, who is not quite recovered from his last year's illness, will spend the summer at the waters of Spa.

The Théâtre Lyrique is being actively reorganized. A new opera by Adolphe Adam is in rehearsal.

NEW & VALUABLE MUSIC BOOKS

RECENTLY PUBLISHED BY

OLIVER DITSON,....BOSTON.

SPOHR'S GRAND VIOLIN SCHOOL, being an exact reprint of the latest European editions, with all the author's new revisions and improvements. One volume, quarto. Price, $3.

 Among the many peculiar excellencies of this Violin School one is remarkable, that the Elementary Instructions do not precede the practical portion of the work as in other Schools, but are combined therewith; by this union the pupil is enabled to take the Violin in hand at the first lesson; in fact, he should and must then commence with it. The author's knowledge, as observable in his Preface, is no small addition to the truly practical distinctions of this School; his style is simple, clear, noble, and elegant, alike attractive and useful as a standard to the pupil as to the master.

Czerny's Exercises in Velocity. (30 Etudes de la Velocite.) preceded by Nine New Introductory Exercises, and concluded by a New Study on Octaves, (composed expressly for this edition,) for the Piano Forte. From the Nineteenth London Edition, with Notes. By J. A. HAMILTON. In three Numbers. Price of each, 50 cents. Complete in one volume, $1.25.

 Calculated to develop and equalize the fingers, and to insure the utmost brilliancy and rapidity of execution.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION OF
The Seminary Class Book of Music, designed for Seminaries, High Schools, Private Classes, etc., containing Elementary Instructions, Vocal Exercises, Solfegees, and a copious selection of Secular and Sacred Songs, Duets and Trios. By E. L. WHITE and T. BISSELL.

 The above work has been before the public only one year, yet it has become a universal favorite, and is used in all parts of the Union. During the past year every inquiry has been made in order to ascertain in what way it could be improved and made fully equal to the wants of those for whom it is intended, and from suggestions thus obtained the publisher has been induced to add to and in other ways improve it. It is now pronounced to be exactly what is wanted, and as such it is offered to the public.

The above books can be obtained in large or small quantities of the publisher, 115 Washington St., and of music dealers and booksellers generally throughout the United States and Canada. 7 tf

HENRIETTA SONTAG.

[Translated for this Journal, from the French of P. SCUDO.]

HENRIETTA SONTAG was born at Coblenz on the 13th of May, 1805, of one of those families of nomadic actors, of which Goethe has given us the poetical history in his Wilhelm Meister. Born, like the halcyon, on the stormy waves, she early knew the vicissitudes and trials of an artist life. When only six years old, she made her début at Darmstadt, in an opera very popular in Germany, the "Daughter of the Danube," where, in the part of Salome she was admired for the infantile graces of her person, and the correctness of her voice. Three years later, having lost her father, Henrietta, with her mother, went to Prague, where she played children's parts under the direction of Weber, then at the head of the theatre orchestra. Her precocious success obtained for her, by most especial favor, permission to follow the courses of the Conservatoire in that city, although she had not yet reached the age required by the rules. There, for four years, she studied vocal music, the piano and the elements of vocalization. The indisposition of the prima donna of the theatre gave her an opportunity, for the first time, to undertake a rather important rôle, that of the princess of Navarre in Boieldieu's "John of Paris." She was then fifteen. The facility of her voice, her budding beauty, the trouble which made her heart full of mysterious presentiments, achieved her a success, which augured well for the future of her talent.

From Prague, Henrietta Sontag went to Vienna, where she met Mme. Mainvielle-Fodor, whose example and good counsels developed the happy tendencies she had received from nature. Singing alternately in German and Italian opera, she could try her powers in both of these so different languages, and give herself time to choose between the glittering caprices of the Italian music and the sober and profound accents of the new German school. Being offered an engagement at the German Opera in Leipsic, in 1824, she went to that focus of philosophical and literary discussions, and there acquired a great fame by the manner in which she interpreted the Frey-schütz and Euryanthe of Weber.

The admirers of this great musician's genius were composed of the youth of the universities and of all the ardent and generous souls who wished to redeem Germany from foreign dominion, as well in the realm of the imagination as in that of politics; they shouted with enthusiasm the name of Fraulein SONTAG, which spread through all Germany as that of a virtuoso of the first order, called to renew the marvellous things of Mara. It was at Leipsic that Mara, that famous German singer of the end of the 18th century, had been educated under the care of old professor Hiller. They felt obliged to Mlle. Sontag for consecrating a magnificent organ and a vocalization, far from common that side of the Rhine, to the rendering of the strong and deep music of Weber, of Beethoven, of Spohr and of all the new German composers who had broken all truce with foreign impiety, and given full scope to the genius of their country. Surrounded with homage, celebrated by all the beauux esprits, sung by the students and escorted by the huzzas of the German press, Mlle. Sontag was called to Berlin, where she made her début with immense success at the theatre of Königsstadt. It was at Berlin, it will be remembered, that Der Freyschütz was represented for the first time, in 1821. It was at Berlin, that Protestant, rationalist city, the centre of an intellectual and political movement which sought to absorb the activity of Germany at the expense of Vienna, the Catholic city, where reigned the spirit of tradition, the sensuality, the breeze and the facile melodies of Italy; it was at Berlin, we say, that the new school of dramatic music, founded by Weber, had found its fulcrum. Mlle. Sontag was enthusiastically received there, as an inspired interpreter of the national music. The Hegelian philosophers made her the subject of their learned commentaries, and in her limpid and sonorous voice they hailed the blending of the subjective with the objective in an absolute unity! The old king of Prussia received her at the court with a paternal kindness. There it was, that diplomacy found occasion to approach Mlle. Sontag and to lay siege to the heart of the Muse.

Availing herself of leave of absence, Mlle. Sontag came at length to Paris and made her début at the Italian theatre, on the 15th of June, 1826, in the rôle of Rosina, in the "Barber of Seville." Her success was brilliant, especially in Rode's variations, which she introduced in the second act during the singing lesson. [An example followed by Mme. de la Grange of late in London. —Tr.] This success was confirmed and even increased in the Donna del Lago and the Italiana in Algieri, in which she had to transpose several passages written for a contralto. On her return to Berlin she was received with redoubled interest. In that city she remained till the end of the year 1826; then, abandoning Germany and the school which had brought her up in the depths of its sanctuary, she came to fix her abode in Paris. She began with the rôle of Desdemona in Otello, on the 2d January, 1828. She made one of that constellation of admirable artists, who at that time charmed Paris and London, and among whom Pasta, Pisanoni, Malibran and Sontag shone as stars of the first magnitude.

Between these two last cantatrici, differing so greatly in their kinds of merit, one of those fruitful rivalries declared itself, of which Hoffman has given us such a dramatic picture. This rivalry was pushed so far between the imperious Juno and the blonde Venus, that they could not meet in the same saloon. On the stage, when they sang in the same opera, whether it were Don Juan or Semiramide, their heroic jealousy revealed itself in killing cadenzas and vocal Cougreve rockets which set the audience on fire. Now the Trojans, and now the Greeks carried it. The parterre rose and subsided like the waves of the sea under the Olympic deities. Finally, one day, Mme. Malibran and Mlle. Sontag having to sing a duet in a princely house, the blending of these two voices, so different in timbre and in character of expression, produced such an effect, that the success of the two great singers brought about their reconciliation. From that time a calm reigned sul mare infido.

But in the midst of these successes and these festivals of Art, a black speck rose on the horizon; diplomacy was secretly at work; its protocols grew threatening and it was suddenly learned that Mlle. Sontag was about to quit the theatre for duties more austere. A year since she had formed a private union with count Rossi, who was not disposed to share his happiness. She had adieu to the Parisian public in a performance for the benefit of the poor, which took place at the Opera in January, 1830. Returning to Berlin, at the instance of her friends and numerous admirers, she consented to give a few more representations, and then quitted the stage definitively two months before the revolution of July. But, before accepting the new rôle which she had chosen for life, before despoiling herself of the brilliant fame which she had so justly acquired, Mlle. Sontag made a tour to Russia, giving concerts, as brilliant as they were remunerative, at Warsaw, Moscow, St. Petersburg, and then at Hamburg and other important cities of Germany.

It was after this tour that, under the name of Madame the Countess of Rossi, following the fortunes of her husband, she passed several years in succession at Brussels, at the Haye, at Frankfort and at Berlin, letting her voice be heard only in the reunions of that high European society, which the revolution of February shook to its foundations.

Mlle. Sontag possessed a soprano voice of very great extent, of great equality of timbre, and of marvellous flexibility. In the upper octave, from the medium C to C above the staff, that voice rang deliciously like a silver bell, and you had never to fear a doubtful intonation, or a want of equilibrium in its prodigious exercises. This rare flexibility of organ was the result of the munificence of nature, fructified by incessant and well-directed labors. Until her arrival at Vienna, where she had occasion to hear the great virtuosos of Italy, she had been guided only by her happy instinct and by the more or less enlightened taste of her public. It was to the counsels of Mme. Mainvielle-Fodor, and still more to the example which the exquisite talent of that admirable singer daily offered her, that Mlle. Sontag owed the expansion of those native qualities, which, until then, had remained as it were shut up in the bud. The competition with rivals like Mmes. Pisaroni and Malibran, those heroic combats which she had to sustain on the theatres of Vienna, Paris and London, perfected her talent to that degree of savory maturity, which has made Mlle. Sontag one of the most brilliant singers of Europe.

In the magnificent casket of vocal gems which Mlle. Sontag displayed every night before her admirers, we especially remarked the limpidity of her chromatic gamuts and the brilliancy of her trills, which sparkled like rubies on a velvet ground. Each note of those long descending spirals stood out as if it had been struck isolatedly and attached itself to the following note by an imperceptible and delicate solder; and all these marvels were accomplished with a perfect grace, never disfiguring her countenance by the slightest sign of effort. Her charming figure, her fine limpid and soft eyes, her elegant form and her stature, springing and supple as the stem of a young poplar, finished the picture and completed the enchantment.

Mlle. Sontag tried her power in every kind. Born in Germany at the commencement of this stormy century, she was nourished on the vigorous and powerful music of the new German school, and obtained her first successes in the master-pieces of Weber. At Paris, she undertook successively the parts of Desdemona, of Semiramis, and of Donna Anna in Mozart's chef-d'œuvre. In spite of the enthusiasm, which she seems to have excited in her countrymen by her manner of rendering the dramatic inspiration of Weber, (an enthusiasm, of which we find the echo in the works of Louis Boerne); in spite of the brilliant qualities she has displayed in the part of Desdemona, and above all in that of Donna Anna, which was almost imposed upon her by the jealousy of Malibran, it is in the light music and in the temperate style that Mlle. Sontag found her true superiority. Her Rosina in the "Barber," her Ninette in La Gazza Ladra, her Amenaide in Tancredi, and her Elena in the Donna del Lago, have been her finest triumphs.

The cry of pathos could not escape from those fine lips, where shone the voluptuous morbidezza and the half smile of grace; the explosion of sentiment never came to alter the pure lines of her face, nor to tinge with purple that skin, white and smooth as satin. No, in that elegant body, which fled before the eager gaze like a light vapor, nature had not deposited creative germs. The electric spark, in traversing that placid heart, never lit up there the divine fire and never engendered the magnificent tempests of passion. Behold why Mlle. Sontag consented to bow her charming head under the hymeneal yoke and to descend from a throne, to which she had been raised by the omnipotence of talent, to become the countess of Rossi. Who knows but that bitter regrets have since come to trouble the repose which she promised herself? Who knows but that Madame, the Ambassador's wife, in the midst of the glooms of greatness, has cast a melancholy look upon the beautiful years of her youth, when a whole nation of admirers crowned her with roses and immortals? Have not M. Auher and M. Scribe, in their pretty opera, l'Ambassadrice, told us the story of Mlle. Sontag becoming the countess of Rossi?

The voice of Mme. Sontag is well preserved. If the lower chords have lost their fulness and grown dull a little under the hand of time, as it always happens with soprano voices, the upper notes are still full of roundness and of charm. Her talent is almost as exquisite as it was twenty years ago; her vocalization has lost nothing of the marvellous flexibility that characterized it then; and without much effort of imagination one finds again to-day, in Mme. Sontag, the finish, the charm, the tempered and serene expression, which distinguished her among the eminent cantatrici, who have been the marvel of Europe for the last half century. Welcomed with distinction by a select public, which assembled at the report of her glory and of her misfortune, Mme. Sontag has sung several pieces of her old repertoire with great success.

Among these pieces, we may especially remark the variations of Rode, a sort of melodic canvass brought into fashion by Mme. Catalani, and upon which Sontag has embroidered the most ingenious and most adorable arabesques. An ascending scale, shot on the wing and passing before the bewildered ear like a ribbon of fire, has excited the liveliest transports.

In her second, third and fourth concerts, the success of Mme. Sontag was still more decisive. Let us add, moreover, that time, which seems to have passed lightly over this charming singer, has not brought her what God alone can give to his elect: the accent of the heart. Sometimes, however, there escapes from the limpid voice of Mme. Sontag a reflection as it were of the German sentimentality, which colors her sweet melopœia and gives it a more penetrating flavor.

Germany, which has produced so many glorious geniuses in instrumental music and such excellent artists for all instruments, has been much less happy in the lyric drama and the art of singing. Excepting Mozart, who is a miracle of Providence; excepting some composers of the second order, such as Winter, who were inspired by Mozart and the Italian school, the German operas have been conceived after a system which does not allow the human voice to display all its magnificences. Thus the singers born beyond the Rhine, whose reputation has crossed the boundaries of their own nationality, are extremely rare. Mme. Mara (Schmaeling), who was born at Cassel in 1747, and who died in Livonia on the 20th of January, 1833, at the age of eighty-four years, was the only German cantatrice, before Mme. Sontag, who enjoyed a European fame.

* * * * *

The celebrated singers of the nineteenth century may be ranged in three very different groups. In one would be found those who have shone chiefly by the expression of energetic sentiments and by elevation of style, like Mme. Pisaroni, Mme. Pasta and Mme. Malibran. In another we should remark those marvellous sirens who have evaporated in a burst of laughter, full and radiant; such as the Marcolini, Mme. Persiani and many others. It is between these two extreme groups that we would place Mme. Mainvielle-Fodor, Mme. Damoureau and Mme. Sontag, who have had all the seductions of grace and of a rich vocalization, without possessing either the entraînement of passion, or the facile spontaneity of gaiety. Accordingly these have lived long, because they have never experienced those transports which wear out and consume a poor woman, as a diamond becomes volatile in the crucible of a chemist. We like to imagine Mme. Sontag, clad in a white robe, lending her ear to harmless conversation, as she peacefully traverses a shaded aisle, her bosom decorated with a bouquet of Vergiss-mein-nicht.

OPERA BEFORE MOZART.

[From the "LIFE AND WORKS OF MOZART," by OULIBICHEFF.]

III.

NATIONAL STYLES—ITALIAN, GERMAN AND FRENCH OPERA CONTRASTED—GLUCK.

Every nation, every epoch has its own taste, which it necessarily imparts to the musicians, whom it produces. This taste is in its nature special, and what is special never can be wholly harmonized with the expression of things absolute, as for example the human passions considered in their principle. Hence it follows, that the imitations of dramatic music have commonly only a relative worth, only a passing and local resemblance to objects represented, that is to say, to the feelings of the persons; a resemblance, which on the one hand constantly diminishes with the change in musical taste, and which on the other does not exist at all to a strange audience. The speciality of the taste of the times is a cause why music becomes antiquated, and the speciality of the local taste a cause, which makes it less intelligible and less attractive in localities where a different taste prevails. When one sets out to give the universal language of feeling, he gets no farther than to produce the language of his time or of his hearers. But since the musicians cannot do otherwise, we will see how they contrive, as natives, to please the public and themselves. If one wishes to convince himself, he will find four ways of nationalizing or localizing the score of an opera.

The first and obviously the simplest way, is to bring the music to the mill of the national melody; then the opera becomes entirely national. Certainly, but then two little difficulties are in the way. There are countries, which possess no proper national melody; and then I scarcely know of any national melody, which is adapted to the various expressions of dramatic music, whether serious or comic. The cases, in which popular melodies are applicable to the lyric stage, belong always among the exceptions. Such is the case when the song is given for what it really is in the opera, or when the nationality of a people or an individual forms the subject of the piece. Thus WEIGL has with singular success employed Swiss airs in his opera, Die Schweizerfamilie ("The Swiss Family"), the subject of which is home-sickness. But such exceptions never can become the rule.

A second means of lending a smack of nationality to theatrical music, consists in employing everywhere certain melodic turns, passages, rhythms and forms in the accompaniment, which, without being drawn exactly from a national source, have kept their hold through a silent, but not the less binding understanding between composers, singers and public. Such is the conventional form, which we remark in the old as well as in the new Italian opera.

The third means consists in systematically destroying the balance between the elements of an opera, in favor of one of them. When, for example, the declamation is sacrificed to the melody, the orchestra to the vocal parts, truth to material effect, expression to the bravura and the contrary, any one who knows these exclusive tendencies, who knows in what parts of the same the composers of a nation have distinguished themselves and what parts they are wont to slight, can judge of the music and say: That is French, German, Italian music.

Finally there is yet a fourth means, whose employment tends to make the national coloring most obvious. It consists in lending to the music a character corresponding to any peculiarity, or even to any particularly remarkable weakness, which distinguishes one people from another. We see for example, that what to-day makes the Germans the first musicians, the poetico-metaphysical genius of the nation, so favorable to the sublime inspirations of pure music, does not always lead them so well in the most positive application of this art, I mean the musical drama. We recognize this predominant tendency to the ultra-romantic and the hyper-original in some of their most celebrated operas; in their frequently too much enveloped songs; in intentions, which from their very fineness lose themselves in indefiniteness; in a certain mixture of repose and sentimental dreaminess, which unstrings the very hottest passions of their nature; in a knowledge which is not always very clear, or very dramatic; but every where we meet the stamp of reflection, of true originality and individuality, which marks all the artistic productions of the land.

In France it is quite otherwise, and even the Germans write there in an altogether different style. In the French opera, as it is now constituted, there is an evident striving to appear characteristic, to heighten effect by all means known or possible. Much display, which frequently resembles the mere glitter of gold tinsel; a lavish expenditure of passages and bravura pieces, surpassing even the Italian; an activity of instruments, which goes beyond even the Germans; male parts written in a vocal register, to make a physician shudder; song-parts of an expression in the highest degree French, half chivalric, half gascoigne; a rhythm, which moves or runs in even pace with the country itself; a charlatanism in modulations from one key to another, a multitude of dramatic and very beautiful effects, little depth, almost no originality: — that is what I have fancied I discovered in reading through the works of the most celebrated opera writers of our time.

In Italy the national physiognomy, which from of old has mirrored itself most manifestly in the Opera, lies in dilettantism, in the passion itself for music. As born musicians, connoisseurs in all that concerns execution, neither better nor worse judges of composition than the great mass of the public elsewhere, indifferent to the dramatic development, but on the other hand as distinguished orecchianti (possessors of a musical ear), the Italians desire nothing of an opera but euphony, with a strong dose of noise (which they loved less at one time), fluent roulades, a pleasant tickling of the senses, an intoxicating thrill, a voluptuous warmth. With them the music conforms to the climate. The people of the North, as we know, loved to warm themselves by their glowing sun, and if to-day they cannot leave their homes to seek it, they try to supply this want by the glow of their music.

From our remarks it follows, that of the four modes of indicating the local origin of an opera, all of which can be and are pledges of success with native audiences, there is not one, which in the judgment of a foreign and impartial connoisseur really denotes a fault, an imperfection, or indeed a negation in music. And yet most of the operas, indeed we maintain, all of them, range themselves under some one of these four categories. Moreover there is no branch of art, in which tastes and opinions are so different as in dramatic music, and there is none, which has had so much to suffer from the times. There is only one opera, which rises above all influences of time and local relations, and at an immeasurable height rules the remotest and most splendid regions of unmixed psychology. This no nation can claim as its exclusive property. The text is Italian, the subject Spanish, the composer a German; for one must choose some language wherein to write a theatrical piece, the action must occur in some place and the musician be born somewhere. But as regards the score, the approbation of the world, which agrees in recognizing it as the first masterpiece of the lyric stage, and a half century, which seems only to have enhanced every one of its beauties, have settled it that the score is neither exclusively German, nor Italian, Spanish, Russian nor French. It is universal!

All my readers have named this opera, and while they named it, they will have understood why I touched upon a subject, which does not for a moment interrupt the thread of our historical considerations, because it is essentially connected with the goal to which I am tending. We shall now see what fate awaited the opera in France.

The difference in its fate among the Italians and the French is fully explained by the difference of the two peoples. The first were the most musical people in Europe; the second the best versed in literature of any in the seventeenth century. This fundamental distinction must have reversed the mutual relations between the three classes of producers, from whose coöperation an opera results, and have led each of the two nations to results diametrically opposite.

When the musical drama was introduced into France under Cardinal Mazarin, there was as yet no French music. What LULLI had till then composed, was in about the same genre in which PERI and CACCINI had written, to whom LULLI was superior only in his overtures and his dance airs, which for a long time passed for models in all Europe and which even Italy borrowed of him. But soon the Italians got the start of him; they began to sing, while the French went on psalmodizing, for which we cannot reasonably reproach them. In music they were yet a people in its childhood; they wanted historical antecedents; they possessed neither composers nor singers; and for the little knowledge that was diffused among them, they were indebted to the foreigners, whose debtors they have remained to our day for the sum total of the advances, which have made their lyric-dramatic school illustrious in noble or serious operas. It was the fortune of this school to be born in the lap of barbarism and to remain there for a long time through the want of native talents. When the Italians took that splendid upward flight, which placed them so high in melodic composition and in the art of singing, while it removed them more and more from the conditions of the drama, the French were not able to follow them. As an ingenious people however, they made a virtue of necessity and found a glory in wounding the ear from principle; out of vanity and thirst for distinctions of all kinds, they honored with the name of a national music the newly revived Florentine song-speech, which the Italians had long since given up, and which moreover was no music. But while the French naturalized among them this intolerable reciting manner, they closed a no less loyal compact with the rational principle, which had called the same into life. The idea of the founders of the lyric drama could not become lost in the land of a CORNEILLE and a RACINE, as it did in Italy. Cast upon the then so classic French ground, it lay long buried as a precious seed; at last it sprang up and the harvest turned out all the fairer for the long time they had had to wait for it.

I am firmly convinced that the hearers of the old French opera looked for nothing in it but dramatic excitements and the dance; for, we cannot too often repeat it, the Florentine psalmodizing, or what is scarcely better, the recitative of LULLI and RAMEAU could never have inspired much interest in any one as music. It pleased in France as a sort of strengthening of the effect. Here they were accustomed to the shockingly false screech of the singers; the ear was as yet so uncultivated, that no one was offended by it; and hence this very scream, this urlo Francese (French howl) was received only as the exalted expression of the passions. That musical enjoyment, which the audiences sought not in the dramatic music, but which one cannot quite dispense with in the opera, they found in airs, which were danced to, in which there is always some rhythm and some melody, that is to say, something true and answering to the hearer's power of comprehension. Hence Ballets and Divertissements were always inseparable from musical tragedy. Even to-day they hold fast to these, while the friends of music would gladly dispense with such auxiliary.

The principle of lyric-dramatic truth prevailed thus from the outset in the grand Opera; but foreigners never suspected it, since it was applied in almost as bad a manner as in the time of GIOVANNI BARDI. Foreigners, who understood something of music, did not comprehend this exhibition; they heard nothing but a long, monotonous Jeremiad without melody or rhythm, in which it was impossible to distinguish the recitatives from the arioso, and which was rendered still more intolerable by an ear-splitting execution, a Gothic droning, laughable embellishments, and bleating cadences. The natives, upon whom the thing made quite a different and a purely dramatic impression, declared with a contemptuous smile, that strangers were not up to the level of their opera.

This state of things brought about, as we have already remarked, relations and consequences wholly the reverse of those, which marked the development of the musical drama with the Italians. The poet, from whom the public expected its chief enjoyment, and who reaped glory from a well elaborated opera text as well as from a good tragedy, kept even pace with the composer, if he did not even get before him. The composer, for whom the choice of the poem or the kind of verse was the most indifferent matter in the world, since his music adapted itself equally well, that is to say equally badly, to every kind, could not seriously fall out with the author of the words. Still less so with the singers. These possessed in the highest degree what was necessary, to execute all that was not song; and since no one thought of offering them such, they took up a score with the same docility or the same indifference, with which the composer took up the poem. What cared they whether the notes were put together so or so? Their art limited itself to the taking points of the French song: to the portamento, the amoroso, the trillo, &c.; and these tricks were employed throughout, as well as the scream. Thus in France poets, musicians and singers lived in sweetest harmony, one in their interests, their means, their end. The order, in which we have named them, marked the degree of their respective consequence. With the Italians the relation was precisely the reverse and transformed the poet into a hod-carrier, the mäestro into a slave and the singers into despots. Hence a contrasted and striking result in the history of the lyric theatre with these two nations. In Italy an opera never outlived the accidental assemblage of the singers, for whom it was written; it lasted just one stagione or theatrical "season." In France whole generations of singers succeeded one another in the poems of QUINAULT and the music of LULLI. It required no less a man than GLUCK, to consign to the final repose of the grave this musical mummy, which had held possession of the throne of the Grand Opera since its foundation.

In the middle of the eighteenth century, however, a troop of comic opera singers brought into France the taste for the true music, which needs only to present itself to make proselytes at once. The men of sense, as MOZART used to express it, the real friends of music felt at once, that this was the enjoyment, which they had vainly sought in the National Opera; but such men were at that time rare in the land, and their enthusiasm, which with the French is always inseparable from the spirit of propagandism, had to encounter fearful opposition. The good patriots, who had no ears, made it a duty to drive back the invasion of the foreign music; the Grand Opera caballed; the comic opera singers were sent away. Their stay in France nevertheless bore its fruits. Young musicians of talent, PHILIDOR, MONSIGNY and GRETRY sought in their comic operas to imitate the style of the Serva padrona, which had so enchanted the amateurs in the Italian theatre. These happy attempts, which gradually accustomed the French ears to true music, feeble as they were, prepared the arrival of GLUCK, whom musical Tragedy awaited ere she stepped into the place of the false idol, which had represented her for more than a century and a half.

The curious lines below are from the pen of the late lamented THOMAS HOOD. Most bards find it sufficiently difficult to obtain one rhyming word at the end of a line, but Hood secures three, with an ease which is as graceful as it is surprising.

A NOCTURNAL SKETCH.

Even has come: and from the dark park, hark
The signal of the setting sun — one gun!
And six is sounding from the chime — prime time
To go and see the Drury Lane Dane slain,
Or hear Othello's jealous doubt spout out;
Or Macbeth raving at that shade made blade,
Denying to his frantic clutch much such;
Or else to see Ducrow, with wide tide, stride
Four horses as no other man can span;
Or in the small Olympic pit, sit split,
Laughing at Liston, while you quiz his phiz.

Anon night comes, and with her wings brings things
Such as with his poetic tongue, Young sung;
The gas up blazes with its bright white light,
And paralytic watchmen prowl, howl, growl,
About the streets, and take up Pall-Mall Sal,
Who trusting to her nightly jobs, robs fols.

Now thieves do enter for your cash, smash, crash,
Fast drowsy Charley, in a deep sleep, creep,
But frightened by policeman B 3, flee,
And while they're going, whisper low, "no go!"

Now Puss, while folks are in their beds, treads leads,
And sleepers grumble, Drat that cat!
Who in the gutter caterwauls, squalls, mauls
Some feline foe, and screams in shrill ill will.

Now Bulls of Bashan, of a prize size, rise
In childish dreams, and with a roar gore poor
Georgey, or Charles, or Billy, willy nilly;
But nurse-maid, in a night-mare rest, chest-pressed,
Dreameth of one of her old flames, James Grimes,
And that she hears — what faith is man's — Ann's bans,
And his, from Reverend Mr. Rice, twice, thrice;
White ribbons flourish, and a stout shout out,
That upward goes, shows Rose knows those bows' woes.

FINE FRUIT is the flower of commodities. It is the most perfect union of the useful and the beautiful that the earth knows. Trees full of soft foliage; blossoms fresh with spring beauty; and finally, fruit, rich, bloom-dusted, melting, luscious — such are the treasures of the orchard and the garden, temptingly offered to every landholder in this bright and sunny, though temperate climate. — A. J. Downing.

Lectures on Allston. By William Ware.

We have had the privilege of perusing the proof-sheets of this delightful volume, to be issued in a couple of weeks from the press of Messrs. Phillips and Sampson. Probably no man was worthier or more competent to describe the characteristics of Allston's genius, than the lamented author. Himself an artist by temperament and native tendency, and practically too, in the way of elegant pastime amid the severer duties of his high profession — (indeed, it is said that the vivid pictures in his romance of "Zenobia" were at first pencil sketches on the walls of his chamber), he had all that religious sense of beauty, that fervent idealism, that love of truth and scorn of cheap effect, that rich, subdued tone of life, in a word, (a word, too, of which he beautifully expounds the meaning in these lectures), that repose, which could appreciate the same qualities in the great painter. Mr. Ware, like the master whom he celebrates, was possessed of the most keen, passionate, delicately discriminating sense of Color, and in this he places, more than in anything else, the mastery of Allston.

This book will be found highly instructive, and every lover of Allston and of Art should have a copy. In marking passages for extract, we are perplexed by the tempting variety of things which we hate to renounce. But in our poverty of room, we take as specimens almost at random:

WHY HE PAINTED SO FEW PICTURES.

"In regard to the particular subject of any picture, he chose it, not, for any reason of momentary popularity, or, because it would sell, or exhibit well, nor at the urgency of others, nor for any idle whim or fancy; but because he himself had fallen in love with it, and he could not rest till it was done; his imagination was inflamed, and the fire spread and communicated power to his whole being. He then was in a condition to work, and he worked, as a man, then only, does. When a man paints a picture, or does any kind of work, on such principles, he works well. A book, poem, novel, history, written in such a way, stands a chance of being read longer than while the ink is drying. To draw an illustration from my own profession, sermons written in this way only, are good ones. An eminent sermonizer of our own time, I have heard say, that he would not begin to write a sermon, let what would happen, till he knew what to write about (what a censure on most of us!) nor only that, not till he had found something that he wanted to say, and believed he knew how to say. And he waited often, weeks and weeks, before he could move. But, when the work was done, it was done; the man was in the sermon; and whatever there was in him of intellectual or moral power, these passed over to the hearer and possessed him; it was so, so only, that Allston undertook his pictures. They are, in no instance, painted without the deepest meditation and the profoundest study. This is obvious to any one who knows anything about them. He has, in each case, found a thought which he wished to utter, which he was burning to utter, into which, then, by degrees and by prolonged study, he concentrated every faculty, affection, knowledge of his mind. Then he painted; and to say that he succeeded, is only to proclaim a natural, irresistible effect, of the means and methods employed.

"This, undoubtedly, was the principal reason, why, comparatively, and, for a person of his power, he painted so few pictures. He could not paint many done in that way. A man so thoroughly conscientious, who made a conscience of his art, could not make many; too many conditions were to be satisfied for that. Had he been willing to paint pictures on the principles on which so many make them, men, too, who have been eminent in their profession, he might easily have rolled in wealth, instead of dying, as he did, in a more honorable poverty. But whether, in that way, his reputation would have gained, is another thing.

"Mr. Allston's mind was a religious mind—another reason of his success. He looked at subjects, as he looked at nature, through a religious medium. Everything was colored by it to his eye. This was a great happiness to him, as a man, as it was a great additional source of power, as an artist. Beato Angelico was not more a religious man than he—nor Overbeck; religious in no one-sided, technical sense, but in the universal sense. He was, indeed, of a particular church; but he was, in religion, what he so emphatically declared himself in art, a wide liker; by charity in religion, and benevolence in art, he was alike distinguished."

HIS "VALENTINE" AS TO COLOR.

"For the Valentine, I may say, though to some it may seem an extravagance, I have never been able to invent the terms that would sufficiently express my admiration of that picture—I mean, of its color; though, as a whole, it is admirable for its composition, for the fewness of the objects admitted, for the simplicity and naturalness of their arrangement. But the charm is in the color of the flesh, of the head, and of the two hands. The subject is, a young woman reading a letter, holding the open letter with both the hands. The art can go no further, nor, as I believe, has it ever gone any further. Some pigments or artifices were unfortunately used, which have caused the surface to crack, and which require the picture now to be looked at, at a farther remove than the work, on its own account, needs or requires; it even demands a nearer approach, in order to be well seen, than these cracks will permit. But these accidental blemishes do not materially interfere with the appreciation and enjoyment of the picture. It has, what I conceive to be, that most rare merit—it has the same universal hue of nature and truth, in both the shadows and the lights which Nature has, but Art almost never, and which is the great cross to the artist. The great defect, and the great difficulty, in imitating the hues of the flesh, lies in the shadows and the half-shadows. You will often observe, in otherwise excellent works of the most admirable masters, that, the moment their pencil passes to the shadows of the flesh, especially the half-shadows, truth, though not always a certain beauty, forsakes them. The shadows are true in their degree of dark, but false in tone and hue. They are true shadows, but not true flesh. You see the form of a face, neck, arm, hand, in shadow, but not flesh in shade; and, were that portion of the form sundered from its connection with the body, it could never be told, by its color alone, what it was designed to be. Allston's wonderful merit is, (and it was Titian's) that the hue of life and flesh is the same in the shadows, as in the light. It is not only shadow or dark, but it is flesh in shadow. The shadows of most artists, even very distinguished ones, are green, or brown, or black, or lead color, and have some strong and decided tint other than that of flesh. The difficulty, with most, seems to have been so insuperable, that they cut the knot at a single blow, and surrendered the shadows of the flesh, as an impossibility, to green, or brown, or black. And, in the general imitation of the flesh tints, the greatest artists have apparently abandoned the task in despair, and contented themselves with a correct utterance of form and expression, with well harmonized darks and lights, with little attention to the hues of nature. Such was Carravaggio always, and Guercino often, and all their respective followers. Such was Michael Angelo, and often Raffaele, though, at other times, the color of Raffaele is not inferior, in truth and glory, to Titian, greatest of the Venetian colorists; as in his portraits of Leo X., Julius, and some parts of some of his frescoes. But, for the most part, though he had the genius for everything, for color as well as form, yet one may conjecture he found color, in its greatest excellence, too laborious for the careful elaboration, which can alone produce great results, too costly of time and toil, the sacrifice too great, of the greater to the less. Allston was apparently, never weary of the labor which would add one more tint of truth to the color of a head or hand, or even, of any object of still life, that entered into any of his compositions. Any eye that looks, can see that it was a most laborious and difficult process by which he secured his results; by no superficial wash of glaring pigments, as in the color of Rubens—whose carnations look as if he had finished the forms at once, the lights and the darks, in solid, opaque colors, and then, with a free and broad brush or sponge, washed in the carmine, lake, and vermilion, to confer the requisite amount of red; but, on the contrary, wrought out, in solid color, from beginning to end, by a painful and sagacious formation on the palette, of the very tint by which the effect, the lights, shadows and half-shadows, and the thousand, almost imperceptible, gradations of hue, which bind together the principal masses of light and shade, was to be produced."

AMERICAN SCULPTURE. A writer in the Transcript (July 29th) gives an interesting account of the late works of our countryman, CRAWFORD, from which we copy the latter half, the first relating wholly to his great work for the State of Virginia, to which we have before alluded.

"Mr. Crawford's Hebe and Ganymede, a beautiful work, executed for Mr. Charles C. Perkins, of this city, is now finished—and a flying figure of Ceres, with a bounteously filled lap, will soon be ready to receive the final touches of the master hand. It is sufficient to say, that in conception and execution they are worthy of the genius which produced the Orpheus—and a glorious fulfilment of the youthful promise of one whom the great Thorwaldsen esteemed his successor in the highest classical style of sculpture.

"But Crawford's love for the antique and his success in mythological subjects, have not cramped his genius, so that he can produce nothing but goddesses and satyrs. He has just finished a figure of a Boy playing marbles, which is so entirely natural and boyish, that you can almost hear the marbles rattle in his pocket, and the chuckle that follows the well-directed snap. The stooping posture, the right hand holding the marble, the intentness of the countenance, and the anatomical effect of the whole are most wonderful.

"But the work which is destined to add most to his reputation—the work which will entitle him to the love of every man, woman and child who speaks the English tongue, is his Children in the Wood. He has recently modelled this, and is now executing it in marble for Mr. James Lenox, of New York. The artist has chosen the moment in the sad history when 'death did end their grief': they are clasped in each other's arms, and the robin-redbreasts are just commencing their pious labor. They are clad in the graceful English costume of the middle ages. The whole story of their sufferings is expressed in their sorrowful but lovely features—and the little boy clasps his sister's hand as if he wished to keep her in the world which he himself is just leaving. The familiarity of the subject and the natural manner of treating it will make it one of the most popular pieces of sculpture of the present age. They who have known Crawford only in mythological subjects, can have no idea of the artistic grace with which he clothes subjects of the later ages; they are only acquainted with one phase of his genius."

A. J. DOWNING. Among the victims by the destruction of the Henry Clay there is none whom the country could so ill afford to lose or whose services to the community can so little be replaced as Mr. DOWNING of Newburg. A man of genius and of high culture, thoroughly disciplined in his profession by long study and observation in Europe; with taste refined and judgment true enough to feel the deficiencies and to know the needs of our domestic, and especially of our rural, architecture; still in the prime of life and exercising a wide influence by his practical labors as well as by his writings; he is snatched from a sphere of high and beautiful utility, and a successor we cannot hope to find. What Mr. Downing had done and was doing to improve the fashion of our dwellings hardly surpassed in value his contributions, theoretical and practical, to the kindred art of landscape gardening. Under his directing hand the grounds of the Capitol and the Smithsonian Institute at Washington were being transformed into models of beauty in their kind; and the grounds about many private mansions also bear testimony to the same taste, the same wise sense of beauty and fitness. As a writer Mr. Downing was remarkable for a mixture of strong sense, thorough understanding of his subject and genial originality. The cessation of his monthly essays in The Horticulturist will leave a permanent blank in the literature of the Domestic Arts. While he drew his materials from the most varied culture he was always, and in the most frank and manly way, an American. His chief aim was to refine the taste, and elevate the social life and habits of his countrymen to something like the ideal proper to freemen. An artist, a scholar and a gentleman, we deplore his untimely loss; and a wide circle of acquaintances, who with us recall his eminent social as well as public qualities, will join with us in this tribute to his memory.—N. Y. Tribune.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 8, 1852.

To whom it may concern.

One of the conditions of subscription to this Journal is payment in advance. Yet, knowing well the character of most of our subscribers, and that a hint at any time would be sufficient, we have not been strenuous in enforcing the rule. By far the greater number have of their own accord sought us out and paid. But there still remains upon our books quite a number of names of out-of-town or distant subscribers, who have neglected to send the wherewithal. All such are respectfully requested to remit at once by mail, and receipts shall be enclosed to them in their next paper.

A WORD TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS. We have now passed the middle of the first volume of our new Journal of Music. So far we have gone quietly rejoicing on our way, saying not a word about ourselves, our prospects, our success; making no boasts and no appeals for patronage, beyond the unobtrusive appeal contained in the tone and character of the paper itself. We have resorted to no clap-trap to win over the multitude; we have run the risk of addressing sometimes only the intelligent few, rather than cater to ignorant and superficial tastes for the sake of the wider harvest; because we knew that the approbation of the qualified judges, however few, is in the end success. We have not copied the good things which the press has said of us, nor have we in a single case solicited a notice. We have done nothing to conciliate the leaders of powerful parties in the musical world, whose recommendation tells upon armies of followers, pupils, business dependents, &c. We have even employed no outside machinery to "push our circulation," as the phrase is. We have been our own editor, our own man of business, our own office clerk; which multifariousness of cares has of course made the contents of our columns fall short somewhat of our ideal. But in no other way could we afford to start at all, and in no other way could we trust the bantling to grow up at all true to our aspiration: once full-grown he will be able to dictate terms in entering into any business partnership, that may extend his sphere.

With all these drawbacks, our success (thanks in great part to the friends who have with so much heart and talent and efficiency continued to enrich our columns) has been all, and more than all, that we anticipated. In four months, during which the paper has been simply working its own way quietly along, we have gained very nearly a thousand subscribers. We have now reached the point at which, if each of our subscribers, who we know to be interested in our success, would simply exert himself or herself to send us one new name, our enterprise would be fully and permanently established.

The simple hint is all. Our readers may safely trust our own taste and temperament and most ingrained, inveterate habit, that we shall not often bore them (as we indeed have never done before), with talk about our paper, to the abridgement of the real matter of the paper itself.

We will only here add, that our present model is intended to serve only until it shall have paid for itself. After that, we mean to improve it and enlarge it from time to time, in every practicable way.

Mozart's Symphony in E b.

The two first movements of this beautiful work were given at the last Afternoon Concert. It had been once before played in Boston (the entire symphony) at the Concerts of the Germania Musical Society last winter. It is one of the four great symphonies composed by Mozart, about the time of his Don Giovanni, in 1786-8. The others are the one in D, the one in G minor (played a year ago by our Musical Fund orchestra), and the glorious "Jupiter" in C. Why this one bears among the musicians the name of the "Swan" Symphony, as it was set down in the bill, we are at a loss to imagine; since it was by no means the last work or "Swan-song" of the composer. It was composed in 1788, in the same year with, but before the "G minor" and the "Jupiter," before his three operas, Così fan tutti, Die Zauberflöte and La Clemenza di Tito, and of course before the Requiem, which naturally should be Mozart's swan-song.

Howbeit, the name is of no consequence; it is a most beautiful symphony, although not standing in the same exalted category with the two later ones above-named; and we thank the little orchestra for its exertions to make us acquainted with half of it, since "half a loaf is better than no bread." We are sure it was enjoyed enough to warrant the performance of the whole hereafter. Especially the Andante, which, starting with a very simple and apparently unpromising theme, and borrowing but few incidental thoughts upon its way, develops gradually into a depth and fullness of expression, now touching the saddest depths of human experience, and finally returning to the first theme and key with a sweet serenity of spirit, which makes one feel that Music, in its highest forms of art, as in its merest melodies, is but an infinitely varied, ever fresh discourse upon the one text of the human heart and human destiny.

"Thought is deeper than all speech, Feeling deeper than all thought."

The orchestra, (in their vacation we may say it,) have appeared to enter upon the ground of Symphony a little timidly. We beg them to take courage and proceed. They certainly will find that in the long run audiences can be held in Boston, only by the assurance of hearing music of the higher order. Waltzes and Marches, Variations and "Arrangements" from operas are very well by way of alternation; but we New-Englanders are a people, who go also to learn, where we go to be amused, and we can hardly pardon ourselves the indulgence of the musical sense, unless we can make the concert in some sense an equivalent for the Lyceum or the good book. We know there is some pedantry about this with not a few: but Heaven send us more of it, we say, if it will only lead our people to open their ears and their souls to those nobler works of music, which are sure in the end to make the deepest lovers.

German "Saengerbund" in Boston.

Until the great congress of the German singing societies in New York, we were not aware, and probably most of our readers were not, of the existence of one of these musical unions in this city. A few evenings since, by the polite invitation of their leader and teacher, Mr. KREISSMANN, we had the pleasure of attending one of their meetings. Twice a week they assemble, to the number of about twenty-five, all plain, hard-working mechanics, not a professional musician among them, to seek a social, genial and inspiring alternation from the day's toils, by singing together some of the noble four-part Lieder written expressly for male voices by some of the greatest German composers. For the "Liedertafeln," "Liederkreise," &c., have become so important a feature in German social life, as to demand supplies of this sort from the fountains of the very best. Mendelssohn, Schubert, Reichardt, Schumann—all the inspired ones, have written music for this use.

The Boston society is in its infancy, and has much to learn by practice; but it has good materials, good spirit (the real German spirit for music), a good teacher, and thus armed with good Kern-Deutslichkeit, it is bound to realize good music. They take it very socially; seated at tables in a half-circle round a large room, (nor do they sing a whit the worse, we fancy, for the national feature of the foaming cans of Bayerische Bier), the teacher at the piano in the centre, and the note books in hand, they study patiently into a piece till they have learned the "hang of it," the lights and shades, &c., and then standing up rehearse it in a freer style. Their drill is thorough and their progress corresponding. We listened to some pieces of a most impressive character, rendered more so by the careful regard to pianissimo and accent. Among others was the exquisite night piece to Goethe's words: Unter allen Gipfeln ist Ruh, which produced such an impression in New York, as given by the combined chorus. Two or three noble pieces of Mendelssohn, too, were finely rendered.

We know not but we are betraying confidence by so free a notice. But we do it to call attention to and to commend a social practice in itself so excellent. These leagues of harmony are also leagues of friendship, patriotism and the great humanitarian sentiment. Why are they not practicable among Americans? and why should we not ere long have our great annual festivals and congresses of Glee Clubs (to take the English name that comes the nearest to it)?

We are pleased to learn that it is proposed to introduce occasionally a strain from the Saengerbund into the next series of Afternoon Concerts of the "Germania Serenade Band"; it would make an interesting feature. There is a freshness and genuineness about this German part-singing which seldom becomes hacknied like our Yankee Psalm and Glee singing.

MADAME SONTAG. The approaching visit of this great artist, long since acknowledged the greatest singer whom Northern Europe has produced, until the LIND's appearance, naturally excites a desire to know something of her career and her artistic quality in the estimation of the best judges in the old world. We have read many elaborate notices of her in German, French and English papers, but have found nothing so clear, so pleasantly written, and apparently so well-weighed as the article which we translate on the first page from a French volume, published a year since, entitled Critique et Littérature Musicales, par P. SCUDO.

This book contains a series of essays on musical topics, shedding light over nearly the whole history of music. They originally appeared as occasional contributions to some of the Parisian journals, for which M. Scudo wrote as musical critic. They evince a large and catholic taste in music, partial to the real classic masters and faithfully cautioning his readers against the brilliant materialism of the modern schools. Well might he be above all narrow nationality of taste; for according to his own account in his Preface, he was born in Venice, where he breathed the spirit of the old Italian masters; was educated in Germany by masters formed after the ways of Bach and Handel, Mozart and Beethoven; and has since lived in Paris, in the daily hearing of the Conservatoire and the Grand Opera, and familiar with the latest wonders of Listz and Berlioz. Thus the music of passion, the music of deep thought and spirituality, and the music of effect, have all had their share in his culture as a widely appreciative critic. We are sure his piece on Mme. Sontag will be read with interest.

MME. ALBONI. The famous contralto is yet properly to commence her public career in America; since the two concerts given in New York, previous to her summer rambles to Niagara and Newport, were evidently unseasonable, and merely served to give a taste of her quality by taking off the edge of the eager Gotham curiosity. She is to commence in earnest, according to all accounts, a little before Sontag, and then we shall have two of the greatest vocal celebrities of Europe in the field, to comfort us for the loss of the one greater, who has left us.

Alboni is a contralto; (that is, chiefly famed in contralto parts, though in compass her voice is fairly a mezzo soprano;) and there is an idle prejudice abroad in the community, that a contralto is in the nature of the case only something second rate. Who is going to be much excited about a lady who only "sings second"? is the question that readily rises to some minds. But this is a great mistake; there is no more interesting quality of voice than the contralto; it is as capable as any other of the most passionate expression in music, and was employed by Rossini for the principal character in several of his operas.

We propose giving to our readers, from the same author who has sketched us Sontag, a brief history of the principal contralti, ending with Albani.

DR. MOSCHISKEER, whose card appears on the next page, has been for sometime favorably known to us as a gentleman of literary accomplishments, and a writer in the English as well as in his native German language. He was for a year or two a frequent contributor to reviews in London, and since then has been similarly engaged in New York and Philadelphia. He now concludes to make literature secondary, and returns to the profession for which he formerly studied, of an Oculist. Dr. M. is the son of a distinguished Oculist in Prussia, and brings high testimonials of his own title to advise and treat in diseases to which literary men are so often subject. He also attends to diseases of the ear.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

THE MUSICAL CONVENTION, under the direction of Messrs. BAKER, JOHNSON, SOUTHARD, &c., commences (as will be seen by the advertisement) on Tuesday next, at 10 A. M. at the Melodeon. It will continue ten days, and it is expected that there will be a large gathering of teachers, choristers, members of former classes, and friends of music generally.

Two hours each day will be devoted to lessons in musical notation, chiefly for the benefit of teachers; one hour to lessons in Harmony; one to the Cultivation of the Voice; and the remainder of the time will be spent in the practice of Hymn-tunes, Choruses, Glees, &c., by the best masters.

New York.

THE FRENCH OPERA TROUPE are performing at Castle Garden. Auber's Diamants de la Couronne has drawn more by the charm of the music, than of the orchestra and singers, if we may trust the Tribune, which "cannot shut its eyes to the fact, that the large majority of M. Fiot's troupe are mere doublures." M. Graet is "husky"; M. Montalar's voice has none of the "richness or volume implied in the word bass"; Mme. Pillot is "neat and lively, with a good deal of jeu, smirking, smiling and ogling, according to the most approved laws of Vaudeville," but has "very, very little voice;" the tenor, Dubrinay, is favorably noticed; as also M. Digue, a light baritone, of flexibility and sweetness, and accustomed to take leading comic parts. But it is said to be worth a visit to Castle Garden to hear Mme FLEURY-JOLLY alone;

"To her rightly belongs the glory of having satisfied the audience with the Diamants. She is a tried performer, having taken the leading parts at the Salle Favart some eight or nine years ago. Since then we understand that New Orleans has been the scene of her triumphs. A light soprano, of large compass, though unsafe in the higher notes, sometimes deliciously soft and tender, and occasionally almost shrill, Mme. Fleury's organ is well suited to the rôles of amoureuse in the lively creations of Auber, Adam and Boieldieu. She has not the tone of Mme. Thillon, and is inferior to that lady as an actress; but in such a part as Catarina, that spectator would be fastidious who would indulge in frequent criticism."

The Tribune justly adds:

"The substitution of the French repertoire of comic opera, in its original shape, for the miserable travesties which are imported from London, will be a matter of congratulation to every lover of the science, and to all who can enjoy lively, exhilarating music."

MME. DURAND. Western papers, taking their pitch from Prentice of Louisville, are hymning the praises of this lady, who is giving concerts together with Sig. Novelli. Says Prentice:

"Her appearance as she came upon the stage prepared the beholders to expect the voice of an angel, and they were not disappointed. Nothing could surpass the exquisite sweetness of her tones. Her every song was encored most rapturously. No other vocalist since Jenny Lind has been greeted with so much enthusiasm."

Says the Detroit Tribune of her concerts in that place (by the way we are glad to see nothing said this time of "gift concerts"):

"She has a voice that is sweetness and melody itself, and a face and expression as sweet as her voice. . . . Her soul seems to be breathed out in every note. There is no distortion of countenance. . . . But the melody flows from her mouth as though her head and heart were an inexhaustible fountain of sweet sounds and deep feeling. Every thing is natural, easy, graceful."

MRS. BOSTWICK, also, was announced for a concert in Detroit.

CONCERT SWINDLE. A so-called "donation concert" came off recently at Louisville.

"By flaming handbills and other means about eight hundred persons assembled at the Mozart Hall, each expecting to draw a splendid prize. The prizes were distributed at the close of the performance in small boxes, by a special committee, but when the boxes were opened, instead of watches, jewels, pencils, etc., etc., nothing was found but candy, sugar plums, and soap."

Shade of Mozart! The statue of thy Commendatore should have stalked into that hall, with ponderous ta ta ta, and made a grand finale of the business, a la Don Giovanni.

MADAME THILLON has given a concert in Milwaukee. The Daily Wisconsin has a clever description thereof:

. . . . "As a singer, Mme. THILLON is above mediocrity, but far below the stars at present adorning the musical firmament. She is utterly devoid of style, and all expression is absorbed in the evident consciousness that her person, not her song, is the attraction. The ballad of 'Jeannette and Jeannetou,' which she sang on the encore of 'Lilly Bell,' was given with a good deal of archness and still more mannerism. Her movements of body are not ungraceful, (those of plump women seldom are,) but her arms were used in an awkward manner, the elbows being moved in the effort of singing, very like the wings of a cock when preparing to crow. The dress of Mme. Thillon in the first part of the concert was in good taste—that is to the credit of her mantua-maker; her ornaments, flowers, head-dress, &c., were garish and profuse—the credit of those is her own. As to personal appearance she is what the English would call a charming woman. She fills the idea of a Hebe rather than of a Venus or one of the Graces—plump, fair, vivacious, and—to a man—irresistible. In stature she is below the medium height, in figure a trifle more than plump—her head is attractive, her hair dark, glossy and luxuriant, her forehead high and broad, her eyebrows beautifully marked, her eyes large, lustrous and languishing, her nose a trifle too thick and too long, her mouth large with fine teeth, her chin almost double, and a neck which places the head faultlessly upon the shoulders. Mme. Thillon is very charming, but in form and feature is by no means the incarnation of one's ideal of womanly beauty."

"The second part of the entertainment, 'The World's Fair,' had for its ultimate object the display of Mme. Thillon's charms in different costumes. The piece is well designed and abounds in 'Irish wit.' It is as full of puns as a pudding-stone is of plums. Mr. Hudson appeared to advantage. As a musical entertainment the whole affair savored strongly of humbug; as a sort of musical pantomime got up as a pretext for the display of a pretty woman, it was a very creditable affair."

"We should not forget to state that Mons. Thillon played one of De Berriot's 'variations' on the violin with unusual taste and skill. The audience seemed delighted with the performance, although by shrugs of the shoulders and shakes of the head, Monsieur seemed to deprecate their applause and to intimate that the thing was done by no means to his own satisfaction."

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. The production of Spohr's Faust has been the great event of the season. Dr. Spohr himself presided in the orchestra, and the piece, having enjoyed an extra number of rehearsals, was most admirably performed in the presence of all the musicians and amateurs of distinction, foreign and native, then in the metropolis. Faust was composed and produced at Vienna, forty years ago, when Spohr was a young man. The libretto, a wretched affair, has nothing to do with Goethe's poem, except a few allusions; it does not even avail itself of the pathetic and eminently musical character of Margaret. The story is treated more after the manner of the old dramatic versions, like Kit Marlow's. We take the following abstract from the Times:

"In the Faust of the opera, we are presented simply with a man who, while not destitute of good impulses, is so completely the slave of his passions that he becomes an easy prey to Mephistophiles. He has sworn to rescue a lady named Cunigunda from the hands of one Gulf, an unprincipled baron, who has confined her in a fortress to force her to his own ends. In the meantime, however, Faust has imbibed an attachment for Rosa, a maiden in humble life, who for the time absorbs his whole attention. Rosa and Cunigunda are the stars that rule the fortunes of Faust, and are used by Mephistophiles as the means of bringing him to his ruin. Having won the affections of Rosa, he obtains an interview with her, in the midst of which he is interrupted by Mephistophiles, who apprises him that he is accused by Franz, a lover of Rosa, of having caused the death of her mother by magic, and must make his escape forthwith. Soon after, Franz and his followers come to substantiate the words of Mephistophiles, and Faust, who, under a compact with his fiendish confidant, has been endowed with miraculous powers, effects his liberation by flying through the air. We next find Faust beneath the walls of the castle of Gulf, from whose power, by the same superhuman means, he rescues Cunigunda. The baron setting him at defiance, Faust causes his castle to be destroyed by flames, and its owner to be carried away by demons. Cunigunda being restored to the arms of her lover, Count Hugo, Faust immediately conceives a passion for her. He attends the rendezvous of the witches at the summit of the Blocksberg, in company with Mephistophiles, and obtains from Siorax a potion which renders the drinker irresistible in the eyes of women. Furnished with this, he appears at the nuptial feast of Hugo and Cunigunda, where he makes love to the bride. Meanwhile, Mephistophiles warns Hugo of his danger, and the latter attacks Faust, who kills him and escapes. Rosa, who has seen Faust at the Cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle, at the marriage of Hugo and Cunigunda, has followed him in male attire, and witnesses this catastrophe. In the last scene, for reasons only known to the librettist, Cunigunda and Rosa meet together in Faust's house at Strasburg. Faust's treachery is then discovered through the instrumentality of Mephistophiles. Rosa escapes and drowns herself, while Cunigunda, learning that Faust was the murderer of her husband, after vainly attempting to stab him with a dagger, quits him in despair. Faust is then left alone with Mephistophiles, who informs him that the compact is at an end, and summons demons to appear and seize their prey. The piece is altogether a jumble. The incidents are forced and artificial. Faust has no distinctive character; the two women are pure abstractions; and Mephistophiles, in spite of his soliloquies, is utterly incomprehensible. Out of such a legend, nevertheless, something better might easily have been made. Spohr's music would, however, have immortalized a worse libretto."

Here was a thoroughly German work, sung upon the Italian stage, in the Italian language, by Italian singers, and, to suit it to the circumstances, with accompanied recitative purposely added by the composer, in place of the dialogue in the original.

"Yet," says the Daily News, "with all these disadvantages and difficulties, Spohr has produced a work—not so attractive, we think, as his charming 'Jessonda,' but possessed of much grandeur and beauty. Written in his youth, it belongs to the school of Mozart, of whom it shows traces (but by no means plagiarisms) in every scene—in construction, melodic phraseology, and instrumentation; the principal differences consisting in the greater use of the chromatic scale, more studied variety of modulation, and greater fullness and elaboration in the orchestral accompaniments. Fine as the music is, this elaborate style gives it an effect of heaviness arising from want of relief; and this effect is aggravated by the excessive length of the opera—excessive, we mean, relatively to the amount of its substantial matter; for, though it is not so long as the 'Huguenots' or the 'Prophète,' it has not the power possessed by those pieces, of keeping alive the attention and interest of the audience."

"The performance was admirable in every respect. The character of Faust has few dramatic capabilities; he is an insipid personage, and little removed from a walking gentleman. But there is fine music in the part, and Ronconi sang it beautifully. The air in the first act, 'E l'amore un grato fiore,' was a masterpiece of vocal expression. The delicious little duet between Faust and Rosina, 'Ah, se il ciel,' was sweetly sung by Ronconi and Mlle. Zerr, who sustained the part of Rosina very agreeably. Madame Castellani acquitted herself splendidly in the character of Cunigunda. Her great scena in the first act, containing the air, 'Ah, un amore fido e vero,' which in beauty and expression has scarcely been surpassed by Mozart himself, was most exquisitely given, and applauded with enthusiasm. Hugo, like Faust, is little better than a walking gentleman; but the music of the part displayed all the richness and brilliancy of Tamberlik's voice, and his success consequently was immense. The only decidedly dramatic character in the opera is Mephistophiles; and it certainly is Ferres's masterpiece. Attired after Retsch's drawing, he was fiendlike in every tone, look, and motion; and the monologue which opens the third act was given by him with terrible grandeur."

"The choral and concerted music was admirably performed; especially the magnificent finale to the first act, a most powerful piece of musical painting. The music

OPERA BEFORE MOZART.

(Concluded.)

IV.

GLUCK AND PICCINI.

GLUCK was even greater as a thinker than as a musician. From grounds of reflection, the Opera Seria, to which he had paid the tribute of his youth, accompanied by the most brilliant success, in Italy, disgusted him; and he began to reflect radically upon the conditions of lyric tragedy, tried to bring them into application in his Orfeo, and developed them in writing in the preface to his Alceste, which he dedicated to the grand duke of Tuscany. In this remarkable piece, in which the rule goes before the example, GLUCK points out all the faults of the musical and poetical composition of the Italian opera and unfolds his system, which he founds upon the principle of lyric-dramatic truth, whose application he extends to all parts of the opera, which he binds strictly together, exterminating all accessory ornaments as superfluous, substituting accurate expression of the words for forms introduced in the interests of routine and of the singers, ordering the movement of the music by the action, and making the poet in everything the indispensable counsellor and inseparable guide of the musician. These maxims, to which GLUCK's scores furnish the best commentary and at this day the best criticism upon whatever there may be extravagant in them, contained nothing but the principles of the French composers. The distinction between them and GLUCK however, consists in this, that they entirely lost sight of their end in the means of execution and that GLUCK was not the man to be deceived in that way. The followers of LULLI very honestly imagined, that they only needed to imitate materially the inflexion and the shades of the voice, which characterize such and such passions in every day life. When they had let rage, remorse and revenge howl, when they had indicated such moods as despondency, sorrow and lamentation by smothered tones, they fancied they had done all, and no one thought of the melodic sense or nonsense, which might result from the putting together of their hollow-ringing and shrieking notes; the selections of chords troubled them about as little, provided they were always full and noisy. Moreover they had remarked, that the passions in reality announce themselves not only by the motion, but also by the higher or lower tones of the voice; that some express themselves rapidly, others slowly, and that as a general rule in speaking we do not follow a definite rhythm. Hence they thought it clearly followed, that, if they changed the movement and the measure with every word, and made the rhythm so irregular, as to disturb every impression and cause all sense of unity to vanish from the music, they attained the highest possible degree of truth. In this way the French composers drew their conclusions, owing to the false theory of their time, which placed music in the category of the so-called imitative arts; and it was this that made it, leaving execution out of the question, so intolerable to foreigners.

To declare, that a musician like GLUCK could not have made such wretched mistakes, would still be no great compliment for him. GLUCK, not only understood the true, more various and more powerful declamation better than all the musicians before him; he also knew, that the chief effects and the most essential significance of music lay in its own proper elements, and that therefore, to found musical tragedy, it was not enough to perfect the Recitative and measured declamation, the only kind of song, which admits of a free and almost ideal intonation of the speaking voice; but that there was need, especially, of arias, choruses and concerted pieces, whose dramatic expression is brought out by means of melody, accords and rhythm; — things, which have absolutely no material resemblance with speech.

If we consult a comparative view of the musical statistics of Europe, from the time when GLUCK projected his plan, we shall easily convince ourselves that France was the only land which could and would receive it. Italy would have put its originator under ban as a heresiarch, the public would have made merry at his expense, and the singers would have treated him very much as the Bacchantes did the hero of his Vienna opera, the Orfeo. Germany, which in the opera was still tributary to Italy, HASSE's Germany, would have been quite as backward about recognizing GLUCK, as it was twenty years afterwards about understanding MOZART. France on the contrary, was entirely ready to receive the new lyric-dramatic code, which was nothing but the completion and perfection of its own. The reigning masters of its royal academy, the numerous battalions of its orchestra, its singers, its chorists and its dancers, the pens of its poets, seemed only to be waiting for a musician. GLUCK came and accomplished that, of which the Florentines had dreamed; he solved the great problem of lyric tragedy, so far as it was possible. Imagine with what enthusiasm and with what intoxication a people, for whom dramatic excitements formed the highest mental satisfaction, welcomed the reality of a musical drama, after already worshipping its shadow in the shapeless productions of their native composers. The national party, far from disquieting themselves about the triumphs of a foreigner, spontaneously recognized him as their interpreter and their head; — a proof that GLUCK had thoroughly understood how to seize the thought and taste of the nation; the thought, which they had well comprehended, without being able to realize it; the taste, which accepted alternation, because it promised them a new enjoyment. This was an immense success, unheard of in the annals of the theatre, which rose even to illusion and to madness. When the learned world saw that RACINE's tragedies were mercilessly cut to pieces to make operas of them, that Iphigenia had already fallen under the shears of an arranger, which went to work a thousand times more savagely than Calchas's steel, it raised a shriek of dissatisfaction and of terror. LAHARPE already was alarmed lest all the gods of the French Parnassus, flung together in a hecatomb, were to be slaughtered on the altars of the German idol. LAHARPE turned Piccinist, as men once turned monks, to testify to their abhorrence for the abominations of the time. And who were they who lavished their almost frantic applause on a composer, whose innovations the musical nations had rejected as assaults upon the sovereign orthodoxy of the Italian opera? They were the mass of the French public, the most ignorant and barbarous of men, genuine Baotians, musically speaking! And GLUCK's opponents, the Piccinists, who were they? The music-lovers of the great world, young musicians, the hope of the country, literati, who give the tone. J. J. ROUSSEAU, theorist and composer, GRIMM, the pearl of dilettantists, LAMARQUE, MARMONTEL; it was the élite of Parisian society, who strengthened that crowd of foreigners belonging to the higher classes, which incessantly, in an ever constant mass attaches itself to the Parisian population. This whole world of connoisseurs were without exception Piccinists. The Baotians on the contrary declared themselves unanimously for GLUCK.

To-day, now that seventy years of musical and other revolutions have passed over this celebrated dispute, which drew all France and Europe into the war between two musicians, what shall posterity think, and what report of it? Were we to keep in view the music only, we could not comprehend that any difference of opinion could here prevail. If any one should now, with spectacles on nose, place the belligerent scores upon the table before him, and with his head full of the present music, he would ask if it were true, if it were credible, if it were possible that the scales could have wavered between two men like GLUCK and PICCINI as tragic composers! Can he comprehend how, between two men, of whom one was something only because he was esteemed the rival of the other, the ignorant could have judged like connoisseurs, and the connoisseurs like ignorant ones! The only possible comparison between these two men he will say, is this: that GLUCK was the father of the lyric tragedy, and PICCINI the father of the buffo opera, of which I am heartily fond, and of which the Cecchina or the "Good Daughter" presents itself to me as the first complete pattern.

But the whole wonder of this paradoxical fact vanishes upon examination. Although the ignorant crowd gave GLUCK the preference, still it continued what it was, ignorant, incapable of judging music outside of the theatre, and deaf to beauty as to the most repulsive faults in execution; but we have already said, that in this crowd eager for dramatic excitements, the piece and the artists found about as many enlightened judges, as the hall held men. GLUCK's declamation carried lyric-dramatic effect as far as it was possible; the singers, whose musical sense only needed a composer, to become quickened, must have entered more into the spirit of their parts; they sang, or if you will, screamed, with more soul and energy; they became better tragedians, in surrendering themselves to the wholly new impressions (for them) of a fiery, swift, impassioned, infinitely true and inspiring music, in which looks, gestures and attitudes seemed to grow together with the notes. That was what charmed the public. On the other hand, these works also considerably favored the musical education of the French, for which the comic opera had already laid the basis. The grand and yet so simple thoughts of GLUCK, his melodies so solemn, his harmony so enchaining and yet so natural, found entrance to French ears, although they were of horn, according to the Italian saying; they found the speedier entrance, that GLUCK's style is not difficult to understand. For the first time that people, so obstinately wedded to his opera, learned that music is an enjoyment of itself, one of the liveliest, in truth. What distinctions, what signs of approbation were sufficient for the man, who had endowed them with a new sense! The multitude judged instinctively and did not err, which would infallibly have been the case, even if they had had to follow the flight of a HANDEL or a MOZART. But GLUCK knew the measure of their powers and contented himself with restoring the drama with energy, nobility and truth, without pretending to raise it to a poetic power above the poetry of words.

The lovers of music, who judged not as knowers, but as half-knowers, preferred PICCINI upon grounds, which commonly decide a man's contemporaries; upon the same grounds, which long since allowed the music of this master to fall into oblivion, and which have kept GLUCK's music living to this day. The Italian composer gave melodies for execution, which were more involved, more brilliant in their novelty, and which for fifty years moulded the fashionable taste of Europe. GLUCK on the other hand avoided just these forms, because they were not suited to his psychological inductions, or to that striving for the True, which led him constantly in all his labors. To the dilettanti he appeared less pleasing, less adapted to the times. Thus do the men of an epoch, or the representatives of the momentary taste, always reason about the men who are of all times.

Gluckists and Piccinists still always live and fight under other names, like the systems which they represent. Each has the right to live; a continuation of the strife, however, would be profitless, because there are means of coming to a mutual understanding. Both systems correspond to wants too different, for them to exclude one another or only live in mutual competition. If one is equally fond of theatre and music, and takes pleasure in forgetting the singer in the person, he will hear GLUCK and his legitimate successors, MEHUL, CHERUBINI, SPONTINI, WEBER and even MEYERBEER in his fine moments. In their school, Rome and Greece, the East of the patriarchs and the West of the enchanters, Achilles and Licinius, Joseph and Simeon, Max and Agatha, will speak to one's soul, like the spirit of the poetic age of the world and the spirit of the marvellous Saga; there is enough therein to engage all that one has of feeling and imagination, of dramatic intelligence and musical passion; and that is an enjoyment. But look for nothing in an opera seria, which bears the reproach of a ten-dollar libretto, and is not worthy even of that. On the other hand it has to bring out singers, who are paid eighty thousand francs, but who would not get a quarter of this sum, if they limited their vocal achievements to what the truth of a situation or a character requires; singers too, whose talent (we confess) is such, that one forgets the person and the piece entirely in the singer, and would be very indignant at the theatrical illusion, if it dared to interpose itself between the artist and the public. But to be able to hear singers, who have reached the summit of the mechanical and aesthetic perfection of their art, is also an enjoyment and indeed so great an enjoyment, that there is none for which we pay more fondly and more dearly. Of these two enjoyments one can prefer the one or the other from taste or from principle; but it is my opinion, we may love them both and enjoy them by turns, without one injuring the other.

I have dwelt upon GLUCK, and truly for good reasons. There were musicians of greater genius, but no one, I believe, whose works could have been more useful for the future. He is the founder of the sublime theatre music and the first, who has left us monuments of dramatic opera in his scores. All the forms of declamation and accompaniment, which he has created, still glimmer through the most sterling operas of our period, and time has held his operas in such esteem, that we may look upon him merely as the older brother among his scholars of the nineteenth century.

THE SHAPE AND MODEL OF THE VIOLIN. To the violinist there is almost as much of beauty in the form of a perfectly modelled instrument as there is of sweetness in its tones; and, as in all cases of natural organization, this exterior beauty is intimately connected with the perfect efficiency of the object for the purposes for which it is intended—the tone of the violin depending upon the exact proportion and perfect adjustment of its parts. It may well be questioned whether any conceivable alteration in the form and construction of the violin could by possibility be an improvement. Its contour is a sequence of lines of beauty; its model, in exact obedience to the rigid laws of proportion, falls into graceful profiles; in a word, it may be instanced as a faultless illustration of the beauty of fitness, even to the consummate grace of the scroll which terminates the neck of the instrument.

The oldest makers may be supposed to have determined their contours (as we have little doubt the Greek Sculptors and architects did in those remains which exist only to foil the researches of formalists) by hand and by eye. We know not whether we are safe in saying that Anthony Straduarus was the first to reduce the principles of construction to communicable rule. What M. Vuillaume can so readily and so accurately determine in his "Copies," was, it is obvious, previously perfectly systematized in the inventor's mind. Straduarus, besides the most rigid adherence to uniform principle in the outlines, maintained a system of gradients in the thicknesses of the parts throughout.

It is not every one who is aware that no less than fifty-eight pieces go to make up a violin; or employing twice the reckoned number of pieces in the purfling (as Choron and Lafage do in the Manuel de Musique), the number of parts amounts to seventy. These pieces are as follows:—two for the back; two for the belly; six for the blocks at the top, bottom, and four corners; six for the sides; twelve for the lining for the sides; one bass bar; twelve for the purfling; one rest for tail-piece; one neck; one finger-board; one tail-piece; four pegs; one nut; one button for the tail-piece; four strings; one catgut or wire to connect the tail-piece with the button; one sound post; one bridge.—Cocks's Musical Miscellany.

In Vienna, on the same spot where the author of Don Juan—that chef d'œuvre, for which, by the way, he only received eight ducats—died, there is now a very handsome building, called the Hôtel de Mozart. In the Fanbourg of the Josephstadt, there still exists a small beer-shop, called the Blue Bottle, where Mozart was constantly in the habit of going. It was in the garden belonging to this house that he wrote the greater portion of the Magic Flute. It is well known, that no one has yet discovered the last resting place of this great master. His contemporaries treated his manuscripts with the same indifference they did him. All his papers remained thrust away under his piano for more than eight years. In 1799, M. André bought them for 1000 crowns; in 1837, he offered them to the Imperial Library for 20,000 florins, but his offer was not accepted.

The Musical Festival at Ballenstedt.

On the morning of the 21st of June, this little town was early in commotion from the numerous visitors which the Festival and the charming scenery of the Hartz Mountains had attracted thither. Crowds wended their way to the Schloss (Castle,) the beautiful rock scenery of the Rosstrappe, der Regenstein, and the far-famed Brock-en, so well remembered through Kind's story of Der Freyschütz. The Singing Societies of several neighboring towns had contributed to form an orchestra of about 500 performers, 350 vocalists, and 150 instrumentalists, the whole under the direction of Dr. Franz Liszt. The programme was made by the latter eminent composer, and deserves our fullest praise. The first day's performance was as follows:

1. Overture, "Der Tannhäuser," by R. Wagner.
2. Duet from "Der Fliegende Holländer," by R. Wagner.
3. Harp fantasia on "Oberon," executed by Mlle. Rosalie Spohr.
4. "Die Macht der Musik" (the power of music) soprano solo, with orchestra, by F. Liszt.
5. Grand Fantasia for Piano and Orchestra, with Chorus, by Beethoven, performed by Herr Von Bülow.
6. Grand Scena from "Orpheus," by Gluck.
7. Symphonie (9th,) with Vocal Chorus, on Schiller's Ode "To Joy," by Beethoven.

The second day's performance included the following pieces:

1. Overture to the opera, "King Alfred," by J. Raff.
2. "Das Liebesmahl der Apostel," for male voices, by R. Wagner.
3. "Harold," Grand Symphony, by Berlioz.
4. "Die Walpurgisnacht," Mendelssohn.

The Riding School belonging to the Ducal Palace was tastefully decorated for the occasion. It held 3000 persons. The seat occupied by Liszt was ornamented with flowers and evergreens, fantastically wreathed. The public and the orchestra received the great pianist with the loudest acclamations, knowing well what they had to expect from such a conductor. The overture and duet, by Wagner, were received with great favor. But who is that charming young girl, dressed in black, with that beautifully formed arm, and flowing hair? It is Rosalie Spohr, the genius of the harp, niece of the great Spohr, who draws forth such bell-like tones from the instrument, that I never heard surpassed by Parish-Alvars or Schaller, and which I certainly never expect to hear surpassed. Rosalie Spohr may be entitled the Liszt of the Harp. Herr Von Bülow (from Weimar) played the fantasia by Beethoven in first-rate style, and fully came up to the favorable opinion expressed of him by his master, Liszt. Mlle. Franziska Schreck's (from Erfurt) beautiful contralto voice was heard to great advantage in the grand scena from "Orpheus," and in the vocal portions allotted to her in the choral symphony. The chorus and orchestra deserve the highest praise for their exertions, and for the manner in which they executed their arduous tasks.

Anecdotes of Beethoven.

HIS DISREGARD OF RULE. In the year 1810, a certain composer (Herr H——) published a Sonata of his own composition, and dedicated it to Beethoven. Upon his presenting a copy to Beethoven, the latter examined its pages, and pointed out several grammatical errors. Herr H—— made bold to observe, that Herr V. Beethoven had also allowed himself many harmonic liberties. Beethoven replied, with a smiling countenance, "I dare do so, but you may not." (Ich darf es thun, aber Sie nicht.)

THE MEASURE OF LENGTH. When Beethoven heard of his Sinfonia Eroica having been pronounced too long, he said, "It will be found short enough if I write one to occupy two hours in performance."

THE HEART'S HYMN.

Thank God! I've lived to see
The boughs of the withered tree
Put forth its leaves
To the warm sunshine of better days!
The golden sheaves
Of Hope are bound,
And garnered up in sound
Of the heart's soft lays;
The dried-up fountain
Is singing gay,
And the mist from the mountain
Is cleared away:
The wing of the dove
No longer bleeds,
But soars above
Through the azure meads;
Winter has bound up his icy hair,
And Spring hath decked it with blossoms rare;
I hear no longer the wild wind's blow,
Nor the digging away of the drifted snow;
All is happy, without a frown,
Like Ocean's forehead when storms are down.
And the sun is dressing the waters blue
In mantles of many a brilliant hue;
The tear-wet eyes
Of the heart are bright,
And stars arise
In its cheerless night;
A heart is plighted,
And sang its hymn,
A fire is lighted,
Which will not dim.
* * * * *
I thank thee, God, that I have seen
The darkness fade away,
That I am not what I have been,
A night without a day;
A flower from light shut out,
A lamb without a fold,
A ship in the whirlwind's rout,
A bird in the winter's cold;
A wretch that bends the knee
At the well in the desert dry,
A corse drifted out to sea
In the gloom of a starless sky.

[From Cocks's Musical Miscellany.]

Provision for the Musicians.

Men of genius are proverbially improvident. Everybody knows this. All the world — people of genius, and people without genius — repeat this established truism as often as the merits of the gifted race come to be canvassed. In short, in this formula is believed to be comprehended the whole history of the species.

But the calculating and sensible part of the world, who really can put two ideas together, that is, connect premises and consequences so as to frame a syllogism, might, with a little thought, arrive at the inference that the whole history of the man of genius cannot be comprehended within this superficial view. Careless self-indulgence never produced "Paradise Lost," or the "Hallelujah Chorus." There must be a portion of the history of the man of genius hidden from public view, and strangely at variance with the preconceived notions of his utter want of foresight.

In truth, the very essence of his being is an incessant looking towards a future. To this future he makes a full and uncompromising sacrifice of the present. He knows, with the unerring intuition of genius, that this future may arrive when his heart is withered in the life-struggle — in those remote and evil days when he shall say, "I have no pleasure in them." He knows that it may not unlikely be deferred, even beyond the term of his natural life, and only shed its radiance upon his lowly grave. Still he looks forward, and postpones every consideration of present convenience to the glorious future of his visioned hope. Such is the improvidence of genius!

It is almost inevitable, then, that he be found negligent of most of those precautions which matter-of-fact people estimate as making up the sum total of the virtue called prudence. The question involves to a very great extent the history of musical men; because amongst them genius, perhaps from the inspiring nature of their art, more abounds than amongst any other class of people. It may be well, then, to call their attention to the mode in which their peculiar constitution of mind operates upon their daily habits, and influences their worldly fortunes.

In the first place, they are of necessity prevented from giving that whole and exclusive attention to their secular interests which men of business well know is the sine qua non of success in the world. Their thoughts are otherwise engaged — pre-occupied with their art. In the second place, the same pre-occupation prevents their acquiring that savoir faire in which practical knowledge of the world is understood to consist. In the third place, the pursuit of their high calling communicates an elevation to their way of thinking, which leads them to rate, perhaps below its real value, that pecuniary success which has so marked an influence on the position of men among a commercial people. And fourthly, they are precluded from due adherence to Poor Richard's maxims of economy — prevented amassing those small savings which grow to wealth — because the procuring the means of carrying on their studies absorbs all their proverbially small means. The purchase of expensive instruments, and expensive books, frequently has left, and we know literal instances, the incipient professor actually without a meal. We know instances of improvident musicians, since so you persist in calling them, whose bookshelves are the only portion of their apartments decently furnished. Poor young Haydn bought his first books of instruction with money that had been sent him from home to get his clothes mended; and studied them with his jacket out at elbows. They value the means of progress more than the means of life, and sacrifice everything to the one pursuit. Paganini had once lost all he had at the play-table, except his violin, and actually consented to part with his vice sooner than with his violin.

It is a very poor philosophy which attempts to explain these notable phenomena in the history of the human species under the general idea of vulgar improvidence, and to assemble in the same category the musician so absorbed in the future as to forget his present necessities, and the mindless sot who spends his weekly wages in Saturday-night's excesses, or the rake who exhausts his quarterly receipt upon Epsom downs. This classification is but one of the modes in which mediocrity avenges itself of superior talent. Improvidence is not the exact word for the thing intended, although we sorrowfully admit that it exposes its victim to all the penalties of genuine common-place improvidence.

We almost fear that, under any probable improvement in the arrangement of society, the musician's pecuniary gains must continue to be but small, comparatively speaking. Large fortunes are not readily made out of counterpoint. The notes of the scale are not easily negotiable. We will say nothing of the great singers who are pretty well paid; and we only wish them happiness in the enjoyment of their fair gains. Madame Goldschmidt — (it is very tantalizing to be obliged to travestie thus a sweet familiar name) — by her fine talent has done what, no doubt, sundry individuals of less merit have done contemporaneously by a single lucky speculation in hops or indigo, namely, amassed a fortune. But musicians, in general, must make up their accounts for something very far inferior to this as the result of their labors and studies. They must continue, as they do, to look for their principal reward in their art itself. They must, according to Beethoven's good-humored joke, be content to be Hirnsitzern (proprietors of brains), for they have little chance of becoming Gutsbesitzern (proprietors of estates): they must, in fine, modify Mr. Skimpole's petition, and ask of the world the little boon, to let them live and pursue their art.

The remuneration of teaching, which forms a large proportion of the professor's returns, must, we fear, continue to be a very limited source of revenue, distributed as it is amongst a very numerous professing body. Under any circumstances, and in all ranks of life, people find the education of a family a very onerous charge. And, according to prevailing habits of thought, the material takes precedence of the abstract and intellectual in the estimation of parents. The tailor, the shoemaker, and even the merchant of bon-bons, are paid without grudging, because they give a tangible quid pro quo. In the other case there is no obvious "value received." State and equipage are willingly paid for, because they attract public notice and win homage. The labors of the teacher, like the calls of the doctor's boy, tend only to promote well-being and increase expense. Forty pounds a-year is well bestowed upon a burly footman or an agile comier; but the eight pounds annually assigned to the governess is looked at with the evil eye: "it is a great deal of money for so little; and the children really do not get on so well as when aunt Jane taught them; and then, you know, it cost nothing!"

Professors, then, can hardly hope, as a rule, to be able to lay by, like the ant of the Proverbs, a plentiful provision — that is all the ant has to do in its little life, and it lives in the midst of plenty. Unfortunately, moreover, they have not, and from the nature of their pursuits, as we have seen, they can scarcely have, that peculiar knack, the result of long habit, of making a little go a great way. Still there are methods which are found available by all sorts of persons, of making provision for a season of need, more particularly that season of continuous need, old age, without any great present sacrifice, or any intolerable strain upon the deliberative faculties.

We have included musicians in the general category of men of genius; but it is not to be assumed that we have been describing to the letter all the individuals who make up that class. We have depicted in the excess those qualities to which all men of a certain order of mind have a tendency. Careful early education, habits of self-control, and the power of dominant will may go far to correct or completely neutralize those tendencies. And musicians, and other artists, may no doubt be found, who, to intense energy in the pursuit of art, unite care and forethought in the conduct of their daily life.

But there are methods, as we hinted, by which those whose income is uncertain and precarious, and who are liable to sudden and unforeseen interruptions in their pursuits, may protect themselves against the consequences of the untoward chances of life; and we should be glad to believe that professors generally availed themselves of these protective means. There are the Savings' Banks; but these only enable a man to secure what he has gained; and we fear that musicians are not very extensively found among the contributors to these institutions. Mechanics, who earn five shillings a-day, can easily contrive, and do in numbers contrive, to lay by enough to make their age comfortable. Many professors will tell us the requirements of their situation leave them no surplus: on the contrary, that they are obliged to draw on future contingencies. Of course, they cannot amass.

The mechanic, again, by a trifling monthly contribution to a club, is provided for during periods of illness, and finds relief under some of the greater calamities of life. Trade unions afford a partial supply to their members when out of employ. No provision of this kind exists for professional men.

Building Societies and Freehold Land Societies afford excellent modes of investing a surplus; but advice how to invest surplus capital is not exactly what professors generally stand in need of.

The system of Life Assurance affords a very effective means of making a provision for a family in the event of the premature decease of the parent. But we are not sure that our professional friends very generally avail themselves of such Institutions. The principle on which those societies are founded is sound. The contributions of the assured actually pay in the aggregate all the policies as they fall in, and leave a profit. The sacrifice in the shape of premium is but trifling; but then it requires that every one should study the principle of the societies before he can have any confidence in their operation; and this is, perhaps, one reason why the musician, whose thoughts are not generally very mathematical, although he professes a mathematical science, may not often be found to avail himself of the advantages afforded by these societies.

BY O. W. WASHINGTON.

When from the friends thou lovest,
On the blue wave thou rovest,
When every thing thou meetest,
Is to thy vision sweetest,
Absent — shall I inherit
One Thought of thy pure Spirit?

When Ocean sings around thee,
And novel charms have bound thee,
When thy young Soul rejoices
In strange and thrilling voices,
Wilt thou, from all retreating,
Send me one Spirit greeting?

When the wild Sea-Bird only
Flies o'er thy pathway lonely,
When Voice of Storm and Sailor
Shall make thy rose-cheek paler,
Wilt thou, across the Ocean,
Waft me one Soul emotion?

When wave and storm thou fearest,
May I be with thee, dearest —
A Vision o'er thy pillow,
A Spirit on the billow,
A Dream where'er thou goest,
A Spell thou only knowest.

Wilt thou, to others Real,
Be still my own Ideal!
Them sweetly, kindly meeting,
Give me thy Spirit-greeting —
Smiling on them forever,
But leaving me O! never!

THE BOB-O-LINK.

Merrily sings the fluttering Bob-o-link,
Whose trilling song above the meadow floats;
The eager air speeds tremulous to drink
The bubbling sweetness of the liquid notes,
Whose silver cadences do rise and sink,
Shift, glide, and shiver, like the trembling notes
In the full gush of sunset; one might think
Some potent charm had turned the auroral flame
Of the night-kindling North to harmony,
That in one gurgling rush of sweetness came,
Mocking the ear as once it mocked the eye,
With varying beauties twinkling fitfully.
Low hovering in the air his song he sings
As if he shook it from his trembling wings.

THE IMPORTANCE OF TRIFLES. "You wouldn't believe it," said an amateur upon the violin to a friend, to whom he explained the difficulty of performing upon this instrument; "you wouldn't believe it, how horrible it sounds if you only put your finger half an inch too high or too low upon the string!"

THE KINGDOM OF HARMONY. Castil Blase, the founder of musical criticism in France, and translator and arranger of more than twenty of the works of Weber, Rossini and Mozart, which have made the fortune of the theatres, has just published the first volume of his Moliere Musicien, a work of great originality, written in his peculiar style, full of rare and curious anecdotes, and containing a history of music from the beginning of the 17th century. He distributes the first offices and dignities in the past Empire of Harmony thus:—

MOZART	King.
GLUCK	Prime Minister.
MEHUL	First Secretary.
HANDEL	Minister of Worship.
HAYDN	Chancellor.
BEETHOVEN . . .	Generalissimo.
CHERUBINI . . .	Minister of Public Instruction.
BACH (Sebastian) .	Minister of Justice.
WEBER (C. M.) .	Intendant of the Opera.
SPOHR	Master of the Chapel Royal.
MENDELSSOHN . .	Minister General of Concerts.
PAER	Keeper of Museum of Antiquities.
MEYERBEER . . .	Banker of the Court.
ROSSINI	Furnisher of the Crown Diamonds.
SPONTINI	Artillerist.

SEPULCHRAL MONUMENT. It is worth a visit to the atelier of the sculptor, Mr. JOSEPH CAREW, 143 Harrison Avenue, to see a beautiful work, which he has just completed, and which would look far more in harmony with the shades of Mt. Auburn or of Forest Hill, than the fantastical, ambitious piles too often reared to the memory of the dead, or rather, one must sometimes fear, to the vain-glory of the living.

This monument, which is all of pure white marble, consists of a pedestal, from the four corners of which rise pillars supporting a chaste entablature surmounted by a flat dome. Under this marble canopy stands the image of a noble boy, with one hand resting on a truncated column, the other holding a wreath of flowers. He is looking up, as if suddenly arrested in his innocent play (his ball lies at his feet) by a voice from heaven; a finger, too, unconsciously lifted, shows that his whole being is attention. — Such a monument it would be sweet to see in the green spot where lives the memory of some dear child early called away.

There are some interesting busts, classic medallions, &c., also at Mr. Carew's, which betray the sterling artist feeling of this industrious multiplier of the forms of beauty.

Mr. THOMAS CAREW, brother of the above, and author of the fine bust of the venerable Dr. Pierce, which adorns the library at Harvard, has lately executed a striking head of the Hon. HORACE MANN. It may be seen at his studio in School street.

MEYER'S UNIVERSUM. (New York: Hermann J. Meyer, 164 William St.) Three half-monthly numbers have now been published of this unique and valuable serial. It is based upon, and in the main translated from, the German work of the same name, in which through several years has been accumulated a vast amount of geographical, pictorial and statistical information about nearly all of the most famous places on the globe. Each number contains four well executed steel engravings of famous scenes and buildings, accompanied by several pages of letter-press description and comment. These are generally written with much point and vigor, and animated by a hopeful and humanitarian spirit. The American edition, which is under the editorial charge of Mr. CHARLES A. DANA, of the New York Tribune, will include many new articles and illustrations, and we see no reason why the work should not go on indefinitely and acquire as universal a popularity here, as it has done in Germany and indeed in all Europe.

The numbers already issued contain Niagara

Falls, the Tower of London, Fingal's Cave, Constantinople, &c.; and the last number has a picture, of which we copy part of the description, of the celebrated national temple of Art in Bavaria:

THE WALHALLA.

"The Walhalla is the receptacle of the statues of the great men of the nation. Its eastern gable is decorated with a representation of Hermann's victory over the Romans. The western front represents Germany's latest liberation. The interior is illustrated by the art of the sculptor with the complete history of the land, the results and consequences of every contest for German independence.

"The corner-stone of this grand temple of national honor was laid in 1830. The celebrated Klenze sketched the plan after the idea of king Lewis of Bavaria, and guided the architectural execution; the Sculpture, for which Rauch in part prepared the drawings, was entrusted to the immortal Schwanthaler, and his pupils.

"The building represents a Doric temple of white marble, similar to the Parthenon on the hill of the Acropolis at Athens. Its dimensions are vast and imposing:—seventy feet in height, a breadth of a hundred, and a depth of three hundred feet. The roof is supported on each side by a row of colossal pillars, eight of which stand at the two ends, and seventeen at each side. The interior is a vast hall of marble, whose richly checkered ceiling is supported by two rows of Ionic columns. The frieze that passes around the hall, is decorated with bas-reliefs, executed by Wagner in Rome, which represent the ancient history of the Teutonic race, from the time it left the Caucasian country down to the diffusion of Christianity amongst them. Along the army walls of the interior hall, appropriate niches contain the marble busts of those men, who have been the pride of the German nation at all times—her heroes in war, in council, in poetry, in the arts and sciences. In an outer compartment are placed the busts of celebrated contemporaries who are considered worthy to be numbered with the heroes of the Walhalla. Of the one hundred and forty places extant, fifty are as yet unoccupied. All the busts are, so far as it was possible to obtain them, faithful portraits. In a subterranean hall, an archive preserves the biographies of those admitted into the temple. They are written on parchment. King Lewis himself was their biographer. The complete works of the literary celebrities are placed, superbly bound, in a library.

"The Walhalla rests upon substructions built in the Cyclopean style. White marble steps of immense proportions lead up to the terrace of the temple. From the terrace the eye roams across the romantic valley of the Danube, and over the neighboring mountains, the nearest of which is adorned with the picturesque and imposing ruins of the ancient castle of Donaustauf. The cost of the building, although it was originally estimated far lower, was not less than three millions of florins, and it was paid out of the privy purse of the king, to whom impartial judges willingly give the honor of having, in this monument, led back Art to her noblest destination."

The Child (Das Kind,) A Song, by A KREISSMANN. G. P. Reed & Co.

This is one of the sweetest, most naïve and graceful of the author's productions. Differing as widely as possible from his "Voice of the Cloud," which we noticed recently, it is fully as original and characteristic in its conception. The melody sings itself easily, as befits the subject, and the accompaniment is very delicately contrived. The German words are given, with a translation by HENRY WARE.

Tho' from Him I love, &c. Song from Preciosa. C. M. VON WEBER. Reed & Co.

This little melody, so entirely in the romantic vein of Weber, was well worth publishing. It is not difficult and must become a favorite.

Musical Conventions.

The middle of August has now for fifteen years or more been Singing-Masters' and Psalm-Book-Makers' Fair in Boston. The custom of "Conventions," or "Teachers' Classes" has grown to be more or less a custom in many parts of our country. Here at least, in New England, for a musical journal, it is of importance enough to be the topic of the month. One of these bodies is just now in the middle of its ten days' session at the Melodeon in this city. It is one of the offshoots, or rather a coalition, consummated last year, of several offshoots, from the original Convention, which has always until this year, constituted the largest and most formidable nucleus under the guidance of Messrs. Mason and Webb and the auspices of the Boston Academy of Music. Unfortunately, owing to the prolonged stay of Mr. Mason in Europe, and to other untoward circumstances (among which the want of a hall as large as the old Tremont Temple may be mentioned,) this organization does not take the field at all this summer. It will bring the more singers and music-lovers to the meetings of Messrs. Baker and Johnson, which have opened with a goodly show of numbers, including fine materials for a chorus, and with an increase from day to day, to which apparently only the size of the hall will set a limit. Besides, these things, as they go on, become less and less dependent on the individual leader or leaders; they move by their own momentum; and you will find nearly the whole music-teaching and music-learning interest represented at whatsoever Convention may for the time being chance to occupy the field.

The present gathering will suggest matter of comment; but we prefer to wait and weigh it well when it is all over. Meanwhile as a basis for such remarks and comparisons as we may have to make, we reproduce some paragraphs, (new to most of our readers) in which we noted down six years ago the observations and speculations into which we were led by the Conventions at that time.

"The popular musical movement in this country seems to be tending to something like a great organic unity;—or rather to several unities,—for there are rival organizations, all of which, in the nature of things, must finally be swallowed up in one. Observe, we speak of the popular movement, of the music which begins in singing schools and village choirs, and is for the people; proceeding from the first stirrings of the popular want, uneducated, unrefined, rather than from any high artistic centre. This development doubtless is not watched with pleasure by the professionally musical, and by those who have made fond acquaintance all their lives with the artistic productions of the old musical countries. Its rude, homely, puritanic taste; its perpetual drilling in bare elements, and perpetual discussion of them; its cart-loads of psalmody of home manufacture; and the Yankee trading shrewdness and seeming charlatanry of those who conduct it, through the whole hierarchy, from the simple country singing master, and the more metropolitan teachers, up to the 'great Panjandrum,' or Psalm-King, himself:—

all this distinguishes the popular movement, as a kind of illegitimate upstart, in the eyes of genuine musicians and amateurs, from what they conceive to be the true derivation and descent of taste in the old way from the highest and oldest reservoirs of musical attainment down through the multitudes. This giving of importance to the vulgar, homely taste for music, by organizing it, even though that taste accumulates the power in this way of improving itself, is naturally regarded by musicians, with whom music is an art, as something as profane musically, as it is orthodox and moral in its social origin. For ourselves, we believe that Music is destined to take possession of this American people in both ways; partly by the natural charm of the beautiful and grand already created in music, drawing congenial natures to itself; and partly by the organized combination of such plain psalm-singing propensities as we have, gradually rising to meet the influence which flows down from the true holy land of Art, now visited by the few alone who can appreciate its glories. In other words we think that the Italian opera, the orchestras of trained musicians, who play overtures and symphonies to such as begin to appreciate, the oratorio-performances in our cities, the accomplished virtuoso pianists and violinists, and cantatrici who make the tour of our States, give one great impulse to music in this country; and that the Teachers' Classes and Conventions, the common-school instructions, the multifarious manuals, psalm-books, glee-books, &c., of Lowell Mason, and his hosts of co-operators and rivals, in this field, do also give another impulse, not to be despised, but showing fruits from year to year, and actually converging towards and promising in due time to meet the first-named influence. That furnishes models, this creates audiences. That is like the books, the literature of the old world, the results of the advanced minds, offered to an infant and a savage race; this like the common schooling which teaches us to read them, by first teaching us plain sentences in dull primers, (and even such exercises become attractive through social combination.) That is the influence of sun and showers: this the artificial loosening of the surface of the soil, to make it more receptive.

"There is, then, both good and evil in these great organizations of singing masters and choristers now growing up; but we are sure the good preponderates.

"The Boston Academy of Music originated this plan of holding ten days' conventions of teachers every August, for the purpose of receiving instructions from competent professors in the elements and practice of sacred music, and in the best modes of teaching the same, fourteen years ago. The first class numbered only twelve persons. It soon increased to hundreds. Teachers, choir-leaders, and others flocked from all parts of the country, to Boston, to learn the art of teaching from the most successful masters. Combining, as they did, a considerable power of ready sight-singing in these meetings, they were naturally led to spend much of the session in practising new music, trying the new books which the professors had got ready for them to circulate when they went home, and by timid degrees even venturing upon some of the works of the great masters, to the manifest growth of enthusiasm and good taste. Considered as a speculation, or as a fête, this was too good a thing not to be imitated, and rival Teachers' Institutes sprang up, particularly that of Messrs. Baker and Woodbury, who found ample field without encroaching on the other. Moreover the chiefs of these hierarchies, after holding their grand conventions at home, leave their emporium in the Autumn, and like enterprising bishops visit their respective dioceses among the cities of the West, holding teachers' conventions in Buffalo, Cleveland, Cincinnati, and so forth, and establishing affiliated centres there."

Passing over a description of the musical exercises on the occasion after which this was written, we come to one peculiar feature of the Conventions:

"Handbills were distributed among the audience as they entered the hall, which seemed to be programmes of the concert, but which proved to be catalogues of a large auction sale of music and musical works, to take place in the evening. So that this great annual gathering becomes a fair or market, not only for the conductors who thus circulate their 'methods' and their 'collections,' but also for the music dealers and publishers of the city, who seize upon this rare chance to dispose of what lies dead upon their hands. And this suggests the objection, commonly urged against these conventions, of their trading spirit and the monopoly of the music market likely to be acquired by those who take the lead in them. It becomes no objection if the fact be generally understood. On the contrary it is a great mutual convenience; let the professors and book-makers find their interest in it, if they can. However low the tone which they might set in their writings (we only suppose a case) it is evident that the demand for better music will rise every year, by these opportunities of coming together in a musical centre; and that to satisfy the market it becomes more and more necessary for them to make good books. If the calculating persons, who may be suspected to have started this thing with an eye to their own interest, are not competent to guide it to the highest point, it will move on of itself, by its own momentum, by the mere force of accumulation, and pass them and their standard by."

"The good we anticipate from this organization is three-fold.

"First, the influence upon those engaged in it. We could not but feel, as we heard the choruses of Handel and the four-part songs of Mendelssohn sung by this vast assembly of persons, mostly of but ordinary culture and but little leisure, that this was for them the beginning of the highest culture. They had actually made acquaintance with some of the most exalted, most refined productions of the most refining of all arts. They had together shared the emotion of great music, and experienced an enthusiasm of a deeper, finer quality, than their lives before perhaps had furnished. The person who can comprehend, appreciate, feel Mendelssohn, has already won admission to the finer spheres of life. The Unitarian sentiment may also be mentioned here; the beneficial consciousness of combined action, of days spent rhythmically, and with orderly enthusiasm.

"Secondly, the influence upon musical taste and practice throughout the country. From their rural, isolated homes, where advantages for hearing higher kinds of music do not exist, these enterprising leaders of choirs and classes come up once a year to Jerusalem, to receive truer notions of their art, and listen to great models, and go back to give the same tone to their respective circles and communities. The standard is thus rising throughout all the land. A musical emulation is excited in the most dull utilitarian places; and each year the leader carries with him more and more of his neighbors, who avail themselves of the increased facilities for travelling, to go up also and rekindle their musical imaginations at the great feast.

"Finally, we see in all this, as we intimated in the beginning of this article, a tendency to organic unity in the multifarious musical aspirations of this people. It is the natural tendency of music, where nothing interferes; it seeks combination, means of broader harmony, grander effects, and the composite enthusiasm of great numbers co-operating to one end. Wherever a considerable unity of this sort becomes once established, it attracts more and more force to it; all related elements gravitate towards it; to the teachers' class of Messrs. Webb and Mason, the choirs of Boston soon came and added themselves, for the numerous chorus thus afforded them; then came finally the orchestra; and accomplished virtuosos also will find a sphere opened for them upon these occasions which they have not at other times. What then is to prevent these meetings from growing by degrees into great musical festivals, like those of London, Birmingham, and parts of Germany? And all by a spontaneous accumulation and expansion, from rude beginnings made with simply what we had, taking up the popular taste as it was, and so organizing its first motions that they lend both weight and stimulus to each other, and rise collectively to an ever higher platform?"

PROVISION FOR THE MUSICIAN. A correspondent invites our attention to an article upon this subject in a London paper. The subject indeed claims the consideration of all interested in the worldly fate of those who minister to the soul's appetite for harmony. We say the soul's appetite, for the secret of the charm of harmony of sounds lies in the fact that it is the type of all other harmony,—moral, social, spiritual, celestial, as well as material. The article truly and feelingly shows how poorly, as a general thing, the professors of this divine art are cared for upon earth; but it only throws out some general hints toward a remedy. These, however, are valuable and may suggest something nearer to the end. The great length of the article (a little superfluous in some parts) prevents our copying the whole; but we have commenced giving on another page the more important portions of it.

IMPORTANT PUBLICATIONS. A large portion of our musical public, here and in all the musical centres of the country, will rejoice to learn that Messrs. Geo. P. Reed & Co. have now in press a cheap, convenient and beautiful edition of the entire oratorio, "Elijah," by Mendelssohn. This has long been a desideratum; for that noble music has become extremely popular wherever it has been performed as often and as well as by our "Handel and Haydn Society;" while no edition of the score could be procured, except the sumptuous one, copy-righted in England, which costs nearly ten dollars. The new edition will be printed on a royal octavo page, in fair and legible type, both notes and words, ornamented with a portrait of the lamented composer, and the price will not exceed two dollars. Every chorus singer should be the owner of a copy, and the performances of Mendelssohn's masterpiece (on a greater or less scale) be no longer limited to the large musical cities.

The same publishers have taken another excellent work in hand; namely, the reprint, in a style conformed as closely as possible to the German edition, of Schumann's Piano-forte "Album." The little book will make many lovers.

MADAME SONTAG. A lady correspondent of the National Intelligencer thus describes her hearing Sontag in London, at the time of the great Exhibition:

"We managed to reach Her Majesty's Theatre at the appointed time, and each of us was welcomed by Mr. Peabody with an exquisite bouquet! The opera was Auber's last, the Prodigal Son, and I was all anxiety for Sontag's first note. She came, and mellifluous, honey-sweet indeed were the sounds I heard. The voice is exquisite, flexible, full, with hautebois mellowness, but not the clarion ring of Grisi's superb organ or Jenny Lind's silver vibrating tones. She is stiff, or rather indifferent, stereotyped in movement, no longer very handsome, with pleasing expression and sweet dark eyes. She has no dramatic talent, no force, nothing of Grisi's strength and majesty of action; her vocalization is exquisitely perfect as the finest musical box; but, like that, it is a machine; she touched me not; she sings with no soul. She cannot approach Lind, for she has not the genius which burns within and lights up the unrivalled Swede! There is nothing spiritual in Sontag; she is a bird, warbling and carolling, deliciously 'tis true, but very near the earth; while Jenny Lind, with the earnest dedication of her marvellous gift to the highest aims of art, carries us with her, as in her inspiration she soars towards heaven."

Local.

THE TEACHERS' CONVENTION, under the direction of Messrs. BAKER and JOHNSON, assembled on Tuesday forenoon and will continue its session day and night until the 20th. The attendance during the day time, for the first three days, has averaged from two to three hundred; in the evening it has been much larger. A few hours each day have been spent in elementary lessons, but the greater part of the time, both morning, afternoon and evening, in the critical practice together of various kinds of music; at one time Psalmody, at another Glees, &c., at another Sacred Choruses. These last have occupied the evenings, and have consisted of some fine pieces, arranged with English words, from Masses, Offertories, &c., by Haydn, Hummel, Cherubini, Jacob Perez, &c., (mostly new to the singers here), sung from the sheets of a forthcoming new collection, called the "Classical Chorus Book." We understand that concerts will probably be given on Wednesday and Thursday evenings of next week, and that the Oratorio of "David" (why not something that wears better?) will make one of the programmes.

The hour of noon has been devoted to general discussion among the members of the Class, of topics connected with the teaching and popular progress of music. One interesting feature, which has occasionally varied the routine, and which might to advantage be made much more of, has been the specimens (by request) of organ-playing, by Mr. Wilcox, from New Haven, and Mr. Southard, one of the conductors of the Convention. These were altogether brief and modest, to be sure, but in good organ style.

THEATRES, HALLS, &c. It is now understood that the estate between the Melodeon and Mason Street has been purchased of the Gas Company by those who have in hand the providing of a new theatrical and opera house. In many respects an excellent situation.

The Evening Gazette says: "The new hall and concert room in Tremont Temple is said to have been suggested by that in Exeter Hall, and the idea of its location in the third story founded upon that celebrated place for public meetings and gigantic concerts."

ALFRED JAEEL gave a concert at Newport Wednesday evening; and Madam BISHOP has been giving concerts there with good success.—ALBONI has sung twice at Saratoga to large and delighted audiences.—In New York a concert is announced by Madame STEPHANI, she who sings the extra high notes in the songs of the Queen of Night in the Zauberflöte.—The French comic opera continues its light, sparkling entertainments at Castle Garden—just the thing for summer in the city.

SONTAG. The Arctic, which sailed for Liverpool this week, is to return freighted with this melodious treasure. One of the Gotham music-dealers has placed on board a splendid thousand-dollar piano for the special use of the Countess on the voyage; and some wide-awake lady enthusiast has in like manner donated a luxurious rocking chair!

There is still doubt as to the personale of Madame Sontag's company; especially in the matter of pianist. One paper hears that it will be Emile Prudent; another that it will be Miss Arabella Goddard, "our young and rising pianist," as the London Athenaeum says.

London.

ENGLISH OPERA. Balfe, with the aid of Bunn as dramatist, has produced at the Surrey Theatre what is said to be his twentieth opera. The Times comments on the sad fact that a man who has composed for the Grand Opera and Opera Comique of Paris, for Her Majesty's in London, &c., should now have to take refuge in a minor theatre.

The piece is a comic opera, called "The Devil's in it," and is a musical version of the old farce, "The Devil's to Pay," and the French ballet, Le Diable à Quatre, which has been performed in Boston and New York.

"We have the Count and his impetuous and tyrannical Countess—the basket-maker and his wife, so passionately addicted to dancing—and the other characters of the ballet, with nothing changed but their names. The story is well adapted to music, and Mr. Bunn has made the best of it, turning the prominent incidents to excellent account. Mr. Balfe has composed an opera, which, if it does not raise his fame as a musician, does not lessen it. It is a real opera buffa, tuneful, sparkling, natural, and full of life and vigor. The important situations are treated in a skilful manner, and the finales and concerted music exhibit the form and completeness which can only be derived from long practice and a thorough command of materials. Many of the pieces are in the composer's happiest vein, and two or three of them are equal in freshness and beauty to anything he has produced. The 'writing,' both for orchestra and voices in combination, as usual with Mr. Balfe, is always easy and polished. The general style of the music is light and fluent; there is no attempt at elaboration; and it is not a small thing to say, that from beginning to end there is nothing tedious, superfluous, or obtrusive."—Times, July 27.

The performance is said to have done great credit to the "minor" theatre. The principal singers were Miss Romer (who is manager, as well as prima donna) Miss Poole, as mezzo soprano, Mr. Borroni as bass, Mr. H. Corri, as baritone, &c. The Daily News says of Balfe:

"He has always shone in the opera buffa. His genius is akin to Auber's, whom he resembles in the variety of elegant and piquant melodies, in the neat construction of his busy scenes of concerted music, and in the brilliancy of his instrumentation. These qualities are conspicuous in all his comic pieces, and in none of them more than in this his last production; in which, indeed, he has shown even more than his usual gaiety and spirit."

MR. LUMLEY. The Morning Chronicle admirably sums up the past career of the great impresario, now forced to quit the hold which he has had for ten years upon London. It appears that he found the affairs of the Opera House in the Haymarket, in 1842, "in a perfect tangle of misfortune—a complicated cobweb, in one corner of which lay the bloated spider of Chancery." Bringing his bold talents and experience to bear upon it, he soon placed it upon such a financial footing, that he could devote himself to the development of the artistic resources of his theatre. To show how he discharged this duty, the Chronicle refers to its former detailed account of the various departments of industry, which go to make up a grand opera, and then begs its readers to multiply the effort there described by the number of operas which Mr. Lumley has brought out for the first time at Her Majesty's.

"Among these are Don Carlos, one of the scientific and elaborate works of M. Costa, at that time the musical director at Her Majesty's—I Moschedieri—Verdi's treatment of The Robbers, the charming Figlia del Re—Roberto il Diavolo, Auber's Gastavus III., Masaniello, and Il Prodigio, Thalberg's first opera, Florinda, Halévy's Tempesta, Beethoven's Fidelio, Herold's Zampa, Alary's Tre Nozze. Besides these are I Due Foscari, I Lombardi, Nabuco, L'Ajo nel Embarozza, I Cantatrice Villane, Medea, Adelia, Don Pasquale, Linda di Chamouni, La Favorita, Roberto Devereux, Maria di Rohan, and the Cosi Fan Tutti. In this list each school of operatic music will be found illustrated by its best specimens, and the learned and classic style, the flowing and voluptuous, the gorgeous and melodramatic, and the sportive and sparkling, are each and all strikingly represented in the répertoire we have examined. Add to these the works which are termed 'stock' operas, &c. Mr. Lumley neither wedded himself to a single school, nor blindly tried every novel experiment that suggested itself; but, while selecting his music in that eminently catholic spirit which is inseparable from true art, he took care that what he submitted to his subscribers should, at all events, be the best of the particular school it professed to illustrate."

After alluding also to "two works of a hybrid character," viz., Felicien David's Desert and Rossini's Stabat Mater, which Lumley was "compelled, by the sensation they produced elsewhere," to afford his subscribers the opportunity of hearing, the writer comes to the brilliant list of exécuteurs:

"Here is such a roll-call as has not often been heard—Jenny Lind, Sontag, Frezzolini, Parodi, Tadolini, Cruvelli, Moltini, Favanti, Castellani, Rita Borio, Catherine Hayes, Rossi Caccia, Giuliani, Ida Bertrand, Fiorentini, Caroline Duprez, Schwartz, Barbieri Nini, Alaymo, Corbari, De La Grange, Albani. How it is that we cannot add Johanna Wagner's name to this list, they best know who know also for what England is alone to be valued. The names of Grisi, Persiani, and other celebrities who had made their English reputation before Mr. Lumley came into the management, will, of course, occur to all readers, who will also remember in how many brilliant evenings those great artists have 'assisted' under Mr. Lumley's régime."

"Among the male artists who have fulfilled engagements with Mr. Lumley are Lablache, Moriani, Rubini, Tamburini, Mario, Gardoni, Calzolari, Fraschini, Gnasco, Baucarde, Sims Reeves, Ronconi, Belletti, Fornasari, Staudigl, Sapenta, Ferranti, Perloti, F. Lablache, and Coletti, with numerous artists of great, but of comparatively second rate merit, as Mercuriale, Susini, Fortini, and Bouché."

This list includes the names of nearly every vocalist who has had European reputation during the period of Lumley's management. After similar review of the ballet department, the writer thankfully and regretfully takes leave of Mr. Lumley, yet at the same time adding:

"We cannot, however, bring ourselves to believe, looking at all that Mr. Lumley has achieved for the interests of the lyric drama, that those who have so frequently and so loudly acknowledged his eminent services will consent to their final discontinuance; and we trust, for the credit of the public for whose higher tastes he has so efficiently and liberally provided, that an earnest and vigorous attempt will yet be made to avert so grave a calamity to the operatic stage."

Mlle. FAVANTI. Regarding the re-appearance of this lady at Her Majesty's, the critics "mingle praise and blame," some of them more harshly than the News, which says:

"Rossini's Cenerentola was presented for the fourth time, Mlle. Favanti sustaining the part of the persecuted heroine, in place of Mlle. Angri. Favanti is an Englishwoman (Miss Edwards), who was a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, and who subsequently sang in Naples. On the 23d of March, 1844, she made her first appearance at Her Majesty's Theatre as Cenerentola, and during the season performed the contralto parts of Fidalma, Orsini, Smeaton, Pippo, and Bonetto in Ricci's Corrado; besides Elvira, in Don Juan; and Adelgisa, in Norma. Much controversy was raised by Mlle. Favanti's début and the injudicious attempt to keep her before the public, in opposition to the opinions of the subscribers, was a fatal mistake of the management. Her return, after an absence of eight years, was looked upon with interest, to ascertain if the defects of her style had been amended by considerable practice in Italy. In one respect a marked improvement has certainly taken place; the production of the voice is no longer attended with the same disagreeable effect, as in 1844. In point of execution something has also been gained in precision; but her imperfect intonation has not yet been remedied; and, with one of the finest voices a vocalist was ever gifted with, Mlle. Favanti still retains the exaggerations which were noticed in former days. Like Mlle. Cruvelli, the organ of Mlle. Favanti ranges from the highest to the lowest of the soprano and contralto registers, and in quality it is infinitely more sympathetic. She fails because she has never thoroughly mastered her scales, and she labors to astonish not to charm. The music of the concerted pieces she sacrifices entirely; in this respect it must be admitted that she only follows the example of Albani; but Mlle. Favanti's great error as a lyric actress has been and is, in supposing that the ensemble of a delineation may be dispensed with, for the sake of the rondo finale; and, so long as she adopts this view, her beautiful voice will not suffice to place her in the rank of a prima donna. The interpretation of the opera, with the exception of Calzolari's Ramiro, most artistically sung, was very unsatisfactory. Lablache was unwell, and out of spirits, and omitted the Miei rampolli."

NEW MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. The News, of July 29th, says: "A new association, for the purpose of performing sacred and classical music both by the ancient and modern schools, has been formed. The performances are to take place in Exeter Hall, under the direction of BENEDICT, the composer and pianist, and Bach's Passione will be one of the earliest novelties. The band and chorus are to be on the grandest scale, comprising the best amateur as well as professional talent. The object of the society will be to strike out a new path by affording an opportunity to living composers to produce their oratorios or cantatas. The greatest attention is to be bestowed on the rehearsals."

THE SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY have published a report for the year 1851, from which it appears that the 21 concerts of that year produced upwards of 9,000*l.*, and that the ordinary expenses connected with them were nearly 7,600*l.* Including subscriptions, the gross receipts of the year exceeded 10,000*l.* Exeter Hall is now closed for alterations and re-decoration; and important improvements are to be made in the organ, which will be entirely reconstructed.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. M. Jullien's Opera: Pietro il Grande is in active rehearsal. Mlle. Zerr and Sig. Tamberlik are in the cast. "Vivian" has great faith in Jullien, "if he will only be Jullien," and not let popularity force him, like Halévy, into attempting grand operas.

Italy.

The first number of the Gazzetta Musicale di Napoli, a new periodical, contains a few notices indicating that musical life is not utterly asleep in the absolutist capital. Even at this burning season, 'Piedigrotta,' a new opera in four acts, by Signor Luigi Ricci, just produced at the 'Teatro Nuovo,' seems to have been moderately successful. Another opera by Maestro Battista is in preparation at the same theatre, with the title of 'Il Corsaro della Guadalupa.' This will be followed by the 'Violetta' of Mercadante. At the 'Teatro Fondo,' 'Dottor Sabato,' by Maestro Puzzone, and 'Elena di Tolosa,' by Maestro Petrella, are promised.—No singer who has not been already named in the Athenaeum is spoken of, with the exception of Signor Pancani, a tenor. The critic compliments him on the possession of a good organ, vigorous and masculine, especially in its middle notes,—but continues, "as a singer we can say little for him. In 'Otello' he makes his task easy, by depriving his part of the larger part of its florid ornaments, which require vocal agility."—The maestri invited to write for the 'Teatro San Carlo' during the coming winter are announced to be, Signori Mercadante, De Giosa and Staffa. "The last maestro," says the 'Gazzetta,' "in order to obtain new musical effects has sought for a subject of the fanciful description;—and to avoid competition with operas of the same description has suggested as subject"—the reader will hardly guess what—"Alceste." Signor Verdi is described as having his hands too full of commissions to have time to promise anything new to "San Carlo." Nor is Signor De Giosa secured, since he, too, is said to be in request,—being at present occupied in setting 'Diego Garias' for the Grand Theatre at Trieste. The same 'Gazzetta' announces an interesting acquisition just made by the Library of the College of Music. This is, a collection of MSS. by Cimarosa. "It is well known," says the paragraph, "that the Maestro sent everything that he composed to Cardinal Gonsalvi, who was his warm admirer, and who bequeathed the collection to Signor Paola Cimarosa, son of the composer. This gentleman has disposed of the MSS. (which include many unpublished works) to the College of Music, for the sum of two thousand ducats, and a life annuity of seventy ducats."—London Athenaeum.

SWEDEN, which has already produced Jenny Lind and Mlle. Nissen, has just sent another songstress, who is said to possess a beautiful voice, most excellently cultivated. This lady's name is Mlle. Westerland. She is at present staying in Berlin, in order to perfect herself in the German language.

VINCENZO BELLINI.

Point not these mysteries to an art,
Lodged above the starry pole;
Pure modulations flowing from the heart
Of divine Love, where wisdom, beauty, truth,
With order dwell in endless youth?

WORDSWORTH.

In the narrow street of St. Christoforo, in Catania, and near the little church of the same order, now superseded by a larger edifice, was born the most beautiful composer of our times. To the imaginative mind of Isabel his name and memory were sacredly endeared. It has been said that no after maturity of judgment can dissolve the spell by which the first poet we ever understood and enjoyed is hallowed in our estimation. On the same principle, the composer whose works are the means of awakening in our hearts a new sense of the wonder and power of his art, whose compositions sway our spirits as no others have done, and address our associations with an eloquence, compared with which all similar language is unimpressive, holds a place in our estimation and affections second to that of no intellectual benefactor. He has opened to us a new world. He has brought a hitherto untried influence to stir the ocean of feeling. He has created yet another joy in the dim circle of our experience, and woven a fresh and perennial flower into the withered garland of life. With the thought of Bellini, embalmed in such a sentiment of gratitude, Isabel, accompanied by the count, who had arranged the visit for her gratification, went forth to view the memorials of the departed that were in the possession of his family.

"The young Vincenzo," said Vittorio, "from his earliest infancy, gave evidence of the genius of his nature. His susceptibility to musical sounds was remarkable. He could be moved, at any time, to tears or laughter, to sadness or ecstasy, by the voice of harmony. While a mere child, after hearing on public occasions a new air, he would, on returning home, from memory transcribe it. At eight years old his little hands ran over the keys of the organ, at the Benedictine convent, with surprising facility. His first compositions were occasional pieces of sacred music. It was early discovered that he was a proper object of patronage, and, soon after arriving at manhood, he was sent, at the expense of government, to study at Naples and Rome. The result of an acquaintance with what had been effected in his art was to make more clearly perceptible to his mind the necessity of a new school. The history of genius in every department is almost always a record of conflicts—of struggles against what is dominant. Thus the early efforts of Bellini were frequently unappreciated and misunderstood. Still he persevered in consulting the oracle of his own gifts, and in developing the peculiar and now universally admired style which marks his compositions. The first of his successful operas was the Pirata, then the Straniera, then the Sonnambula, and then Norma.^{*} In each successive work we can trace a decided progression. The first is pretty, often beautiful; the last is throughout beautiful, and frequently sublime. It is a delightful thought, that in a country where literary talent is repelled by the restrictions on the press, musical genius is untrammelled, and human sentiment may, through this medium, find free and glorious development."

"I have always regarded music," said Isabel, "as the perfection of language."

"Undoubtedly it should be so considered, and although the censors jealously guard the actual ^{*} L'Adelson e Salvini, represented before the Institution at Naples, was the first open experiment of Bellini's genius, followed, in 1826, by Bianca e Fernando, at the St. Carlo Theatre. Il Pirata and La Straniera, successively produced at the Scala in Milan, completely established his reputation. The Montecchi e Capuleti was brought out soon after at Venice. The Sonnambula and Norma at Milan, and the Puritani in Paris.

verbal expressions attached to operas, to a true imagination and just sensibility, the mere notes of masterpieces are perfectly distinguishable, as expressive of the thousand sentiments which sway the heart. Bellini, it is believed, was one of that secret society which has for some time existed, under the title of "Young Italy," whose aim is the restoration of these regions to independence; and we can read, or rather feel, the depth and fervor of his liberal sentiments, breathing in the glowing strains of his last opera—the Puritani."

Thus conversing, they arrived at the residence of his family, where, with emotions of melancholy interest, they viewed the tokens of his brief but brilliant career. There were little remembrancers whose workmanship testified that they were wrought by fair hands; the order of the legion of honor; a rich carpet, worked by the ladies of Milan, with the names of his operas tastefully interwoven, and many fantasies and fragments written by his own hand. There was something indescribably touching in the sight of these trophies. Isabel felt, as she gazed upon them, how empty and unavailing are the tributes men pay to living genius compared with that heritage of fame which is its after-recompense. What were these glittering orders to the breast they once adorned—now mouldering in the grave? And these indications of woman's regard, which, perhaps, more than any other, pleased the heart of the young Catanese? How like the deckings of vanity did they seem now, when he for whom they were playfully wrought was enshrined among the sons of fame! How sad, too, to behold the slight characters and unconnected notes—the recorded inspiration of him who alone could rightly combine and truly set forth their meaning! How affecting to look upon these characters—the pencilling of genius, and remember that the hand which inscribed them was cold in the tomb! But Isabel dwelt longest and most intently upon a miniature of Bellini, taken at the age of twenty-three, after the representation of the Pirata. It portrayed the youthful composer with a pale intellectual countenance, an expansive and noble brow, and hair of the lightest auburn. There was a striking union of gentleness and intelligence, of lofty capacity and kindly feeling, in the portrait.

"How unlike the generality of his countrymen!" exclaimed Isabel, who had looked for the dark eye and hair of the nation.

"Nature, in every respect," replied Vittorio, "marked him for a peculiar being. Yet the softness and quiet repose of the countenance is like his harmony. The mildness of the eye and the delicacy of the complexion speak of refinement. The whole physiognomy is indicative of taste and sentiment, a susceptibility and grace almost womanly, and, at the same time, a thoughtfulness and calm beauty, which speak of intellectual labor and suffering. The face of Bellini here depicted, is like his music, moving, expressive, and graceful. I have seen portraits taken at a later age with less of youth, and perhaps, for that reason, less of interest in their expression. During his lifetime all he received for his works, not absolutely requisite for his support, was immediately sent to his family. And now his aged father may be said, in a double sense, to live on the fame of his son, since, in consideration of that son's arduous labors in the cause of music, which in southern Europe may be considered perhaps the only truly national object of common interest, the old man receives a pension from government, adequate to his maintenance."

"I think," said Isabel, as the party were seated in the opera-house the same evening, "that the great characteristic of Bellini is what may be called his metaphysical accuracy. There is an intimate correspondence between the idea of the drama and the notes of the music. What a perfect tone of disappointed affection lurks in the strain: 'Ah! perche non posso odiarti?'—the favorite air in the Sonnambula; and who that should unpreparedly hear the last duet in Norma, would not instantly feel that it is the mingled expression of despair and fondness? How warlike and rousing are the Druidical choruses, and what peace breathes in the Hymn to the Moon! It is this delicate adaptation of the music to the sentiment, this typifying of emotion in melody, that seems to me to render Bellini's strains so heart-stirring."

"In other words," said Vittorio, "he affects us powerfully, for the same reason that Shakspeare, or any other universally acknowledged genius, excites our sympathy. His music is true. He has been called the Petrarch of harmony, that poet being deemed by the Italians the most perfect portrayer of love."

"And would that his fate had been more like that bard's!" exclaimed Isabel. "How melancholy that he should have died so young, in the very moment, as it were, of success and honor! I shall never forget the sorrow I felt when his death was announced to me. I was in a ball-room. The scene was gay and festive. The band had performed in succession the most admired quadrilles from his operas. I was standing in a circle which surrounded a party of waltzers, and expressed the delight I had received from the airs we had just heard. My companion responded, and sighing, calmly said, 'What a pity he will compose no more!' When I thus learned the fact of his death, and afterwards the particulars, a gloom came over my spirits, which, during the evening, had been uncommonly buoyant. I retired to the most solitary part of the room, and indulged the reflections thus suddenly awakened. 'How few,' thought I, 'of this gay throng, as they dance to the enlivening measures of Bellini, will breathe a sigh for his untimely end, or give a grateful thought to his memory.' Some of the company passed me on their way to the music-room. I joined them. A distinguished amateur, with a fine bass voice, had taken his seat at the instrument. For a moment he turned over the book listlessly, and then, as if inspired by a pleasing recollection, burst forth in that mournfully beautiful cavatina: 'Vi ravviso, luoghi ameni.' He sang it with much feeling. There was silent and profound attention. The tears rose to my eyes. To my excited imagination we seemed to be listening to the dirge of Bellini; and, as the last lengthened note died on the lips of the vocalist—thus, thought I, he expired. Little did I then think I should ever see the native city of the composer, or sit in the opera-house which he doubtless frequented."

"It but this moment occurred to me," replied Vittorio, "that, in this very place Bellini first learned to appreciate the science he afterwards so signally advanced; to realize the expressiveness of the agency he afterwards so effectually wielded; to feel the power of the art to whose advancement he afterwards so nobly contributed. Perhaps here first dawned on his young ambition the thought of being a composer. Perhaps, as the breathings of love, grief, fear, and triumph here stirred his youthful breast, the bright hope of embodying them in thrilling music, and thus living in his 'land's language,' rose, like the star of destiny, before his awakened fancy."

There is a narrow but sequestered road leading from Catania to Cifali, just without the Porta D' Aci. A low plaster wall separates it on both sides from extensive gardens, the site of an ancient burial-place, where memorials of the dead have been frequently disinterred. Over the top of these boundaries the orange and almond trees, in the season of spring, refresh the pedestrian with their blossoms and perfume. In the early mornings of summer, or at the close of the day, this road is often sought by the meditative, being less frequented than most of the other highways leading from the city. There one can stroll along and interest himself with the thought of the now extinct people near whose ruined sepulchres he is treading, or gaze upon the broad face and swelling cone of Etna which rises before him. At an agreeable distance from the commencement of this path is an old monastery of Franciscans. The floor of the venerable church is covered with the deeply-carved tablets, beneath which are the remains of the Catanese nobility, their arms elaborately sculptured upon the cold slabs. Strangers sometimes visit a chapel adjacent to see a well-executed bust, which displays the features of the nobleman who lies beneath, and is thought to be the capo d'opera of a Roman sculptor. The adjoining chapel is assigned as the last resting-place of Vincenzo Bellini, whose monument will soon exhibit its fresh-chiselled aspect amid the time-worn emblems around. Thither, one morning, Isabel and the count wandered, and, after leaving the church, sat upon a stone bench which overlooked the scene, and to her inquiries as to the funeral honors paid, in his native island, to the memory of the composer, he replied:

"You should have witnessed in order to realize the universal grief of the Catanese. Business was suspended. Every voice faltered as it repeated the tidings; every eye was moistened as it marked the badges of mourning. In the capital the same spirit prevailed. There, but a few months previous, the king entered the city, and no voice hailed him, because the professions made at the outset of his reign were unfulfilled. The gifted composer came, and acclamations welcomed him. Every testimony of private regard and public honor was displayed. His sojourn was a festival—so the news of his death created universal grief. Here, in the spirit of antiquity, an oration was pronounced in the theatre, his favorite airs performed, and actors, in the old Sicilian costume, represented the effect of his death by an appropriate piece, with mournful music. In the streets were processions, in the churches masses, and in the heart of every citizen profound regret."

"And this," said Isabel, glancing over the scene, "is a fit place for his repose. He will sleep at the foot of Etna, amid the nobles of his native city. The ladies of this villa, as they wander through the garden in the still summer evening, will sing his most soothing strains. The peasant, as he rides by on his mule, at the cool hour of dawn, will play upon his reeds the gladdest notes, the choir in the church will chant the anthems, and the blind violinist, as he rests by the road-side, cheer himself with the pleasant music of the departed composer."

They rose to depart. As Isabel looked back, and began to lose sight of the ancient convent, she observed a lofty cypress at the corner of the road. As its dense foliage waved solemnly, and its spire-like cone pointed heavenward, it appeared to her saddened fancy like a mournful sentinel, standing to guard from sacrilege, and point out for homage, the last resting-place of Bellini.

Provision for the Musician.

(Concluded.)

We are not, in the heterogeneous suggestions we have here thrown together, endeavoring to invoke public charity on behalf of the musician, though the benevolence of an enlightened people might find a less honorable field for the exertion of its energies. Our observations are addressed first and foremost to musicians themselves. They have in themselves, to speak mechanically, a power, if they knew how to use it. The coals which lie black and inert upon your wharfs are bye and bye converted into an active agency, which is reeling cotton at the rate of millions of yards per minute, or snorting in gusty impatience as it heaves the vessel on its way, or drinks up and disgorges the flood of the mine. The energies of the professional body are now inoperative as the latent power of the coal on the wharf. But the power, though latent, is there, and it only remains for some clever engineer to show them how "to get up the steam."

Is there not sufficient esprit-de-corps amongst them to induce them to aim at letting their individual respectability go hand in hand with the respectability of their order? Comparatively few have been their combined efforts to promote the dignity of the profession. There is the Royal Society for the support of decayed Musicians—an association formed more than a century ago, and, as its name implies, under the highest auspices. Handel, whose heart, after all, seems to have been as gentle as his manner was rough, bequeathed a thousand pounds to this society. Signora Storace also left it a like munificent sum. It is patronized by the élite of the profession, and among its pensioners it reckons, at present, some bearing names of honor. No one, we believe, questions the purity of its officers and directors; but many appear to think that it is conducted much in the spirit of a close corporation. At any rate, it is able to disburse upwards of two thousand pounds yearly in a select way, for the best of purposes, namely, to support dejected age, and to feed and educate the unprotected orphan. A goodly sum in itself, certainly; but one can scarcely avoid asking, — "What is that among so many?"

Professors have but to condescend to take a lesson from the operative bodies, to the effect that "union is strength!" A rope of sand would not raise even an empty bucket from a well. In combination is unlimited power. A trifling quarterage levied upon the whole body would form the nucleus of a fund, from which suffering members might draw relief, not as of charity, but of right. The trade would submit to a certain honorary tribute, in consideration of the advantages derived by them from the working body: a like tribute might be raised, in the shape of black mail, from the concert rooms; while the power of sweet sound might be evoked to do, in annual festivals, for the professors of the art, what it has so often done for strangers, and swell the united fund to an undefinable extent. Here, indeed, is a rich and unlimited source of wealth. What would be the proceeds of a benefit concert in all the music halls and concert rooms in England? — and we might even have the audacity to ask for a yearly collection in every church, under the threat of a strike in the organ lofts in case of recusancy. Sixteen thousand pounds were thrown into the coffers of the Royal Society of Musicians just referred to, as part of the profits of the great Commemoration of Handel, in 1784; and that society also received upwards of two thousand pounds, a fourth part of the proceeds of the Royal Festival, in Westminster Abbey in 1834. The Foundling Hospital netted more than ten thousand pounds, by ten performances of the "Messiah" — in gratitude for which, by the way, the governors of that institution manifested an inclination to bring the composer into court upon the question of his copyright. With such means at their disposal, with a power in their own keeping, which is rivalled by nothing but the geni of an oriental tale, how is it that the profession is so self-denying as to remain worse provided for than almost any body of men that can be named?

It is strange, that, while public sympathy has descended to embrace, not only the children of the honest poor, but even to rescue the juvenile felon and educate him by force — while numerous institutions have been formed for the education of children of all ranks — while the Blue Coat School continues to open its princely halls expressly for the reception of such as do not stand in need of its aid — while Mr. Whiston has been bruising his shins, stumbling amongst the ruins of the magnificent educational establishments of the country in the olden time — "and the spectacle-maker" has been offering the use of his most powerful glasses to assist collegiate bodies to read their own constitutions — it is strange — that, amidst all this educational stir and turmoil, musicians have never once thought of the formation of an institution for affording their children an education suitable to the rank which they are well entitled to claim.

Among the more recent efforts of this nature, we have lately seen a body of men who are by no means famous for provident habits, — the Commercial Travellers — establishing a school for the orphan and necessitous children of members of their society. One could hardly have anticipated so enlightened a movement in such a quarter: while it should be recollected that the necessities of the orphan, it was, that gave birth to the Royal Society of Musicians. Two or three of his contemporaries, while standing at the door of the Orange Coffee-house, in the Haymarket, saw the children of Kytch, the oboe-player, driving milch-asses. They contributed a sum for the rescue of the innocent victims of a father's improvidence; and their contributions formed the basis of this really noble institution. But, since we have begun to institute a comparison, we must remark, that the Travellers annually raise a splendid revenue for making a suitable provision for a large number of children — their last report exhibiting an expenditure of more than six thousand pounds within the year, — while the Musicians' Society, according to the last of their reports, which we have at hand — namely, that of 1847 — seem to have disbursed only NINETY-SEVEN POUNDS for the exact purpose of Education! It must, however, be observed that the aggregate of their expenditure includes also sums paid on behalf of the orphans, of which no particular account is given.

It is not, however, on behalf of the orphans of the recklessly improvident alone that the appeal should be made. There are misfortunes such as no foresight can anticipate — no prudence avert. We cannot refuse ourselves the satisfaction of quoting a passage which happens to be at this moment under our eye, from a sermon preached a hundred and twenty years ago, at the Festival of the Three Choirs, at Hereford; because we should be extremely sorry not to think that there are members of the musical profession to whom it is, in its degree and manner, applicable. "I shall beg leave only," says the preacher, speaking of the children of his deceased brethren, "to observe, what should further bespeak our commiseration of those Friendless Orphans: that the Poverty of their Parents may have been owing to what must be ever esteemed their greatest honor. They are seldom followers of Fortune. Content in their lower Sphere, they are not studious of the Art of Rising nor acquainted with those Compliances, which the wiser children of this world call Prudence."

TRUE POETRY.

The difference between true poetry and factitious poetry is perhaps this: the last is written, the first writes itself. In the one case the poet or poetess appears manifest, in the other the poetry; in the one case it was the evident intention to write some fine lines, in the other case there was something in the heart that must be said. Hence the sharp-sighted Greeks, who knew all these things, symbolized the source of poetry as a fountain. But most of our poetry is taken from wells, or forced up by pumps. It is therefore refreshing to meet with a genuine expression of the soul, like that which I copy for you below. A friend showed these lines to me, and asked who was the writer. I had not seen them, but perhaps some of your readers can say. J. F. C.

I.

O heart! long dormant in thy dreary pain,
Canst thou not rouse thee from the deathlike sleep,
Put forth the blossoms of young joy again,
And cease o'er buried hopes to pine and weep?

II.

Around thee everywhere on life's wide page,
The beauty and the glory liveth still;
The sacred light upon the brow of age,
The strength of youthful hand and earnest will.

III.

Earth hath her field of labor, rich and broad;
Canst thou not in the glorious toil hear part?
Hast thou no gift to be improved for God,
No dew of love for other human heart?

IV.

O heart, poor heart, that madest thyself a tomb
Of one dead hope! fling wide thy charnel door,
And on the depths of that dark, rayless gloom,
The flood of heaven's glad light shall freely pour.

V.

O wasted years! — and yet not wasted all;
Does not the ploughman read, then sow the plain?
What though spring flowers beneath the ploughshare fall;
Shall not the harvest smile with golden grain?

Here is the motto of the New England Psalm Singer or American Chorister, by William Billings, a native of Boston, in New England. The book was published in 1770. —

"O, praise the Lord with one consent,
And in this grand design,
Let Britain and the Colonies Unanimously join!"

By the quality no less than by the fulness and versatility of this collection have we again been led to speculate hopefully on the intense curiosity which prevails in the New World with regard to all manner of works of art and imagination, and to the thoughts and lives of those who produce them. This thick and rather costly book is, after its kind, a manifestation as suggestive as the classes of talking ladies in Boston who assembled to be instructed by Margaret Fuller concerning the "idea of Jupiter," the "idea of Bacchus," and the like Arcadian and classical topics. — London Athenæum.

[From "Reminiscences of MICHAEL KELLY."]

Musical Critics at Rome, A. D. 1779.

The day after our arrival, we went to the Corso, where the sports of the carnival were going on. There was to be seen the whole population of Rome, high and low, rich and poor, en masque; the nobility and ladies in their most splendid equipages, all masqued, throwing sugar-plums to the motley group below, which was composed of mountebanks, pulcinellas, cardinals, harlequins, &c., with music, dancing, singing. — In short, I was in a delirium of pleasure! Every evening, we visited the theatres: — there are two for serious operas, the Aliberti and the Argentina, where the best performers are always found; indeed, should the manager attempt to introduce anything inferior, woe be to him! and, as these theatres are only allowed to be open during the carnival, he is obliged to pay enormous salaries to procure the first singers; for the Romans will have the best or none. There are also two theatres for comic operas, La Capranica and La Valle.

The Romans assume that they are the most sapient critics in the world; they are, certainly, the most severe ones: — they have no medium, — all is delight or disgust. If asked whether a performance or a piece has been successful, the answer, if favorable, is, è andato al settimo cielo, — "it has ascended to the seventh heaven." If it has failed, they say, è andato all' abisso del inferno, "it has sunk to the abyss of hell." The severest critics are the Abbés, who sit in the first row of the pit, each armed with a lighted wax taper in one hand, and a book of the opera in the other; and should any poor devil of a singer miss a word, they call out bravo, bestia, — "bravo, you beast!"

It is customary for the composer of an opera to preside at the piano forte the first three nights of its performance, and a precious time he has of it in Rome. Should any passage in the music strike the audience as similar to one of another composer, they cry, Bravo, il ladro, — "bravo, you thief;" or "bravo, Paesiello! bravo, Sacchini!" if they suppose the passage stolen from them, "the curse of God light on him who first put a pen into your hand to write music!" This I heard said, in the Teatro Aliberti, to the celebrated composer Gazzaniga, who was obliged to sit patiently at the piano forte to hear the flattering commendation.

Cimarosa, who was their idol as a composer, was once so unfortunate as to make use of a movement in a comic opera, at the Teatro della Valle, which reminded them of one of his own, in an opera composed by him for the preceding carnival. An Abbé started up, and said, "Bravo, Cimarosa! you are welcome from Naples; by your music of to-night, it is clear you have neither left your trunk behind you, nor your old music; you are an excellent cook in hashing up old dishes!"

Poggi, the most celebrated buffo singer of his day, always dreaded appearing before those stony-hearted critics; however, tempted by a large sum, he accepted an engagement at the Teatro della Valle. He arrived in Rome some weeks previous to his engagement, hoping to make friends, and form a party in his favor; he procured introductions to the most severe and scurrilous, and thinking to find the way to their hearts through their mouths, gave them splendid dinners daily. One of them, an Abbé, he selected from the rest, as his bosom friend and confidante; he fed, clothed, and supplied him with money; he confided to him his terrors at appearing before an audience so fastidious as the Romans. The Abbé assured him, that he had nothing to fear, as his opinion was looked up to by the whole bench of critics; and when he approved, none dare dissent.

The awful night for poor Poggi at length arrived; his fidus Achates took his usual seat, in his little locked-up chair in the pit. It was agreed between them, that he was to convey to Poggi, by signs, the feeling of the audience towards him;—if they approved, the Abbé was to nod his head; if the contrary, to shake it.—When Poggi had sung his first song, the Abbé nodded, and cried, "Bravo! bravissimo!" but in the second act, Poggi became hoarse, and imperfect; the audience gave a gentle hiss, which disconcerted the afflicted singer, and made him worse: on this, his friend became outrageous, and standing up on his chair, after putting out his wax-light, and closing his book, he looked Poggi in the face, and exclaimed, "Signor Poggi, I am the mouth of truth, and thus declare, that you are decidedly the worst singer that ever appeared in Rome! I also declare, that you ought to be hooted off the stage for your impudence, in imposing on my simple and credulous good nature as you have done." This produced roars of laughter, and poor Poggi retired, never to appear again, without even exclaiming, Et tu Brute, which he might most appropriately have applied to his guardian crony.

A circumstance something like this took place at the Teatro Argentina. A tenor singer of the name of Gabrielli, brother of the great female singer of that name, was engaged there. Before he had got through five bars of his first song, the critics began to hiss and hoot, (and very deservedly so, for he was execrable), saying, "Get away, you cursed raven!" "Get off, you Goat!" On which he came forward and addressed the audience very mildly, "You fancy you are mortifying me, by hooting me; you are grossly deceived; on the contrary, I applaud your judgment, for I solemnly declare to you, that I never appeared on any stage without receiving the same treatment, and sometimes much worse!" This appeal, though it produced a momentary laugh, could not procure a second appearance for the poor fellow.

Strauss and his Sophie Waltz.

JOHN STRAUSS may indeed merit the epithet of the modern Orpheus, for his tender, moving, and soul-stirring music cannot fail to conquer the most inveterate enemy of Terpsichore. Ye sons and daughters of revelry, who have oft listened to his ever-gushing, inexhaustible fount of melody, cannot ye say with me that the magic sounds might indeed soothe hearts, still sighs, dry tears, tame wild beasts, and even move the stones themselves? Ye must have observed the full and syren-like beauty and poetry of his melody, in one phrase of which may be found more music—real music, than in many a heavy score. And it is not the melody alone which seizes with magical influence on the brain, and finds its way into every nook and corner of our being, but the rhythm is irresistible. His violin is the talisman by which he brings forth from the inward recess of the human soul the brightest seraphic joy, the deepest, direful woe, and then mingles them with Jove-like hand. The bow with which he draws these various colored tones from his instrument is the magic wand, which touching the desponding and grief-torn soul with a precious and healing balm of joy, lends her wings to rise phœnix-like high, high into the heaven of peace. There are numerous waltz compositions as rich in melody, but few are as rich in that melting rhythm which characterizes the music of Strauss. By turns skipping, humming, waltzing, gliding and dancing, so inviting, so irresistible that no one—without a dancer—can withstand their witching and magical influence. He is the idol of women. In every house, on every piano in Vienna, lie Strauss' waltzes. He has written over two hundred, all are favorites, all are sung, and trilled, and played throughout Europe. Plebeian and aristocrat hum and pipe them, orchestra and barrel-organ play them. We hear them in the street, at the ball, in the garden, and at the theatre. The dancing

Viennese carry him in triumph on their shoulders, and shout "Strauss for ever," the rest of Europe re-echoes the sound and cries "Strauss for ever."

Strauss, the waltz-hero, loved the daughter of a count. Sophie was her name. Her eye as blue as Italy's heaven, and softer than the sweet light of the evening star. Grace and beauty shone forth in every motion, and sweet melody in every tone. He would have given worlds to have won but one glance of love from this beautiful being, but she was cold and stern. Madness indeed it was for a poor wandering musician, with nothing but his violin, to dare to love the high-born Sophie, who had as many noble ancestors as he had waltzes.

"Rash impertinence," said Sophie; and when he came to give her brother a lesson she scarcely deigned to give him a look. Shortly afterwards Sophie became the betrothed of the Count Robert, Lord Chamberlain, who also could boast as many proud ancestors as the fair Sophie, but beyond these and his titles he had nothing else.

One day Strauss chanced to be alone with Sophie; he sank upon his knees before her, and with the burning words of the maddening passion, declared his love, and besought her to give him but one word or look ere he was driven to despair. But no tears or protestations could move her, she was as cold and unfeeling as the inanimate marble. "I am the affianced bride of Count Robert," she said, laughingly, "and if it were otherwise, think you I would become the wife of a poor musician?" She turned scornfully away and left him alone in his grief and despair. The repentance which soon awoke in the heart of Sophie came too late. The bridegroom and her father hastened the nuptial day—in eight days she would become the wife of Count Robert. The ceremony was to be performed in the grand saloon of the city, and the Count called on Strauss to request him to lead the orchestra on the occasion, and to honor his bride with the composition of a new waltz.

Strauss, the most miserable man in God's universe, promised him both. "He wishes to wound me yet more deeply," said the unhappy man to himself, "but I pardon him, and my prayer to heaven is that she may be happy, and that she never repent her choice."

But his waltz! a thought strikes him, it shall be the interpreter of his passion and his grief to Sophie, it should challenge her pity, if not her love. Oh! what glorious power, to be able to speak, to reproach, to plead; and through his divine art. To work! to work!

When all the great city slept, Strauss took his violin, opened his window, gazed out into the cold night, and improvised and moaned forth his sad tale of woe to the sweet stars above, who looked kindly down on the desolate and heart-stricken.

The day of the wedding came at last. The fearful agony of love had given him a waltz every measure of which spoke a longing sorrow and despairing woe. The hall glistened and shone with bright jewels and brighter eyes, but Sophie was more gloriously beautiful than them all. The richest gems lent their beauty and their lustre; the pure myrtle wreath bloomed in her golden hair, and the rare and costly veil shaded her beautiful features from the full gaze of the admiring crowd. Strauss, a haggard, emaciated man, with brilliant and piercing black eyes, sharp and strongly marked features, dressed from head to foot in black, as though he had assumed this mourning livery for the bride now dead to him, stood sad and silent in the gallery above, directing the movements of the orchestra. Sophie danced now with one, now with another of the wedding guests, and as often as she paused after the giddy whirl of the dance, she turned her eyes towards the pale and grief-stricken Strauss, in his robes of sorrow and mourning, and each time met his piercing look of despairing love.

It was more than pity she felt, it was remorse, it was a kindled love. A terrible pain awoke in her heart, like the swelling of a stream, growing ever deeper and wider in its onward course, which threatened to overwhelm and destroy her. How gladly would she have wept, but she dared not.

It sounded twelve; Strauss gave the signal for the performance of his new waltz. The gay dancers stood up, Sophie on the arm of the happy bridegroom. All stand spell-bound with the magic witchery of those magic sounds. They forget to dance, they gaze in wonder up at the pale man in black, whose grief-torn soul breathes out its woe through his beloved instrument. His bow moved with his heart, his spirit moves in unison. The bridegroom leads off the dance, and Strauss, with fascinated, tearful eyes, and torn heart, follows the flying pair in their giddy whirl. They dance, and dance, and dance, and still do not cease. Strauss plays, and plays, and no stop to his wonderful waltz, which so fearfully affects both him and them. They still dance, and dance; he plays, and plays; as sudden as the lightning's flash the E of his violin snaps, and at the same moment the beautiful Sophie falls dead upon the floor. Violin and bow fall from his trembling hands, and with a cry of horror, he shrieks "Sophie!" and falls fainting on the ground.

Since Sophie's death, the waltz is called by her name. Strauss loved her to the last moment of his existence. He, too, is now dead, but his charming Sophie waltz still lives.—London Musical World.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 21, 1852.

BELLINI. On our first page is a pleasant article, (perhaps we may say reminiscence of early enthusiasm,) about this graceful and pathetic composer, kindly furnished us in anticipation of his forthcoming volume by our friend Tucker-man. We cannot agree with him, however, that Bellini was the most beautiful composer of our times, or that Norma, if throughout beautiful, is ever sublime. Indeed we have no memory of Bellini which suggests that term. His sweetly sad and tender strains have exercised a rare fascination upon all musically or poetically susceptible natures at some time, generally the rose-colored time of life. They are always graceful, always pathetic; but the almost uniform experience with regard to this music is that it is not bracing, strong, invigorating; that one wearies of the play upon the same ceaseless monochord of tender passion; and that the Bellini melody becomes at last, wherever met in any of his operas, only so much more variation of the old strain easily recognizable. It is only when we do not know Beethoven, or Weber, or Mendelssohn, or Mozart, that Bellini so takes possession of us as to fill our whole musical horizon. Coming after Rossini's sparkling bravura, he was welcome as one who more touched the heart. But then mere sentiment at last grows weak and sickly, and the explorer in the magic world of music is apt to come round again to Rossini to enjoy the vastly greater wealth and variety of actual invention, and to find in him the genius and the spring of the whole modern Italian lyric school. And what shall he say, when he comes to explore among the Germans!

Still the life and music of Bellini are a beautiful, poetic whole; and it is often pleasant, and indeed wholesome, to go back to that youthful glow of sentiment, in which he has been such a near friend and interpreter to so many.

But we have already given our impression of Bellini, somewhat fully, as contrasted with that of several other great composers, in a former number.

The Musical Convention.

The gathering is scarcely at its climax, while we write; but it will be all over by the time this reaches our subscribers. The time consumed in frequent attendance (yet by no means constant) on the exercises, with the excitement and confusion of so much novelty and promiscuity, hardly allows of a calm, clear-headed, comprehensive survey and estimate of the whole affair. Yet every step so far has been full of suggestion. We always find it so with these "Conventions," howsoever and by whomsoever conducted. They revive all the questions and speculations about the progress of music in this country; they perpetually renew the wonder, with which one contemplates this strange, prodigious Yankee activity in the manufacture, compilation, adaptation or perversion of loads upon loads of books of psalmody, glees, anthems, organ voluntaries and elementary treatises, to feed the not-over-squeamish, nor even delicate appetite for something more to sing, which they create throughout the country. They force upon one, again and again, the question whether all this musical ambition, which has developed itself in so many great schools or parties, that love to "sit in convention assembled," really points to a day when we shall be truly a musical people.

These great and general questions mingle themselves so much with the special observations and criticisms that occur in watching the movement day by day of such a gathering, as to make us wish to put the whole thing off at a good distance from us, before we can trust ourselves to see it in its true relations and seize its whole significance. Nevertheless we must remember that we are an editor, and begin, as we are in mediis rebus; simply recording for the present some notes of what we have witnessed, with such chance comments as they may suggest.

1. NUMBERS AND ORGANIZATION.

The number in attendance it has been hard to estimate, because it has varied very much from time to time, and because at all times one was puzzled to distinguish the "floating population,"—consisting of various honorary or ex-members of former classes, musical professors and friends of the conductors, clergymen interested in music, choristers of the city, editors and critics, &c., &c.—from the constant nucleus of the Class. There was always a clear centre and focus of business in the crowd, to be sure; but actual membership seemed to be a thing of more or less, graduated from that centre outwards to the curious and critical on-lookers on the outskirts, buzzing and speculating by the doors and in the lobbies. At no time has the number, both of participants and "lookers on in Venice" come so near to overflowing the Melodeon, as we were led last week to anticipate; and yet it has steadily increased from day to day. Some exercises have been less attractive than others; some are sure to draw many of the bystanders into the ranks of active participants; while others as surely create a reflux tide. A financial statement from the managers, showing how many persons have bought tickets to the course, would alone show the number really enlisted for the war; but that is a matter of their private business, which we do not know that they are under any obligation to make public. The largest number that we have seen at any one time engaged in an exercise, could not have been far from four hundred,—recruited possibly by an extra hundred at the concerts.

This fluctuation of numbers has naturally involved more or less looseness of organization, and lack of unity, promptness and progressive method. It was plain to see that the ten days' period was not economized to the best advantage; teachers and all of course felt it; at the same time it would require a great head, great means and great preparation to secure any such ideal economy. It is really a great work to conduct through one of these conventions; and if at first we were continually impressed by a sense of lack of sufficient organization; if the materials appeared not to have been carefully enough "cut and dried" beforehand; if many times the thing seemed to hang fire, all parties being somewhat at a loss what to undertake next, and looking wistfully about for some volunteer singer, or organist, or ready lecturer to step in and play the part of a good Providence; if too many gaps had to be filled up with "talking against time" and divers amiable apologetic twaddle;—yet after all, our wonder was that so much good was in the long run evolved, by one means or another, if only by the mere magnetic contact of meeting so much together, with minds addressed towards a common end. Considering there was no bond or pledge of constancy on the part of the pupils, except free attraction, and that each came and went as inclination prompted, it was wonderful how far a very simple organization went. Each day had its programme, which was pretty regularly followed, wisely leaving room for chance varieties and opportunities of listening to artists and specimens of various kinds of music, which had to be taken as they came.

On the whole, we find ourselves arriving at the same conclusion, that we have at all of the Conventions before: namely, that, although there has been much that was valuable in the way of direct instruction by the Professors, yet the incidental advantages of such occasions are their greatest recommendation. It is like going to College. The great majority of graduates, when asked what they have gained by College life, will tell you that they are conscious of more benefit received from simply living in the academic atmosphere, with young and ardent fellows of like intellectual aspirations with themselves, and amid the inspiring circumstances of the place, than from the direct teaching of the text-book and professor. Stimulus to the musical desire, the musical curiosity, the musical faculty,—stimulus from the meeting of many active minds, and the flowing into the vortex thus created of much of the surrounding musical element (singers, players, bands, &c., volunteering specimens of their skill and of the works of composers known too merely by their names):—this is the vital principle and spring of influence in musical conventions; this is what, by an instinctive calculation, guarantees the country chorister and singing-teacher that he will not lose his week spent in attendance on these meetings, whatever the teaching, and whoever the conductor.

Let us now try to follow, in memory, the order of a working day in the convention;—a day, however, patched together out of parts of several days, the subjects of our intermittent observation.

2. THE ELEMENTARY LESSONS.

The early morning hours of each day, from eight till ten o'clock, have been devoted to a course of lessons in Harmony and Thorough Bass, followed by another in the simple Rudiments of Reading, Writing, and Singing Music, (more especially with reference to the art of teaching them to others), by Mr. A. N. JOHNSON. Not having been able to command these hours, we can say nothing from personal observation. But in confirmation of our general remark above it may be said, that year by year the interest of the classes, in these dry exercises, once the origin and substance of the whole thing, has been on the decrease. It is not this mainly that they come for; the rudiments have got pretty generally spread; the novelty of the matter is exhausted; and this feature of the musico-educational session has shrunk into a less space than it formerly occupied, to make room for more practice and more hearing of the live substance of music itself. Yet there are those, who need and who come to learn these things, and the programme would be incomplete without them. The other exercises of the day, however, show that the great majority of the rank and file in these convention classes are already readers of music—of course with limitations.

3. GLEE AND CHORUS PRACTICE.

This has occupied the hours from 10 to 11 A. M. and from 3 to 4 P. M.; the whole class, under the direction of Mr. L. H. SOUTHARD, (one of the most talented, accomplished and sound among our young native musicians,) singing four-part pieces from a new collection just issued by Messrs. Baker and Southard, under the title of "Union Glee Book." We dread every new book added to the stock of native manufacture; since commonly musical genius and even taste have had much less to do with such productions, than a shrewd eye to mere money gain. It was encouraging, therefore, to hear three or four pieces from this book, original compositions, too, which alone were enough to save any book. One piece, by Mr. Southard, to words from Ossian ("Where thou, a Stone, dost moulder down, and lose thee in the moss of years, there shall the traveller, whistling, pass," &c.,) compares well in real beauty, dignity and contrapuntal character of style with any young American effort at composition, which we now recall. It is wrought up in a manner worthy of Dr. Callcott; and when it comes to the triumphant portion of the words: "But Fingal shall be clothed with fame," a clear, manly, and vigorous fugue sets in and proceeds with unflagging energy to the close. This piece speaks well for the original force, as well as true, persevering classical study, of the young author. And it spoke well for the growth of musical perception in the general mass of the convention, that they knew that it was good. A light little Barcarolle of Mr. Southard's also, in a minor key, and somewhat Mendelssohnian spirit, had a pleasing effect. There was also rehearsed a sort of vocal Notturmo (also by the same) with an obligato tenor melody, accompanied in sustained vowel harmonies by the whole chorus, in which there were beautiful and ingenious effects; but these were scarcely to be brought out without long practice. Indeed it was rather an instrumental than a vocal piece. A bright and jovial Glee, by Mr. Baker, also told agreeably upon the audience. These pieces were accompanied by Mr. BUTLER at the organ, and by Mr. LEAVENS and Mr. FITZ, at a grand and a square piano—not a good combination in any case, but less offensive here than in some other kinds of music of which we have to speak. The practice was thoroughly conducted, stopping frequently to reiterate a passage until the composer-conductor's idea was satisfied; and one could not listen two or three days in succession, without feeling that much had actually been learned. Indeed these conventions, viewed as singing meetings, always seem like a daily growth from chaos into some approach to order.

4. CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE.

This exercise, under the conduct of Mr. B. F. BAKER, occupied the hour from eleven to twelve, and seemed to be always well attended. The art of delivering the voice, of producing pure, musical tone, was one of too great intrinsic interest to all our native singers, to be slighted. Of course, in these few brief opportunities, the teacher could do little more than point out a few of the most essential principles and points of a true method, prescribing the model, characterizing in contrast (which in the nature of the case involved caricaturing) the prevailing false habits, and leading the whole choir to practice each point over and over together, criticizing and correcting until it sounded right. Like all true teachers of the voice, he reduced the great mysteries of the art to a few, (we might almost say) to one very little formula—just a couple of 4-4 measures, which stood almost always written on the black-board, filled by one long note, with the sign of the swell and dimuendo over it. In this one art of properly commencing, swelling, diminishing and ending one tone, lies the first principle and secret of all graceful delivery of the voice; it gives the singer from the first a model, an ideal, as it were in the germ, of that ever undulating line of beauty which should mark equally the phrase, the passage, the whole composition. It was delightful to contrast the effect (in full unison chorus) of this one lesson thoroughly practised, with the first coarse and confused attempts. Simply raising the pitch of the second half of the formula one note introduced another important lesson, that of the portamento, or art of carrying the voice from one note to another. How many bad singers, who want neither execution nor feeling, would quite revolutionize their entire style, (or more properly, get style, where they had none), by radically attending to these two seemingly little, but really very great points!—The difference of the legato and staccato manners, the nature of vowel and consonant sounds, &c., &c., were among the points explained and illustrated. But we were only an occasional witness, and cannot detail the whole course.

5. ORGAN-PLAYING.

A pleasant episode here followed, at least on several days. We were glad to see partly realized a wish which we have long had with regard to these conventions; namely, that an hour, more or less, should be consecrated each day to listening to specimens of organ-playing, in the true forms of organ music. This sublime instrument is notoriously trifled with and desecrated in most of the churches in our land. In the country, especially, it is seldom known what organ-playing is. The true, the lofty contrapuntal style, the real organ style, which, if not always fugue, has always the fugue principle, or fugue spirit in it, is often so much Greek to the uninitiated at first hearing. But a few hearings prepare the mind to feel, if not to understand its meaning; and the style is sure to grow upon one with a wondrous power. Here then is the opportunity, while singers are assembled from all parts of the country for so many days, to call in all the principal organists (resident or visitors) to give in turn some specimens of their best skill in the best music.

How far this was done on the present occasion we must tell next week, for our space is exhausted. The Concerts and some other episodes and exercises, also, still await their turn of mention.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

MME. WIEDMANN, prima donna from the operas at New Orleans and Paris, is in Boston, with Sig. GENIBREL, primo basso, and Sig. C. BASSINI, the violinist, whose performance in New York won high approval. They give a concert next week. The audience at the Convention Thursday evening seemed delighted with a touch of their quality. The lady is plainly of the Pasta and Parodi school,—vastly superior to Parodi—of the impassioned, intense order, needing the stage with room for action, but with a glorious mezzo soprano or contralto voice. There was genuine power in all she did, and we doubt if we have yet had so good a specimen of this French-Italian School. No room now for more.

OPERA HOUSE. The current report, which had gone the round of the newspapers uncontradicted, and which we copied last week, to the effect that the estate back of the Melodeon had been purchased for this object, turns out to be incorrect. The Gas company hold it at too high a price.

THE OPENING. We understand that all the principal musical societies in Boston have volunteered to take part in a grand opening concert or festival of the new Music Hall. These are, the Handel and Haydn Society, the Musical Education Society, the Musical Fund Society, the German "Maenner-Chor," under Mr. Kreissmann, and (as having established a pretty kindred relationship with Boston, by repeated and long visits) the Germania Musical Society. The best available solo talent, at that time in the country, will also probably be engaged. We hope that it will be made more than one concert; that it will be made a festival, with a morning, afternoon and evening performance; one being oratorio, another instrumental, in the great form of symphony, &c.; and the third miscellaneous. Such an announcement would draw many to the city and redound to the treasury of the Music Hall,—perhaps go far towards furnishing the means for a first-class organ, which seems all-essential to the completeness of its character, as the Music Hall of Boston.

TREMONT TEMPLE is rebuilding rapidly. It is said (we know not with what authority) that it also will be finished in November. The great hall, whose floor is to cover the entire third story of the building, will, it is said, equal in area the Boston Music Hall. A superb organ, on a larger scale than any in this country, is already commenced for it, at the factory of the Messrs. Hook, in this city.

MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY. At a meeting held on Friday, of last week, Mr. AUGUST FRIES was chosen conductor, and Mr. RIBAS substitute, in place of Mr. GEORGE J. WEBB, whose other cares and duties compel him to resign this. He still continues, we understand, to serve as President. The rehearsals will commence next month, and the new music selected in Europe by Mr. Fries, to supply the place of that lost in the Tremont Temple, is already on its way.

MR. HELMSMÜLLER's connection with the "Germania Society" has ceased. A gentleman from Baltimore succeeds him as agent.

England.

THE FESTIVALS. The London season, of Operas, Chamber Concerts, Philharmonics, &c., is over; only one novelty remained—Jullien's new opera at the Royal Italian—"and then" (says the Musical World) "away, not to the moors, but to the musical festivals." These will about consume the month of September; three of them, giants, treading one close upon the heels of another. First and greatest comes the

1. BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL, on the 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th of September. The principal singers engaged are:

"Madame Viardot Garcia, Madame Castellan, Miss Dolby, Mlle. Anna Zerr, Mlle. Bertrandi, Miss M. Williams, and Madame Clara Novello; Signor Tamberlik, Mr. Lockey, Mr. T. Williams, and Mr. Sims Reeves; Herr Formes, Mr. Weiss, Signor Polonini, and Signor Belletti. The principal solo performers are:—Violin, M. Sainton; violoncello, Signor Piatti; contrabasso, Signor Bottesini."

The programmes are of the solid, mountainous order, which it would frighten anybody but John Bull to think of trying to digest. Five heavy oratorios in four days! In the first two days Mendelssohn occupies almost the whole field, especially two of his posthumous works, here given for the first time. The following is an outline.

Tuesday morning—Elijah.

Tuesday evening—Walpurgis Night, and miscellaneous concert.

Wednesday morning—Mendelssohn's Christus, a motet of Dr. Wesley, and the Creation.

Wednesday evening—Miscellaneous concert, including the finale to Loreley, by Mendelssohn.

Thursday morning—The Messiah.

Thursday evening—Beethoven's Choral Symphony, and a miscellaneous concert.

Friday morning—Samson, which has never been performed at any Birmingham Musical Festival in a complete form.

Mr. Costa will be conductor. The Chorus will consist of 80 sopranos, 80 altos, 80 tenors and 84 basses; the orchestra, of 28 first violins (Sainton and Blagrove being principals), 26 second violins, 18 tenors, 19 violoncellos (including Piatti, solo,) 17 double-basses (including Bottesini, solo,) 4 flutes, 4 oboes, 4 clarinets, 4 bassoons, 4 trumpets, 4 horns, 3 trombones, 1 ophicleide, 2 serpents; drums, triangle &c.

2. HEREFORD FESTIVAL. The "Festival of the three Choirs" of Worcester, Hereford and Gloucester, will commence on Monday, September 13th, and close on Friday, the 17th. We copy from the Times of August 3d:

"There will be as usual four performances of sacred music at the Cathedral, and three evening concerts at the Shire-hall. On Tuesday morning (the 14th) there will be, as customary, full cathedral service and a sermon. The service will open with the 100th Psalm, old version (Luther,) the preces, responses, and chant will all be Tallis's, and the Te Deum, as usual, that composed by Handel for the Dettingen victory. The anthem selected is one by the organist of Hereford Cathedral and the conductor of the festival, Mr. G. Townsend Smith, 'Behold God is mighty;' and before the sermon an anthem by Mendelssohn, from Psalm 95, 'O come let us worship,' will be given. Dr. Croft's 'Cry aloud and shout' will follow the sermon. On Wednesday morning Haydn's Creation, will be given entire; the principal solo parts by the principal singers, Clara Novello, Miss Williams, Mrs. Endersohn, Herr Formes, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Phillips. Mr. Sims Reeves will also sing the recitative and air, 'Sound an alarm,' from Judas Maccabees; and the Kyrie Eleison, the Gloria, Sanctus, and Benedictus, from Beethoven's service in C will close the second morning's performance of sacred music. On Thursday morning there will be a double attraction in two oratorios not very frequently performed at these festivals, viz., Mendelssohn's St Paul and Dr. Spohr's Last Judgment. Friday, the last morning, will be devoted as usual to the Messiah. The evening concerts at the Shire-hall present no great novelty, if we except the introduction of glees and madrigals, which of late, especially since the establishment of the 'English Glee and Madrigal Union,' have become more popular and fashionable. All three of the concerts are 'Miscellaneous,' comprising excerpts from the repertoires of the old opera and instrumental composers, Spohr, Mozart, Bellini, Weber, Donizetti, Beethoven, &c., with some bits from more modern writers; glees by Webb, Sir H. Bishop, the Earl of Mornington, Dr. Arne and Stevens; and madrigals by Welbys and Macfarren. The principal singers have also songs allotted to them. In the secular instrumental department we have the overtures to Mozart's Zauberflöte, Weber's Oberon, a concert overture in A minor (MS.), by A. Mellor, and Rossini's Guillaume Tell. Beethoven's Symphony in D will be given on the Wednesday evening, and a symphony in A major by Mendelssohn will open Thursday evening's performances. As usual at Hereford there will be a ball after the concerts on Tuesday and Thursday evenings. The band is from the usual London sources, under the leadership of Mr. H. Blagrove, and the chorus is selected from the Philharmonic Concerts, and the cathedral choirs and choral societies of Hereford, Gloucester and Worcester."

3. NORWICH FESTIVAL. Sept. 21st, 22d, 23d and 24th. This was postponed last year on account of the absence in America of M. Jules Benedict, who has usually conducted it. This year again he directs all the arrangements. He has engaged as principal singers: Madame Viardot, Madame Fiorentini, Misses Louisa Pyne, Dolby, and Alleyne; Messrs. Sims Reeves, Locket, and Weiss, Signor Gardoni, Signor Belletti, and Herr Formes.

The programme promises a great amount of novelty. There will be two new English oratorios; one by Dr. Bexfield, and one by Mr. Pierson, who formerly held the chair as Professor of Music at the University of Edinburgh.

The evening concerts will comprise selections from Spohr's Faust, Macfarren's Charles the Second, Meyerbeer's Prophète, Benedict's Minnesinger, the finale of Mendelssohn's unfinished opera, Loreley, and the Midsummer Night's Dream of the same composer, with Mrs. Fanny Kemble to read the text.

The orchestra and chorus will be on the same magnificent scale as is usual at the Norwich Festival. More than one hundred of the executants have been selected from London. The soloists will be Sainton, Blagrove, and Bottesini.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. Among the last performances were the Puritani and Anna Bolena, with Grisi and Mario in each. In the Percy of the latter piece, Mario is said (by the Musical World) to have surpassed Rubini, and that "in spite of a certain prodigality in the use of the falsetto" in the cavatina: Vivi tu. Marini's Henry VIII. was "studied and careful, but somewhat wanting in the necessary weight and dignity."

Julien's first lyric work: Pietro il Grande, was announced for August 7th. Great was the curiosity to hear; the singers delighted with their parts, and success predicted by the rehearsal-favored cognoscenti. We find the following account of the plot:

"The piece is divided into three acts. In act one, Peter and his suite are working in the dockyard of Zaandam, in Holland. They are all disguised. Among the women who supply the workmen with provisions is Catherine, who falls in love with Peter. Catherine has a sweetheart, whom she makes jealous by her seeming preference to Peter. This gives rise to a 'row,' which leads to an attempt on the part of the sweetheart to kill Peter when all have retired, but Catherine steps in and saves his life. Subsequently, Peter's incognito is disclosed, when he sets sail for Russia, leaving poor Catherine in despair.

"In the second act—several years subsequent to the first, according to history—the scene takes place before the battle of Pultava, or Pultowa. The Russian and Swedish armies are encamped within sight of each other. Peter, secure in his position, gives a grand feast in his tent. In the midst of their revelling, Catherine breaks into their tent, and informs them that the Swedish army is being reinforced by an immense body of Turkish troops, and that the two armies together are marching upon the Russian camp. At Catherine's instigation, Peter gives her jewels of price, with which she hastens to the Grand Vizier, and induces him, by these presents and her own melting words, to draw off his force. The Swedes alone attack the Russians, and are defeated with great loss. Thus Catherine saves Peter and his entire army from destruction.

"In act the third, we are in the Kremlin, at Moscow. It is night, and a band of conspirators steal into the silent and deserted street, and there swear to assassinate Peter that night. Heading the conspirators is Rossomak, Hetman of the Cossacks—the Iago of the piece—who hates Peter for several reasons, and is banished by him to Siberia. The conspirators have escaped from the mines of Siberia, and have come to Moscow to take revenge on Peter for his fancied neglect and severities. Time and circumstances favor their attempt. It is the night when, according to royal Russian usage, the Tzar has to select his empress from the daughters of the Boyars or noblemen assembled on the occasion. (In this incident, Mr. Desmond Ryan is borne out by history. After such fashion did Alexis, father of Peter, choose his Tzarina.) The Royal Palace is thrown open, and all visitors admitted. So far, so good for the assassins. While they take the oath of murder in the street, they are overheard. Catherine, in the hope of again seeing Peter, has journeyed to Moscow, and has just entered within the Kremlin, and in sight of the Palace, when she falls exhausted on the steps of a church door, and hearing footsteps, conceals herself behind a pillar. In this position she learns the designs of the conspirators; and when they depart, she hastens to the palace, gains admission to Peter, and apprises him of his danger. Precautions are carefully taken, by which the assassins are drawn into their own net and entrapped. Peter, who loves 'even-handed justice,' deals with Rossomak himself, and kills him with the weapon directed against his own life. Thus Peter, for the third time, is saved by Catherine, and acknowledging the interposition of Providence in her person, he selects her for his imperial partner.

"The author of the book has violated history to the utmost," &c.

"The following will be the cast of the principals:—

Peter, Tamberlik; Menzikoff, Stigelli; Galitzin, Soldi; Lefort, Tagliacico; Sherematoff, Polonini; Bauer, Luigi Mei; Hetman Rossomak, Formes; Zeinberg, Rommi; and Catherine, Anna Zerr.

"Upon the scenery, decorations, and appointments, the management has been more lavish than ever. The battle scene, in the second act, we understand, will be one of the most gorgeous and magnificent spectacles ever presented on any stage; while the imperial throne-room, in the last act, with the assemblage of courtiers, nobles, ladies, pages, officers of all hues and climes, &c., &c., will be no less striking and splendid.

"The ballet constitutes an important item in Julien's opera. In the first act a grand fête takes place in the dockyard of Zaandam, in which there are some exceedingly charming and characteristic dances; and in the last scene, in the palace, there is introduced the Mazurka, Polonaise, and dances with choruses."

HER MAJESTY'S. Sontag, it appears, declines singing twelve nights, as announced, before visiting America. Lumley brings a suit against her in Paris; but the Countess pleads that certain monies had not been prepaid at the time Lumley promised.

Among the recent performances, the appearance of Mme. Charton in the Sonnambula has excited most attention. The Athenæum joins in the general praise of this lady's performances in French comic opera at the St. James's Theatre:

"There, the agreeable and caressing tones of her voice, the expressiveness and pretty grace of her personations, made want of power unfit and want of finish forgotten. But the requirements of Bellini are not more different from those of Auber and Thomas than are the attributes respectively demanded by Mr. Lumley's and by Mr. Mitchell's theatres; and we are sorry that if the clever and charming lady must exchange the small French for the great Italian stage, she should have ventured her first experiment by attempting La Sonnambula in a theatre where Pasta, Persiani, Lind and Sontag have been the Aminas before her, and without apparently having prepared herself for change of occupation by practice.—Her voice has not attained the length and largeness of delivery demanded by Italian cantabile: her execution is not sufficiently clear or accentuated to deliver the bravura passages belonging to the two great airs which the part contains. Want of stamens and a smallness were to be felt throughout Mme. Charton's treatment of the music, somewhat at variance with her true and unaffected conception of the simplicity, tenderness and distress of the character. Her Italian, too, is curiously nipped and pinched, and every vowel is mystified. In short, Madame Charton has a long course of up-hill vocal labor to go through, which she may not prove physically qualified to sustain, before she can maintain a prominent place on the Italian stage. Yet, however obviously this be needed, a personal charm and (to repeat our first epithet) pleasantness kept the new Amina in the good graces of her audience."

MORE POSTHUMOUS WORKS OF MENDELSSOHN.—Chorley, in the Athenæum, gives a "glimpse into the form and nature" of the finished portions of Mendelssohn's third oratorio: "Christus;" viz. Recitatives, Trio and Choruses. Op. 97, (of the posthumous works, No. 26.) These have been published in London, with an English version by W. Bartholomew, and are to be brought out (as we have noted above) at the Birmingham Festival. The critic thinks it due to the composer's memory to believe that, in the finished state of the "Christus," he would have altered several of these movements, as he did in "Elijah" even after its public performance in Birmingham. He would give "the benefit of a doubt" to a collection of scattered pieces, some of which, he says, too closely reproduce effects already indicated in "Elijah" and "St. Paul."

"On the other hand, they evince that, as he proceeded, Mendelssohn was increasingly anxious for pure and healthy simplicity of structure. The trio for the three male voices, 'Say, where is he born?' is capital as a piece of tuneable, manly, and natural part-writing. Very sweet and serene, too, with great dignity of line, (as the painters might say,) is the opening of the chorus 'There shall be a star from Jacob come forth.' Another point to be noticed of great power and beauty is, the unusual close of the chorus 'He stirreth up the Jews.' Bold, massive, and full of ruthless power is the fragment 'We have a sacred law.' As a whole, the short choruses, interspersed with recitative, in what may be called the trial scene before Pilate, might, it is possible, have been restudied by Mendelssohn as too fragmentary in effect,—they not being mere ejaculations and arid responses hindling together the dialogue, and working it up to some explosion, (an effect well understood by him, as the contest between Elijah and the Priests of Baal testifies,) so much as short, separate movements, each one of which tantalizes the ear by a new musical subject, susceptible of development. Perhaps Mendelssohn's extreme veneration for Sebastian Bach may have here taken the form of an unconscious adoption of the manner displayed in the Passions' Musik."

"About one of these choruses there will be no dispute: we allude to the movement 'Daughters of Israel,' in which the tone of lament without lacrymose languor is sustained with a simple pathos and a refined art that can hardly be sufficiently studied—that cannot be too much admired. We should imagine that this must have been the produce of one of those happiest moments of inspiration when the thought, Minerva-like, springs forth 'with all its armor on,' and the idea and its expression are felt and are uttered as one. The resumption of the theme by the male singers—the wailing motion of the accompaniment, (pp. 36-7) so independent of the voices, yet so agreed with them—may be cited as touches of the master in a movement throughout masterly. When we compare these few pages—so simple of execution, so immediate in their effect, yet to the structure of which so much of the highest skill has been brought in utterance of the highest poetry—to some of the furious and vehement and scarcely accessible monstrosities of what is called the new school, it seems as if we were dealing with things that had no common purpose—no common meaning—no common language."

2. The other publication is: Six Songs, with Piano-forte accompaniment. op. 99. (Posthumous, No. 23,) with English version by Bartholomew. These are pronounced fully worthy of their composer; but the critic justly says: "They must be sung with the German—not the English—words. Indeed, as a body, Mendelssohn's songs are too largely shut up from English singers by want of taste in the translated text."

VIENNA. The anniversary of Gluck's birth was celebrated here on the 4th inst. Some few years since, his admirers restored the monument erected to his memory in the cemetery of Mäzleindorf. A small marble tablet, let into the masonry of the original monument, bears the following inscription:—

"Here lies a good and loyal German—a zealous Christian, and a faithful husband—the Chevalier CHRISTOPHER GLUCK, a great master of the sublime Art of Music. He died on the 15th of November, 1787."

Verdi is to compose an opera for the next season of the Theatre Italien.—Leopold de Meyer has got back here; he will pass some time hydropathically at Grafenberg, and return to pass the next winter at Paris.—In the autumn, Udine, a new opera by M. Swoff, aid-de-camp of the Emperor of Russia, director of the imperial chapel and author of the National Hymn, will be produced at the court theatre.—A mass, by the chapel-master Assmayer, was performed on the 18th July, the anniversary of the foundation of the Academy of Music.

HAMBURG. Mme. Otto Goldschmidt and husband have just left for the baths of Scheveningen, in Holland.—Pischek has made his appearance in Une nuit à Grenade.

BRUNSWICK. The Musical Festival took place on the 1st and 4th of July. Among other things, Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and Beethoven's choral symphony were performed. The rumor, copied into the English papers, that Mme. Goldschmidt was to sing, proves to have been incorrect.

FLORENCE. Rossini presided recently over a performance of his admirable choruses: "Faith, Hope and Charity," in a concert of the Philharmonic Society. (These pieces are written in three parts for female voices.) Several illustrious amateurs took part, as the princess Poniatowski and the countess Orsini.

It is said that Rossini was never in better health than he is at present. The following circumstance connected with the great maestro is reported as having recently occurred in Florence. For the last two years, the Sultan, who is exceedingly fond of music, has on several occasions offered Rossini fabulous sums of money, besides all sorts of Turkish decorations and orders of merit, on condition that he would compose him some lyrical work or other. As Rossini never returned any answer, his Highness determined to send one of the attachés of the Embassy with strict orders not to leave him without having obtained something for the theatre at Constantinople. The attaché accordingly visited Rossini, who received him with his accustomed politeness, and begged him to wait a few seconds. The composer then went up stairs to his study. About an hour afterwards he came down again with a manuscript, hardly dry, in his hand. "Will you be kind enough to give that to the Sultan?" said he to the attaché. "What is the price?" asked the latter. "Nothing—I am only too happy that I am able to do anything that can please his Highness." Knowing the Sultan's taste for military music, Rossini had composed a new march.—London Musical World.

The Great Contralto Singers—Alboni.

The female contralto, as a solo voice, first rose to importance with the music of ROSSINI. The GAFORINI, the MALANOTTE, the MARCOLINI, the MARIANI, Mme. PISARONI, Mme. PASTA and Mme. MALIBRAN:—these are the principal representatives of that group of contralti, which exercised so remarkable an influence upon Rossini's talent. To this group too ALBONI must be added.

Of these great singers, some personify the serious, others the comic side of the Italian genius. And some there are so marvellously endowed, that they succeed in both kinds. The first of them all, in chronological order, the GAFORINI, excelled particularly in the buffo music. Elisabeta Gaforini was one of the most charming virtuosos of the commencement of the nineteenth century. She shone in Italy, and in the principal cities of Europe, through nearly the period from 1796 to 1815. She possessed a very supple and very sonorous contralto voice, which went up to F, and down to A. She was particularly admired in the Dama Soldata of Federici, in the Ser Marc' Antonio of Pavesi, and in Il Ciabatino.

The name of ADELAIDE MALANOTTE is consecrated by the memory of an immortal masterpiece. Rossini found the Malanotte, in 1813, at Venice, where she had come recommended by some successes obtained in public concerts and in secondary theatres. He wrote for her the rôle of Tancredi. From that time the fame of the Malanotte spread with éclat throughout all Italy, and her name lives there yet under the shadow of the happy and brilliant genius, of whom she was the favorite singer and whose immortal glory she inaugurated. Uniting all the graces of the woman to a powerful, pure and facile contralto voice, the Malanotte sang with as much force as feeling, and knew how to combine the gracefulness of fancy with the most pathetic movements. It was she, who, not contented with the first air which the young maestro wrote for her, required another and furnished occasion, by this caprice of a prima donna assoluta, for the creation of the famous cavatina: Tu che accendi, which the whole world knows by heart. When, in the beautiful duo between Tancredi and Argerio, the Malanotte, brandishing her sword, launched forth that incomparable phrase: Il vivo lampo di questa spada! she wrung from the whole house cries and bursts of enthusiasm. Little did they foresee the sad end in reserve for her. After some years of triumph and intoxication, the marvellous cantatrice, for whom was composed the air: Di tanti palpiti e di tanti pene, . . . that hymn of youth and of love which she probably inspired, the Malanotte died forsaken and almost crazy at the age of forty-seven years.

The Italian buffo music found in MARIETTA MARCOLINI, as in the Gaforini, a worthy and a charming interpreter. Marietta Marcolini began to be distinguished as a singer about 1805. Her beautiful contralto voice, which at the furthest went only to F sharp, was of a surprising flexibility. Rossini first had occasion to know her in 1811, at Bologna, where, at the age of nineteen, he wrote for her the Equivoco Stravagante. In 1812 he found her again at Milan, and composed for her la Pietra del Paragone; then, in 1813, l'Italiana in Algeri at Venice, in the same year and same city which saw the birth of his Tancredi. The Marcolini was a delicious singer in the opera buffa. She had a brío, a transporting fervor, an amiable and facile gaiety, which radiated like the light and became contagious. The arie di bravura, written to her order, which terminate la Pietra del Paragone, and l'Italiana, remain like sweet witnesses to the admirable flexibility of her voice and to the happy ascendancy which she knew how to acquire over the genius of the first dramatic composer of our time.

A wholly different vocation summoned the PISARONI to the interpretation of the tragic master-pieces of Rossini. BENEDETTA-ROSA-MONDA PISARONI was born at Piacenza in 1793. After learning music under the direction of an obscure master of her native city, she took lessons in singing of the famous Marchesi, who taught her the principles of the beautiful school of the eighteenth century. When she made her début, at the age of eighteen, in the rôles of the Griselda and the Camilla of Paër, Mme. Pisaroni had a high soprano voice. After a severe illness which she had towards the year 1813, she lost several notes in the upper register, while the low tones acquired a powerful and unexpected sonorousness. Then she found herself obliged to sing the parts written for the contralto, and became one of the greatest singers of her time. Mme. Pisaroni redeemed the inequality of her voice by a grandiose and portamento style, which recalled the large manner of Pachierotti and Guadagni (male sopranos in the latter part of the eighteenth century.) She came to Paris in 1827, and made her début in the rôle of Arsace in Semiramide. The whole house was transported with enthusiasm, at hearing Mme. Pisaroni exclaim with a formidable voice: Eccomi in Babilonia! She was equally admirable in the duet with Assur: E dunque vero, audace? and in that of the second act between Semiramis and Arsace: Eh! ben a te ferisci? She proved to Mme. MALIBRAN that youth, voice, energy, and even the suddennesses of genius cannot always compete advantageously against a style simple, grand and true. Rossini wrote for Mme. Pisaroni the part of Malcolm in la Donna del Lago, and afterwards the part of Ricciardo in Ricciardo et Zoraida.

It was also a talent wonderfully fitted to translate the serious creations of Rossini, which was admired in Judith Negri, so celebrated under the name of Mme. PASTA. Born at Como of an Israelite family, in 1798, she at first studied music in a little school very obscure, and was then admitted to the Conservatory of Milan, at that time under the direction of Asioli. Her thick, unequal, muffled mezzo-soprano voice was with great difficulty rendered supple, and Mme. Pasta never was completely mistress of this rebellious organ. Her first trial was at an amateur theatre, and her next at the theatre in Brescia. She came to Paris for the first time in 1816, and here passed entirely without recognition. It was only at the beginning of the year 1822 that the reputation of Mme. Pasta spread in Europe. Handsome, intel-lignant, impassioned, she made up for the imperfections of her organ by incessant labor, by a noble, tender, learned style. A tragic actress of the first order, whose elegant and true gesture Talma himself admired, she submitted her least inspirations to the control of a refined taste, and trusted nothing to hap-hazard. Her intonations and her paces were arranged beforehand. No one has sung the rôle of Tancredi at Paris, like Mme. Pasta. She was sublime in the Romeo of Zingarelli, and, in the Nina of Paisiello, she recalled the celebrated Coltellini and the prodigies of the great century of Art.

It is well known that very opposite qualities placed Mme. MALIBRAN in the first rank of the great dramatic singers of the nineteenth century. The daughter of the tenor Garcia had received with life a whole heritage of passions. Endowed with an extended and nervous voice, which went up to the C in alt of the sopranos, and down to the F of the contraltos, she found nothing too difficult for her audacious and her marvellous facility. She sang all rôles and all kinds; arch in the Rosina of the "Barber of Seville," impassioned in the Desdemona of Otello, she had the ambition, the ardor, the éclat and the inequalities of genius. Taken altogether, her talent admirably sums up the most diverse instincts and the rarest faculties of the great Italian singers. To no one else has it been given to unite, with so much brilliancy and spontaneity, the tragic passion and the buffo verve. In this singular duality reside the originality of Mme. Malibran and her true title to glory.

A lively interest given to the buffo music, and the laying down with power and with effect the bases of interpretation of the masterpieces of tragic music:—such, we have seen, are the great results which assign to certain modern cantatrici a very special place in the annals of the Italian art. To-day there is no longer the same part to fill. There is no longer a great school requiring furtherance through its stages of development; this school is formed, it has produced its chefs-d'œuvre, its revolution is accomplished; but to this so fruitful movement a sad reaction has succeeded: the worship of instrumentation tends everywhere to supplant that of song. In view of these tendencies, the interpretation of the masterpieces of the beginning of this century becomes again apropos; only it is less favored by the general sympathies. A struggle becomes necessary, in the name of the finest traditions of the art, against what is sought to be substituted for them. The mission of the singer becomes more difficult, but it gains also in importance. Never has the condition of music more imperiously demanded that the art of singing should find inspired defenders in talents of a select order; never has the orchestra so energetically disputed with Melody the place which the composers of the eighteenth century had conquered for her. It is in the midst of such a situation that a singer has presented herself, who is the heiress of the method which, from the very creation of the lyric drama, has made illustrious so many Italian virtuosos. One may imagine, then, with what curiosity and what interest the débuts of Mlle. ALBONI must have been regarded.

Rossini had not disdained to watch over the musical education of the young cantatrice. They say, he repeated to her, as he persuaded her to go upon the stage, the words of old Porpora to his pupil, the famous Cafarelli: "Go, my daughter, you are now the first singer in Europe. Imitate no one, do just the contrary of what you shall hear done around you, and you may then be certain of walking in the way of salvation." This word vividly describes the difficult and brilliant part which might belong, among the modern singers, to Mlle. Alboni.

MARIETTA ALBONI was born in a little city of Romagna. Her voice is a veritable contralto of the most sweet and most sonorous. It goes down to F in the bass clef and up to the C in alt of the soprano; that is to say, it traverses a compass of two octaves and a half. The first register commences with the F in the bass and reaches to the same note in the medium: here lies the real body of Alboni's voice, and the admirable timbre of this register colors and characterizes all the rest. The second register extends from the G of the medium to the F above; and the remaining compass of a fourth above that, forming the third portion, is but an elegant sumptuousness of nature. One must hear, to conceive with what incredible skill the artist uses this magnificent instrument! It is the pearly, light and fluid vocalization of Persiani, joined to the brilliancy and pomp of style of Pisaroni. Nothing can give an idea of this voice always united, always equal, which vibrates without effort and of which each note opens like a rose-bud. No cry, no pretended dramatic contortion, to bruise and wound your tympanum under the pretext of moving you to tears!—as if a verse of Virgil or of Racine, which easily penetrates to the heart, were the less true or the less beautiful for that. No doubt, the admirable voice of Mlle. Alboni is not without some imperfections; it counts several notes that are feeble and slightly dull, as sol, la, si, do, notes which serve as the transition between the chest voice, of an unparalleled beauty, and the register of sounds formed above the larynx, commonly called the head tones. When the singer is not careful, this little heath enlarges, and these notes appear a little stifled. It is quite evident that the virtuosa glides over this little bridge of sighs with all sorts of precautions, and that she evinces a satisfaction when she arrives at a real tone of her contralto voice, which she makes leap out and vibrate with so much the more sonorousness. Frequently she contrasts these two registers with an exquisite taste, balancing herself lightly on the mixed note before bounding upon the terra firma of her chest voice, which she governs with a supreme authority. We have heard her make a gamut from the C in alt down to F in the bass; this gamut flew before the ear with the rapidity of lightning, without your losing a single note, and all this was done with an unconcern entirely hopeless for mediocrity.

When Mlle. Alboni appeared at the Opera some months since (Paris, Oct. 1849), she excited a general enthusiasm. In spite of her prodigious success then, in four concerts, with two or three pieces chosen to bring out the marvellous qualities of her voice and of her vocalization, there was still some fear lest this admirable virtuoso should prove less brilliant on the stage, in a dramatic action demanding more force and variety. This fear soon passed away. Mlle. Alboni made her début at the Théâtre-Italien in the character of Arsace in Rossini's Semiramide. There she displayed the same superior qualities of the cantatrice and certain fine shades of style which the action of the stage brought out for the first time. Thus, she is admirable in the duet of the first act: Serbami ognor, and in the Andante of the aria which she sings at the commencement of the second act, after having learned the name of her father: In sì barbara sciagura. Her incomparable voice and her tender style draw tears from the most hardened hearts; and with what elegance, what penetrating emotion she exhales that adorable phrase: Or che il ciel ti rende il figlio, in the duo of the second act!

Undoubtedly Alboni is not a tragedian like Mme. Pasta, nor even like Mme. Grisi. In this exquisite talent of her's, one might desire a little more force, a little more emphasis and depth. She has not brought out with sufficient energy the recitative in the first act: Eccomi al fine in Babilonia! which Mme. Pisaroni pronounced with so much majesty and amplitude, and we have also found her a little soft in the duet with Assur: E dunque vero, audace. The syllable, a little too much caressed and allowed to die away by the singer, was not articulated neatly enough. The part of Cinderella, which Mlle. Alboni took up after that of Arsace, is infinitely more favorable to her, in that it requires less of passion and dramatic contrasts than of vocal grace and flexibility. Since Mlle. Mombelli, who, in 1823, first revealed to a Parisian public the beauties of this delicious score of Rossini, and who made herself especially remarkable by the brio and the vigor which she displayed in the finale of the first act and in the admirable sextuor of the second, no Italian singer has ever sung the part of Cinderella with so much charm and suavity as Mlle. Alboni. I know very well that a rigorous criticism might demand more verve, more comic sharpness and vivacity; but it seems to me that the expression of a leaping, flashing gaiety is as foreign to the nature of her talent as the cry of grief. Mlle. Alboni delights in the temperate regions, in the style of half-character, which allows her to unfold, without effort, all the delicacies of her incomparable organ. If you would have an idea of a perfect vocalization joined to one of the most beautiful contralto voices that have ever existed, you must hear Alboni sing the final air in la Cenerentola:

Non più mesta
A canto al fuoco. . .

The part of Malcolm in la Donna del Lago will add nothing to the reputation of the cantatrice. In this new creation, Mlle. Alboni has displayed, as in the Cenerentola and in the Semiramide, more grace and sweetness than dramatic energy. Whatever the imperfections which we have had to remark in her talent, Mlle. Alboni is a singer of the first order and of the great school of the nineteenth century, which has produced the Gaforinis, the Malanottes, the Marcolinis, the Pisaronis. Endowed with a certainty of taste which Malibran might have envied, superior perhaps to Pasta in the charm of style, possessing a voice of greater compass and less unequal than that of Pisaroni, MARIETTA ALBONI is an eminent virtuoso, who will leave another great name in the history of Art. That melodious music, the calm and serene expression of love, which we meet in certain composers of the eighteenth century and in some of the operas of Rossini, could not, we believe it, have a more delicate interpreter.

PERGOLESE. We returned to sleep at Portici; the next morning, we had an excellent breakfast of ham, fresh figs, and a bottle of lagrima Christi. After discussing which, Fleming and myself mounted our donkeys, and, accompanied by our guides, began the ascent of Mt. Vesuvius. We passed through fields covered with fig and mulberry trees, and our guide pointed out the favorite retreat of Pergolese, the great composer. Here he was said to indulge his fatal tendency to melancholy; yet, perhaps, had he not been of that melancholy temperature, he would not have composed his celebrated "Stabat Mater dolorosa," or his intermezzo, "La Serva Padrona," both of which I heard with such delight at Naples.

He died at the early age of twenty-seven; it was supposed by poison, given by a brother composer, jealous of his transcendent talents.

I never heard the following truly poetic lines, written by Mr. Rogers, author of the Pleasures of Memory, set to music and sung with exquisite pathos by my ever lamented friend Mrs. Crouch, without thinking of poor Pergolese's untimely death.

"Go, you may call it madness, folly,
You cannot chase my gloom away,
There's such a charm in melancholy,
I would not, if I could, be gay.

Ah! did you know what pensive pleasure
Rends my bosom when I sigh,
You would not rob me of a treasure
Monarchs are too poor to buy."

Reminiscences of Michael Kelly.

SONTAG-IANA.

We have already translated for our readers the history of the great German singer's career, by SCUDO, with his own warm but discriminating estimate of her artistic qualities. We have also given the evidently quite unprofessional impression of the lady correspondent of the Intelligencer. The following, from different sources, may pass also for what they are worth.

1. In a late number of the Courier des Etats Unis there is an appreciation of her by no less a critic than HECTOR BERLIOZ. The essential part of it is as follows:

"She unites all the qualities—although not in an equal degree—all like to find in an artist: sweetness never surpassed, agility almost fabulous, expression, and the most perfect intonation. On she carols, higher and higher, like a lark at 'heaven's gate,' so soft, so clear, so wonderfully distinct that, like the silver bell from the altar, it is heard through the pealing organ. But her principal merit, in our eyes, is the absence of 'rant'—the substitute of genius—in any shape whatever. She always SINGS, and does not depend on mere strength of lungs—erroneously called 'power.' She never strains her delicate organ—that sweet instrument so susceptible of every shade of expression. How fortunate for our young singers that, like the nuns in Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable, she left the tomb of the seven ancestors, bestowed by the King of Prussia upon the Countess de Rossi, to teach them the wide difference between singing and screaming, and to show how we all, during the last ten years, have been listening to, and adoring false prophets."

2. The Tribune translates from the New York Allgemeine Zeitung part of "an elaborate article copied from the writings of BÖRNE, for years the most influential of recent German authors and the writer of the well-known Letters from Paris, describing the first appearance of Sontag, many years since, before the honest-hearted and enthusiastic people of Southern Germany." The scene of the description is Frankfurt:

"In truth, since I have myself heard the enchantress, I am bewitched like the others and no longer know what I say. But as in the twilight of a dream I remember, that before my soul's transmigration, I was of the opinion that we Germans, who are so hard to rouse into enthusiasm, who begin to be intoxicated when others are getting over their headache—it was my opinion that we ought not to yield up our virgin hearts to the first charming apparition. I remember I held it to be thoughtless extravagance. But now I think otherwise, and I say: It is lovely; let us enjoy the moment, and why refuse to enjoy it? why sacrifice it to the future? Who knows how long it will be before we are again permitted thus loudly to utter our admiration and pay our homage to a divinity of our own free choice, and not imposed on us by accident? And now I desire to praise this enchantress, who has transformed an entire nation; but where shall I find the words? Even the endless array of mere paper words that we have created in Frankfurt since our senses were taken from us, even these are exhausted. One might offer a prize of a hundred ducats for the invention of a new adjective, never before employed, and nobody could gain the prize.

"The several judges have given their verdict; her charming person, her playing, her singing, can be compared to every thing that is lovely, for such a union of all these gifts of Nature and Art was never found in any other singer. To this, also, I assent, though the rareness of this union did not delude me; for with all my efforts I could not see and hear her at the same time, and I had to think of her points of excellence one by one, together, in order to arrive at the sum of her worth. But of one thing I am certain, and that is, that what could raise the whole of a German work-day city into such festal excitement, without the command of either the almanac or the police, must be something admirable, something beautiful. To praise our songstress, then, let me speak of the excitement she has produced, for such universal intoxication, even if not to the credit of the drinker, is to the glory of the wine.

"Even the Jews experienced a slight dizziness, and when at the Exchange you heard them speak of Eighth and Quarter, you were doubtful whether they meant musical beats or per cents. The price of tickets to the theatre was doubled, a thing unheard of, for we Frankforters, rich as we are, regard every unusual expense as intolerable. Spectators poured along in vast crowds, not merely the inhabitants of the town, not merely the people of the neighboring cities; but from a distance, from Cologne and Hanover, came flocks of strangers. It was like the Olympian games. An Englishman who could not get a place in the boxes wanted to take the entire parquette, and when told it was impossible, gave loud vent to his astonishment at this strange Continental scrupulosity. A young man came on foot from Wiesbaden, a distance of sixteen miles, and arrived just as the house was opened; with great difficulty he procured a seat, but was good enough to give it up to a wearied lady; he stood up, fainted before the performance began, and, as there was no place for him to fall, he was carried lifeless in the fainting-fit, from hand to hand, to the door; he recovered just as the curtain fell on the last act, and walked back to Wiesbaden the same night. An inhabitant of the city was so exhausted by the closeness and the heat, that he had to go home, and died the same evening. We have heard of other injuries and maladies, and of persons who were obliged to keep their beds for many days. Through the whole time, The Intelligencer was filled with advertisements of lost chains, rings, bracelets, veils, and other articles which ladies lose in a crowd. On the first day of Sontag's appearance, I went to the optician's to get my opera-glass, which had been left to be repaired, and he had to look for it among fifty others left there for the same purpose.

"The house was opened two hours earlier than usual, but long before that, the great square in front was crowded and jammed with people. Expectation was raised to its highest apex; the excitement was intense and keen. Until I experienced the reality, it seemed impossible that such extravagant anticipations could be satisfied.

But all who were there confessed that Mlle. Sontag far exceeded all they had looked for. A magical, indescribable grace accompanies all the movements of this singer, and we are in doubt whether to regard her acting or her singing as the lovely ornament of a perfect beauty. In comic parts she always preserves that womanly tact, which is so easily violated on the boards, and in serious ones a dignity which is at once touching and commanding. On the first night we forgot the senseless text of Rossini's Otello; we saw and heard the Desdemona of Shakspeare. In a simple ballad which speaks to the heart she is admirable, as in the most ornate cavatina which delights the ears. We saw old men weeping, something which no trick of artificiality, though never so unequalled and incomparable, could produce. Her low notes, her wonderful trills, runs and cadenzas, resemble the charming, childlike ornaments on a Gothic edifice, which serve to moderate the solemnity of lofty arches and pillars, but never violate or degrade that solemnity. The inspiration produced by Henrietta Sontag as Desdemona, resembles the Greek fire that could not be extinguished."

3. The following personal notice of Mme Sontag is given by the authoress of the "Letters from the Baltic."

"Let me revert more particularly to one of the fairest ornaments, both in mind and person, which our party possesses, whose never-clouded name is such favorite property with the public as to justify me in naming it—I mean the Countess Rossi. The advantages which her peculiar experience and knowledge of society have afforded her, added to the happiest nature that ever fell to human portion, render her exquisite voice and talent—both still in undiminished perfection—by no means her chief attraction in society. Mme. Rossi could afford to lose her voice tomorrow, and would be equally sought. True to her nation, she has combined all the Liebeshwürdigkeit of a German with the witchery of every other land. Mme. Rossi's biography is one of great interest and instruction, and, it is to be hoped, will one day appear before the public. It is not generally known that she was ennobled by the King of Prussia, under the title of Mlle. de Launstein; and since absolute will, it seems, can bestow the past as well as the present and future, with seven Ahnherren, or forefathers—'or eight,' said the Countess, laughing, 'but I can't remember.' And though never disowning the popular name of Sontag, yet in respect for the donor, her visiting cards, when she appears in Prussia, are always printed née de Launstein. We were greatly privileged in the enjoyment of her rich and flexible notes in our private circle, and, under her auspices, an amateur concert was now proposed for the benefit of the poor in Reval.

"The rehearsals were merry meetings, and when our own bawling was over, Mme. Rossi went through her songs as scrupulously as the rest. I shall never forget the impression she excited one evening. We were all united in the great ball-room at the Governor's Castle in Reval, which was partially illuminated for the occasion, and having wound up our last noisy 'Firmament' we all retreated to distant parts of the salle, leaving the Countess to rehearse the celebrated scena from the Freischütz with the instrumental parts. She was seated in the midst, and completely hidden by the figures and desks around her. And now arose a strain of melody and expression which thrills every nerve to recall;—the interest and pathos creeping gradually on through every division of this most noble and passionate of songs—the gloomy light—the invisible songstress—all combining to increase the effect, till the feeling became almost too intense to bear. And then the horn in the distance, and the husky voice of suppressed agony, whilst doubt possessed her soul, chilled the blood in our veins, and her final Er ist's, Er ist's, was one of agony to her audience. Tears, real tears, ran down cheeks, both fair and rough, who knew not and cared not that they were there; and not until the excitement had subsided did I feel that my wrist had been clenched in so convulsive a grasp by my neighbor as to retain marks long after the siren had ceased. I have heard Schröder and Malibran, both grand and true in this composition, but neither searched the depth of its passionate tones, and with it the hearts of the audience, so completely as the matchless Madame Rossi."

A DROLL MOTIVE TO MUSICAL AMBITION.
Michael Kelly, in his Reminiscences, has the following confession:

"Trifling occurrences during childhood often influence our future lives. I recollect once, when returning from a visit to a relation of my mother's, I saw Sig. St. Giorgio enter a fruit-shop; he proceeded to eat peaches and nectarines, and at last took a pine apple, and deliberately sliced and ate that. This completed my longing, and while my mouth watered, I asked myself why, if I assiduously studied music, I should not be able to earn money enough to lounge about in fruit-shops, and eat peaches and pine apples, as well as Signor St. Giorgio. I answered myself by promising that I would study hard; and I really did so;—and, trifling as this little anecdote may appear, I firmly believe it was the chief cause of my serious resolution to follow up music as a profession; for my father had other views for me."

Our Landscape Painters.

A correspondent of the Boston Commonwealth, writing from the beautiful village of North Conway, near the White Mountains, gives the following:

"The village stands on a high bank which bounds the 'intervale' of the Saco—a broad, green meadow stretching over to the river, bordered with beautiful trees, beyond which rise the Chocorua, Mote Mountain and the White Horse Ledge. No fences mar this beautiful expanse; it is dotted here and there with a clump of elms; here and there a patch of oats or other grain varies the hue; and half-way over you may see a wagon filled with hay, with the hay-makers around it. The river flows over a pebbly bottom in a clear stream of two feet deep, reflecting beautifully in the smoother portions of its surface, the varied and ever changing hues of the beautiful trees that shade the grassy bank, or that, uprooted by some freshet of early spring, hang from the bank and trail their leafy honors in the stream. Every part of this river is a picture as exquisite as Nature can paint; and there is a noble army of our native artists who improve every day of their stay here in fixing on canvas the beautiful little nooks, the charming corners of rivers and mountain scenery around them. Here are Champney, Gerry, and Hoyt, Brackett, Wild and others, busy in their vocation; and many are the beautiful sketches and pictures that are the result of their summer rambles. Why should our so-called lovers of art, in our cities, waste their money and corrupt their taste and that of their children, by buying abominable copies of abominable old pictures of older masters, which even if good, few of them either understand or appreciate, when men of talent and genius such as those I have named, are occupied in the production of the most charming landscapes, making familiar to so many the scenes so dear to those who come here to live a short time among them. Go into Balch's—any one who doubts that these men can paint good pictures (if any such there be) and look at a landscape by Champney which has been long waiting a purchaser—a charming snatch of the scenery of the intervale of the Saco—of meadow and trees. Those are the pictures for us, and not the indifferent copies of the smoke-dried relics of antiquity. This picture is one of many, and many more will be the result of this summer's work among these hills. Every thing around you here is full of beauty; every glimpse from your window, a picture. The Great Kearsarge towers above you on the one side, Chocorua on the other; and, dim in the distance, sometimes hardly to be distinguished in its outline from the clouds that surround it, is the old patriarch of the Chrystal Hills, Mount Washington. The finest rural walks you may find but a stone's throw from your door, and at almost every turn you may come across some artist, under his white umbrella, with canvas on his easel, and palette in his hand, hard at work. Yesterday, your correspondent thus stumbled unexpectedly on Gerry and Hoyt in one of these exquisite nooks, and watched for a while, their progress, as the beautiful picture of a mountain-brook, bridged by fallen birch trees, with a glimpse of the distant little village beyond the green intervale, was transferred by their hands, to the canvas."

THE GROWTH OF GOOD.

Far where the smooth Pacific swells,
Beneath an arch of blue,
Where sky and wave together meet,
A coral reeflet grew.

No mortal eye espied it there,
Nor sea-bird poised on high;
Lonely it sprang, and lonely grew,
The nursing of the sky.

With soft caressing touch, the wind
In summer round it play'd;
And murmuring through its tiny caves,
Unceasing music made.

The ministering wind, so sweet
With mountain perfume, brought
A changeful robe of emerald moss,
By fairy fingers wrought.

Thus day by day, and year by year,
The little islet grew;
Its food, the flower-dust wafted by;
Its drink the crystal dew.

By night the lonely stars looked forth,
Each from his watch-tower high,
And smiled a loving blessing down,
Gently and silently.

And forest birds from distant isles
A moment settled there;
And from their plumage shook the seeds,
Then sprung into the air.

The islet grew, and tender plants
Rose up amidst the dearth—
Bloom'd, died, and dropped upon the soil,
Like gifts from heaven to earth.

Thus ages passed; a hundred trees
Graced that once barren strand;
A hundred ships its produce bore
To many a distant land.

And thus in every human heart
A germ of good is sown,
Whose strivings upward to the light
Are seen by God alone.

[Extract from a letter of LOWELL MASON.]

Church Music in Frankfort, Germany.

All the churches have organs, but there is no choir in any of them, so that the singing is, as in most other German places, exclusively congregational. Of the several specimens we have heard, the best, perhaps, was at the Reformed Church. The building is in good taste and convenient, being in size and form much like one of our larger city churches. It is quite free, however, from all those appearances of finery, or attempts at display or show, which we sometimes see in our American churches, and which are always unbecoming; while on the other hand, there is nothing of the rudeness or coarseness which is to be seen in some of the Swiss Churches. It seats, probably from 1200 to 1500 persons, and was, when we were present, quite full. The centre of the house, below, was occupied by women; and the outside or wall slips, by men. The galleries, on both sides, were occupied exclusively by men. The Organ is large, extending nearly across the end of the house; one man (precentor) leads the singing, aided by some twenty girls and boys, whose voices could hardly be heard. The organ was played in fine church style, dignity, elevation and firmness. It is certainly a great relief to hear these German Organs (or many of them) played without the least attempt at showing off stops, or at that prettiness which seeks to please or tickle, without elegance or grandeur; and also entirely free from an ever-continued and sickening seesaw of the swell, thought to be so exquisitely fine by some Organists in England and America. That the swell may be tastefully used we do not doubt; but its abuse is so much more frequent than its judicious use, even by some who are otherwise truly good Organists, that it is almost doubtful whether it would not have been better if this improvement had never been invented.

The service commenced with quite a long voluntary of ten minutes or more, consisting of an introduction and fugue. The subject of the fugue was, perhaps, a little too chromatic for the dignity of worship, but it was played slowly and with great precision and certainty. Fugue-playing is usually slower by the good Organists in Germany, than it is in some other places. The fugue is often taken in so quick time as to produce a confused mixture of subject and answer, depriving the composition of meaning, and rendering it almost unintelligible, and quite embarrassing to the hearer. One reason of this is obvious; it is vastly easier to play a fugue upon the run, with constant acceleration, than it is to play it in moderately slow and strict time. At the close of the voluntary, the minister, followed by the session, entered; the latter took their places in seats appropriated to them, on each side, facing the congregation. The Organ then gave out the tune Josco (Cantica Laudis p. 296.)—the melody was made very prominent, the bass was played by the pedals, and an intermediate figured accompaniment filled up the harmony, producing a fine effect. The hymn, the subject of which was prayer to Jesus for his spirit, was finely sung by the whole assembly, all singing the melody. At the end of the first line of the stanza, which was doxological, the minister rose in the pulpit, not to find his place in the Bible as if he was in a hurry to cut off the last act of praise, but apparently, as an act of reverence, as he kept standing, without any movement, and was soon followed in his example by all the male part of his congregation. A short prayer followed the hymn; then an address (extempore) of four or five minutes; after this the regular morning prayer was read; another hymn was sung as before, and the sermon followed. There were two hymns sung afterwards, making four times singing, during the exercises. Here was a very simple, appropriate, devotional service for a Sabbath morning,—almost the same, indeed, as is the religious service in our Presbyterian, Baptist, or Congregational churches; and vastly superior to the Lutheran, or English Cathedral repetitions and forms. But, if in addition to good choirs, we could have the Congregational singing exercise, it would be a vast improvement on our present forms of worship. The beauty of the singing exercise, or its adaptedness to worship, is to a great extent lost with us, and we need, in order to its recovery, the congregation in connection with the choir, in the singing of "Psalms and Hymns and Spiritual Songs."

We heard also, a very excellent example of congregational singing, in the St. Catherine Church. The congregation consisted of at least some 1200 persons. The exercises commenced by an Organ voluntary of about four or five minutes, at the close of which the whole congregation joined in the old choral, everywhere heard in Germany, the first line of which is 1, 5 3, 1 5, 6 6, 5 &c., in the key of E flat major. Two stanzas were sung, each taking four minutes. At the close of the second stanza, the Organist, continuing to play, changed gradually his key to A minor, closing an intermediate voluntary of about three minutes, diminishing to pianissimo so as to hush the house to perfect silence; then, after a moment's pause, the people joined again to the lead of the Organ, in a fine old choral, also very popular, beginning as follows: e, a g, f e, d—, e—, &c. Four stanzas were sung, of three minutes each. Here, then, were two hymns sung in connection; which, with the Organ prelude and interlude, occupied full half-an-hour in the performance. Men's voices predominated, marking in strength the bold outlines of the tune; while female voices were heard and seemed to come in echoing, enriching, beautifying, and rendering that charming and lovely, which otherwise would have been too severely grand and majestic. The Organ was firm and steady, leading along the whole combined chorus with the utmost certainty, and giving full confidence to all the voices. — N. Y. Musical World and Times.

HYMN TO THE SUN.

BY HENRY WILLIAM HERBERT.

Mute be the skies and still,
Silent each haunted hill
And valley deep!
Let earth, and ocean's breast,
And all the breezes rest—
Let every echo sleep!

Unshorn his ringlets bright,
He comes—the lord of light—
Lord of the lyre.
Morn lifts her lids of snow,
Tinged with a rosy glow,
To greet thee, glorious sire.

Climbing, with winged feet
Of fiery coursers fleet,
Heaven's arch profound,
Far through the realms of air,
From out thy sunny hair,
Thou fittest radiance round.

Thine are the living streams
Of bright immortal beams—
The founts of day!
Before thy path careers
The chorus of the spheres
With wild rejoicing lay.

The sad and silver moon
Before thy gorgeous noon
Slow gliding by,
Joys in her placid soul
To see around her roll
Those armies of the sky.

SCHOOLS OF MUSIC. Germany and Italy may each be regarded as the abiding realm of sweet sounds, a special nursery and home of music. They are the two countries from which, since the days of modern civilization, the great supplies of musical thought and feeling have been diffused abroad, for the delight of nations; the feelings, for the most part, proceeding from Italy, and the thoughts from Germany, conformably to the characteristics of the two people respectively. Impulse and passion predominate on the Italian side—intellect and fancy on the German; and the division into two great schools, or systems, marked severally by these opposite qualities, takes its date from about the commencement of the eighteenth century. The two musical natures, thus distinguished from each other, have found each a different channel for its expression—that of Italy becoming essentially vocal; that of Germany, instrumental. Italian music is fresh from the heart, spontaneous, and glows with melody. German music, true to the spirit of its birth-place, is either grave and solid, or wild and fantastic. Less simple than the Italian in its elements, the German musical genius has sought its chief glory amid the intricate combinations of orchestral science, where its laborious and meditative turn can have fullest exposition.—“The Violin,” by Dubourg.

BOSTON, AUGUST 28, 1852.

The Musical Convention.

We were interrupted last week in our account of the daily routine just in the middle and while recalling one of the most interesting exercises, or rather episodes of the day;—the specimens of organ-playing volunteered by several professors of the noble instrument.

The first we chanced to hear was by Mr. SOUTHARD, who, in the absence of another expected, yielded to an extempore call and answered it in its own kind, namely, by improvising for a few minutes in a plain, solid style, closing with a fugued movement. The next day, Mr. WILCOX, a young organist from New Haven, and pupil of the learned and severe old Dr. HODGES of Trinity Church, New York, complied with the general request;—but very modestly and briefly. He commenced with an original cantabile theme, of considerable melodic beauty, which he worked up in various ways, showing skill and taste in the combination of stops, and through a goodly variety of harmony and form still keeping closely to his text; and ended with a bold, cheerful Allegro in short imitative phrases. It was short but highly creditable.

One day Mr. SOUTHARD gave a brief explanation of the simple elements which enter into the composition of a Fugue, writing down a little theme upon the black-board and showing how it should be answered in the other parts or voices, and how worked up. Having thus clearly fixed the theme in the minds of his audience, he sat down at the organ and proceeded to unfold this germ into the complicated one-in-many of a fugue. The lesson was worth repeating and the next day the same gentleman gave a fuller lecture on the organ, explaining the general structure, the use and quality of the stops, &c., and re-defining the Fugue, preparatory to the performance by Mr. H. S. CUTLER of a famous fugue by BACH, in seven sharps. This is from his “Well-tempered Clavichord;” better suited, therefore, to the piano than the organ; the theme being of a somewhat lengthy and florid character; but it was on the whole effective, neatly executed and much applauded.—Another fugue of BACH, with a simpler, bolder theme, was finely played by Mr. WM. R. BABCOCK.

We repeat it, we hope that this feature will be made more prominent and more constant in future musical conventions. Good organists, who cultivate the true and learned organ style, cannot do a better thing to make their studies and their art appreciated, than to take advantage of these ten days' gatherings of singers from the country, and volunteer in turn good specimens of the music whereof they aspire to be fit interpreters. All the gentlemen above-named are among our young and native organists, and all but one Bostonians; and these are by no means all that have grown up among us. The fact is certainly encouraging. By all means, let the great Organ have its hour henceforth in each day of these festivals!

6. NOON-DAY DISCUSSIONS.

Not a little strengthened were we in the above wish, when we came to listen to what usually followed in the order of the day. Soon after twelve,

(or earlier if there were no organ-playing) the Convention placed a president and secretary upon the stage and proceeded to read resolutions and debate about musical topics. We cannot say that there was no good in those debates, as we were only now and then for a few moments present; but it was enough to see the old fatality of promiscuous debates repeated, namely: that of the speaking falling mostly into the hands of those who had least to say, and most words to say it in. Besides, the topics appeared manufactured to very indefinite order, apropos to scarcely anything; and personalities would peep out, which would better have remained submerged under the prolonged glorious waves of one of those organ fugues aforesaid.

7. PRACTICE OF PSALMODY.

The afternoons were spent, first in a second hour of Glee and Chorus singing, and for the rest, from four to five o'clock, in the plain old primitive business of these Conventions, the singing over in full choir of various styles of hymn tunes and chorals. This was once the all in all of these occasions: the practice of psalmody and the tasting, like so many epicures in the article, of somebody's bran-new collection of psalm tunes, original or compiled. Immense has been the market for such and immense (at least so far as quantity was concerned) the manufacture. The Conventions have outgrown the exclusiveness of this business, but it would not be a “Convention” without it preserved this feature.

As to the singing itself, many good hints were given by the conducting professor (Mr. BAKER, or Mr. JOHNSON, or Mr. SOUTHARD, or sometimes a younger assistant, Mr. G. W. PRATT, taking his turn quite efficiently, we thought) on the important points of unanimity in beginning and ending; the vanish of the voice on the long note and avoidance of the equi-voluminous organ character of tone; the contrast of loud and soft; the balance and mutual subordination of the four parts, &c., &c.; and there was manifest improvement from day to day. The body of sopranos was very rich and clear and telling; and so generally the tenors;—rather too much so sometimes for the basses, which often lacked distinctness, roundness, positiveness. Some noble, solemn, rich effects were produced; but what we chiefly missed, and what for want of equal numbers could not be had as in the great Conventions in the Tremont Temple in years past, was the sublime effect of those old Chorals sung in unison by over a thousand voices!

As to the pieces sung, we cannot hope to speak without betraying our peculiar heresy on this whole subject of American psalmody. There was a new book on the docket, as usual, emanating from the professors. (Indeed specimens of several other new “Collections,” by out-siders we saw also handed round.) We saw not the inside of the book, and know not what proportion was new and what old. The tunes most marked out by curiosity for tasting seemed to be original ones. Some were simple, grave, expressive and a match for old favorites of their class. But some, both hymn-tunes and anthems, we found altogether common-place, mechanical and uninteresting. How could it be otherwise. The very brief form of the hymn-tune must over and over have exhausted its possibilities. What need of such an endless multitude of seeming variations of the old type? What need of a great many psalm-tunes any way? Real, decided novelty is almost never realized, and after all the peculiar charm and power of such tunes lies greatly in their antiquity, in their familiarity, and in the fact that they may be sung together by a multitude of voices, renewing simple, solemn, deep associations. It does seem to us a waste of ink and paper to write a new volume of psalm-tunes, were one ever so clever at it. Would not Music be more, mean more, and effect more, in all public worship, if the psalm-singing part of it were reduced to a few plain, noble, time-hallowed tunes, so very familiar that all could lend a voice in rendering them sublimely; and for the rest, let all this busy talent for arranging and composing exercise itself in supplying richer, longer, more artistic forms of music, like motettes, movements from Masses, &c., &c., (giving the preference as a general rule to classical works already existing, but beyond the reach of the people), and thus suffer music as an Art to do its office in refining the taste and elevating and purifying the feelings?

To our mind, psalmody, by its very nature, should represent the fixed, the plain, the seldom varied element of musical devotion. The moment we come to the variable element, to the artistic exercise of invention and creation in the sphere of sacred music, we naturally go out of these very limited and simple forms; else all the invention we achieve is nothing better than mechanical, unmeaning variation of the good old copy.

But we are told, there is a demand for these new books. They sell; the more there are produced, the better sale apparently; the psalm-book has become one of the great Yankee staples in trade; and so on. So much the worse. Hinc illae lachrymae; hence all our quarrel with the psalm-book makers. By flooding the country choirs and singing schools year after year with these models of the commonplace in music, they do seem to be almost wickedly pre-occupying the popular ear and taste against all entrance of the nobler, higher models; they keep creating and keep feeding such a lazy appetite for psalm-tunes (which while they seem new never introduce a new musical idea), that really artistic and inspired music is turned away from as something too "learned" and too "scientific." We state the case strongly and without qualification, because we are crowded into so small a space. Some day we may dress out our heresy in more becoming shape, more careful that it do itself no injustice by overstatement. Meanwhile our consolation in the matter is, that in spite of the psalm-books, somehow, by the working together of various influences, — the hearing of singers, bands and orchestras, — and the mere agitation of the musical atmosphere, better and better ideas of real music are working their way among the people. Have patience with us, O our psalm-book making friends, in this little outbreak of our impatience; and also have pity enough on the poor distracted brains, not to expect of us to find out the nice shades of comparative excellence between the ever-increasing thousands of new tunes, (one might almost say volumes) that you manufacture. Much as we shrink and turn pale at the sight of a "new Collection," we own a debt of public gratitude to most of you for keeping up an interest in the cause of music; and if the psalm-books will pay for the better things you do out of a true musical impulse in other ways, why — the argument is worth considering.

8. CHORUS AND ORATORIO PRACTICE.

This occupied the evenings, when the attendance was fullest, and increasingly so from evening to evening. It was rather a rehearsal than a study, for there were public concerts to be given, and for this the whole class was being drilled, quite hurriedly, in several new (to most of them) and formidable choruses. Some of these were read from sheets of the forthcoming "Classical Chorus Book," by Messrs. Baker and Southard. There was a brilliant and difficult offertory piece, by Hummel, arranged with English words; another by Cherubini, and another in a lighter and altogether operatic style, from Il Pirata, by Bellini, the music of which called up the scene of one of those graceful, merry, motley rustic choruses upon the stage, although it was here set and sung to sacred words! This was not in taste: as a secular piece there could have been no harm in it, and the music has great beauty in its way. The character of the music in this chorus book seemed generally so high and truly "classical," that we could not but the more notice this fence.

In these rehearsals we were struck, particularly at first, by three drawbacks. 1. The accompaniments, many of them elaborate and designed for orchestra, were rendered by the organ, together with two pianos. Seldom could they be in perfect time together, and almost never in good tune. This was even more perceptible in the choruses from Neukomm's "David." 2. The quicker movements, many of them difficult and new to the singers, seemed to us to be taken at the first trial too fast, so that for want of familiarity with notes and words, the larger portion of the voices did not get in at all. 3. The difficulty was enhanced by the accession of raw recruits in each successive practice; so that while a few experienced singers would lead bravely off, a great majority either "played dummy" or sang timidly, or wrong.

This led us seriously to doubt the policy of undertaking to get up in a week's time public performances of new and difficult choruses by a choir, always varying in number, and the majority of whom cannot be supposed competent to do any justice to such music. A distinction should be made, and, we are confident, will be made, when these occasions shall have become more completely organized. The social study of such choruses, the tasting or trying over of such new music, by these classes of novitiates, may be very well, as giving them a smattering acquaintance with great music and provoking a desire to go more deeply into such. But let such exercises be in the way of exercises simply. The performance publicly of oratorios, &c., should be for the hearing and example of the classes, instead of being their own blind and half-extempore work. For this let the trained singers of the neighborhood be brought in; or at least, let it be required that any member of the class, before participating therein, shall have first passed through certain prescribed courses and degrees, as pledges of his or her competency.

We cheerfully admit that there are certain of the most sublime effects in music, which can be realized, and only realized among us, by these combinations of many hundreds of voices gathered at a venture from all the choirs and singing classes of the country. But then it must be simple music, or at least, familiar music. Nothing could be more sublime than some of those Chorales, which we have heard for years past in the old Tremont Temple; for these, the vocal masses, with a few days' training, were made wholly competent. Furthermore, a few of the grandest, of the immortal choruses, like Handel's "Hallelujah," "Now round about the starry throne," &c., by dint of resumed practice, at Convention after Convention, becoming as it were a solemn annual ceremony, had grown to be eminently effective: — and does the charm of these grand old mountains in the realm of music ever wear out? — We like the idea of Messrs. Baker, Johnson, Southard &c., of stimulating an interest in their pupils in new music, and extending their acquaintance with the works of genius, but we think this can be done in the way that we have just suggested, better than by oratorio concerts of so extempore a nature. Let them hear this good music, and, as one other great means, let them have it cheaply published, compiled, brought within their reach that they may study it themselves, — and the taste for it, the love for it, the knowledge of it will be sure to grow.

While upon this theme, we add one more suggestion. Why not at each of these annual meetings select some standard Oratorio, or Mass, or sacred Cantata, of which copies can be had, assign each singer his part, and have it understood it shall be studied during the coming year by individuals alone, in quartets, or in twenties, as they may have opportunity, and come prepared to sing it with some understanding at the next Convention? Our neighbor Reed is just publishing a cheap edition of "Elijah;" what could be better for the purpose?

The choruses, to be sure, grew smoother and richer, night by night, during this practice. We truly marvelled at the progress made. Yet at the rehearsal, the very night before "David" was to be performed in public, who that was present did not think it a most perilous adventure? How it resulted, we must crave still another week to tell.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

We were misinformed as to the "Germanians" being about to take part with the Boston societies in the opening of the new Music Hall. With the exception of the solo talent, it will be wholly a local occasion.

CONCERT AT THE MELODEON TO-NIGHT. It will be seen by the advertisement that Mme. WIDEMANN, Mons. GENIBREL and Sig. BASSINI offer a brilliant entertainment. From the outbursts of enthusiasm with which they were each received by the audience at the late Musical Convention, before whom they volunteered a specimen of their talent, they should feel entitled to a large and eagerly expectant audience now.

Mme. Widemann, as we said before, is a highly dramatic, energetic and impassioned singer, with a fine mezzo soprano voice, and superior execution. At the Opera in Paris she is said to have been even more applauded than ALBONI, in one of Rossini's contralto male parts, which she sang immediately after that great artist. This we easily conceive of, when we consider that the singer and the audience were French, and that Alboni's forte lies not (see article on our first page) in the forcible and dramatic kind of music. From Mme. W.'s efforts at the concert last week, we should suppose she would be more effective on the stage, in her line of characters, than any prima donna we have had. The programme to-night includes a scena, in costume, from the Semiramide.

M. Genibrel seemed decidedly of the modern, Verdi school — a baritone of very rich and beautiful quality, especially in the upper notes, and of energetic delivery.

Sig. Bassini's violin playing was truly finished and artistic; his tone is exquisite, and he has the true charm of expression.

The GERMANIA SERENADE BAND resume their pleasant (now no longer "Summer") Afternoon Concerts on Wednesday, Sept. 8th. We understand they are expecting the arrival of what they have most needed, a superior bassoon player.

The "Serenade Band" proper (the brass band) play at Commencement at Brunswick College next week, also at Portland, and then for a fête at one of the hotels at the White Mountains!

MADAME ALBONI, whose Concerts will commence on Tuesday the 7th September in New York, will visit Boston about the first week in October. As the new Music Hall will not be available until November, she will give her concerts in the Melodeon.—We give this on the authority of Mr. Brough, Mme. Alboni's agent.

PENOBSCOT MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. The Fifth Annual Session (or Convention) will commence in Bangor on Tuesday, Sept. 21st, and last four days. Messrs. W. B. BRADBURY, of New York, and B. F. BAKER, of Boston, will direct the exercises.

NEWPORT. A correspondent of the Commonwealth says:

"The lover of music has great privileges here. Besides the many concerts, always of a high order, there is sometimes at the hotels, but constantly in private circles, a great variety of choice music. In Mr. Scharfenberg's little cosy parlor, Beethoven, Chopin, Mendelssohn, Spohr and other worthy associates, are daily worshipped by a few of the true worshippers; while stars and constellations are continually shooting from their spheres Newportward, to complete the circle of happy influences by which this favored resort is protected and blest. . . .

"The Newport Daily News is a sort of breakfast-table necessity to the fashionable visitor, like his egg or coffee. The editor is occasionally a little facetious in his puffs, as, for example, in equalling Madame Bishop to Jenny Lind;—and announcing Alfred Jaell as the 'first living pianist!' In spite of these vigorous attempts to amuse Jaell, he has only been 'induced' to give us one concert."

The GERMANIANS, by request, gave a Matinée of Classical Chamber Music, at the Ocean House last Wednesday, assisted by Mr. SCHARFENBERG, of New York. The programme included a string Quartet (posthumous) by Schubert, a grand Septet, by Hummel (with piano), and the Nonet (for violin, viola, cello, contrabasso, flute, clarinet, bassoon and French horn) by Spohr.

New York.

ALBONI resumes her series of Concerts (commenced in June, but deferred after her second appearance by the alterations then making in Metropolitan Hall,) on Tuesday, Sept. 7th. She will be assisted, as before, by Sig. ROVERE, Sig. SANGIOVANNI, and a grand orchestra led by Sig. ARDITI. Tickets are placed at one dollar, reserved seats two dollars. The hall has undergone important alterations, being made easier of egress, and a "grand front entrance from Broadway" will be completed by the time of the first concert.

MADAME SONTAG was to have sailed for New York in the Arctic, on Wednesday last. She had recently been giving concerts at Ems, Wiesbaden, Baden, making great commotion among the bathers, and finally at Hamburg. Londoners, Frankforters, &c., prolonged their stay to hear her once more.

With regard to her musical assistants, reports have continually changed. The last is that she will have FERRANTI, the baritone, as we announced at first, and a distinguished tenor by the name of POZZOLINI. Proposals had been made to WILHELMINA CLAUS, to ROSA KASTNER, and to EMILE PRUDENT, to accompany her as pianist. Mlle. Clauss has declined, and it is now supposed that the brilliant PRUDENT will accept the brilliant offer made to him.

A GRAND MILITARY MUSICAL FESTIVAL is to come off at Castle Garden, on the afternoon and evening of next Saturday, in aid of the American Musical Fund Society, of New York. The Military Bands of New York, Brooklyn, Troy, Philadelphia, &c., have volunteered their services.

This splendid combination of bands, never attempted before in this country, and giving New York one more point of resemblance to Paris, will form a great Military Orchestra of over two hundred instruments, reed, brass, and percussion. They will play overtures, waltzes, galops, marches, with the entire strength of the orchestra, besides one or two separate pieces by each band. Vocal and instrumental solo performers have also volunteered.

CASTLE GARDEN. The French Comic Opera troupe have been performing Zampa.

MEXICO. All reports attribute great success to Maretzek and his Italian opera troupe, with Salvi, Bertucca, Beneventano, &c. The receipts were said to average $6000 per night.

A southern paper tells a curious story of the musical appreciation of the Mexicans. Maretzek gave offence by bringing out the Don Giovanni. The habitués petitioned him that he would not repeat the uninteresting opera written by "one Mozart," but substitute in place of it the immortal Baca's Leonora! The immortal Baca is a Mexican composer of a quite inferior order.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE was re-opened on the 9th for the benefit of Mr. Balfe, who had secured the services of the company for Don Giovanni. Says the London Herald:

"The Donna Anna of Madame Fiorentini is well known as a very creditable and striking vocal effort. It was in this great part that this clever artist first came out, and it has not ceased to be one of her best. De Bassini's Don Giovanni sorely lacked lightness and grace. The polite and elastic gaiety of the wicked roué was very faintly visible; though, on the other hand, much of the music was sung with the greatest mechanical propriety. He was encored in the charming serenade in the second act. Madame Eveline Garcia gave an able portrayal of Elvira, but the Zerlina of Madame Taccanti Tascia was exceedingly inferior—so inferior as to be scarcely tolerable. Calzolari was the Ottavio; Lablache, the elder, Leporello; and Lablache, the younger, Masetto—three personations with which the town has long been familiar."

Previously had been performed the Duke of Saxe-Cobourg's opera, "Casilda," which had made the tour of many foreign opera houses. The cast included Mmes. La Grange and Charton, and Sig. Calzolari, De Bassini and Susni. Says the Athenæum:

"To enter into any detail regarding either the story or the music of this opera would be superfluous,—since the latter, so far as regards invention, color, or constructive skill, belongs to amateurship in so early a stage as hardly to be amenable to criticism. The cleverness shown in passages of the instrumentation is such as almost to warrant the fancy of the opera having been scored by another hand than that of its originator.—Madame de la Grange was loudly encored for some of her peculiar marvels of vocalization in a grand air in the second act; and Madame Charton showed so marked an advance on her first Italian performance in her style of singing, as to deserve credit great in proportion as our misgivings and remonstrance were strong."

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. Signor Negrini, a tenor, who has been announced since the commencement of the season, made his first appearance last night as Pollio, in Norma. This gentleman made his début about six years ago at Milan, in I Due Foscari, and has sung, we believe, at most of the principal theatres in Italy. His reputation has been chiefly acquired in Verdi's operas; and to this may be attributed the fact of what must originally have been a fine and powerful voice, having already deteriorated in quality. Fullness of tone and sonority, however, are still, in a great degree, its characteristics, and make up for what, at a first hearing, appears to be a limited register. In his style of singing Signor Negrini betrays an adhesion to that school which, most successful in the boisterous music of Verdi, is most at fault where real vocal expression and legitimate execution are demanded. He has a habit of vociferating on all the higher notes, which is very monotonous, and long before the conclusion of the first cavatina, last night, his passages were obviously affected. In the second act of the opera, Signor Negrini had become husky, which militated seriously against his mezza voce singing. We remarked nothing, indeed, in his performance that justified us in entitling him even a second-rate singer of more than ordinary pretensions. His voice is not a pure tenor voice, but rather a low tenor or barytone. He has no flexibility, and he is unable to sing piano. The part of Pollio is certainly not the most favorable for a débutante, but a grand aria, a trio, and two long duets give ample opportunity for a singer to show what stuff he is made of.—Times, Aug. 11th.

Jullien's Pietro il Grande was postponed to the 12th.

Paris.

THEATRE ITALIEN. The France Musicale indignantly denies the truth of a paragraph in a London paper of which we quoted the substance a few weeks since, to the effect that Lumley was henceforth to confine himself to the management of this establishment in Paris, and that the French government designed to make good his former losses. The Frenchman thinks it would be the ruin of their Italian Opera. "M. Lumley," he says, "is a born diplomatist and an advocate by temperament; but as for the qualities indispensable for directing and managing a theatre, he has them not, and never will have them."

GRAND OPERA. L'Enfant Prodigue of Auber has been revived; but the great event recently has been the re-appearance of the tenor, Mathieu, who made his first appearance at the Opera five years ago. Parisian papers are loud in his praise. La France Musicale says:

"During his absence from Paris, this young artist has appeared on the boards of the most important theatres in the provinces. He afterwards proceeded to Milan, in order to finish his musical education under the celebrated professor of singing, Lamperti. Mathieu chose for his re-appearance the character of Edgardo in the Lucia, that chef-d'œuvre of Donizetti, which the public is never tired of hearing. From the very first notes he sang, it was evident to every one present that his voice had gained greatly in brilliancy, extent, and flexibility. His bursts of feeling in the celebrated scene of the malediction were magnificent, and on several occasions he almost equalled his most celebrated predecessors in the part. There are certain exaggerations of manner about him which he has acquired in the provinces, and of which he must get rid."

BERLIN. A late number of the Gazette Musicale, contains a letter from Herr Rellstab of Berlin speaking in the highest praise of the young Swedish lady whom we recently announced,—and whose name proves to be not Westerland, but Westerstrand. "She possesses the art of singing," writes Herr Rellstab, "in perfection; her organ is peerless as to quality and as to charm: in its compass rising to fortissimo; so that the part of the Queen of Night in 'Die Zauberflöte' naturally falls to her." Mlle. Westerstrand will commence her German career in the Opera-house at Berlin.

MUSICAL VADE MECUM.

MANUAL of the SCIENCE of MUSIC,

ADAPTED TO THE WANTS OF
TEACHERS AND SCHOLARS.

By HERMAN S. SARONI,
Editor of "Marx's Musical Composition," etc.

THIS work is what its title imports, a most useful companion to every musician and amateur, and an invaluable aid to every student. The work is divided into six general parts, as follows, viz.

- PART I.—Melody.
PART II.—Rhythm.
PART III.—Organology,—(Descriptions of the various human voices, and different instruments, together with their scales, and the manner of their notation.)
PART IV.—Harmony and Composition—The Elementary Forms.
PART V.—Harmony and Composition—The Aesthetic Forms.
PART VI.—The Artistic Execution of Music.
To these are added a Condensed History of Music by Epochs, and a very full and carefully arranged containing not only the terms employed in the book, but also all the terms used by musical writers with their explanations. The work forms a handsome duodecimo volume, printed on superfine paper and elegantly bound in cloth.

ALPHABETICAL INDEX,

THIRD EDITION, NOW READY,
OF THE

Translation of MARX'S GREAT WORK ON MUSICAL COMPOSITION.

THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF MUSICAL COMPOSITION, of Dr. A. B. MARX, of Berlin, is celebrated as the MASTER TREATISE on this subject, and any enumeration of its merits seems superfluous. Competent judges are unanimous in bestowing the highest praise on the manner in which Mr. SARONI has translated the original. The publishers have received strong testimonials of approbation from Messrs. Scharfberg, Willis, Root, Bradbury, and Jackson, of New York; Messrs. Webb and Kreissman, of Boston, and other distinguished teachers and professors; and the following extract from a letter, recently received, will show in what estimation the translation is held by Dr. MARX, the distinguished author of the original.

BERLIN, June 23d, 1852

GENTLEMEN,—Your polite communication and the copy of a translation of my work on Musical Composition, have been duly received, for which accept my warmest thanks. * * * I find that your translator (as far as I am able to judge from a somewhat imperfect acquaintance with the English language) has done his work very practically and successfully; and I beg you to express to him, as also to the eminent men who have honored my work with their approval, my sincerest thanks; and also yourselves to accept the same for the very elegant style of the edition. * * *

The present volume comprises all that portion of the original work which it was supposed would be at all adapted to the wants of this country, and embraces two of the German books, viz.: The Elements of Musical Composition, and the Harmonization of a Melody, including Chorals and Popular Songs.

The rapid sale of two editions has proved its adaptation to the wants of our musical teachers and students. It forms an elegant octavo volume, in cloth.

Le Nozze di Figaro.

Lorenzo Da Ponte, the author of the libretto of Don Giovanni, gives in his auto-biography the following account of the Nozze di Figaro, the words for which were also written by him. Da Ponte was the friend of Mozart and other composers of that day. He lived to an advanced age, and died in New York a few years ago. His auto-biography was written at the age of over eighty years, and is somewhat redolent of the complacent egotism of an old man looking back on the glories of his youth. His venerable figure is well remembered by many New Yorkers, and he seems to be a link between them and the illustrious composer, around whom already the mists of time seem to hover, and whom we can hardly believe to be one who has been seen and known by persons still among us, or who have but recently passed away. We translate the following:

"Many composers came to me for libretti. But there were in Vienna only two who were worthy of my notice: MARTINI, then the favorite composer of the Emperor Joseph, and MOZART, with whom, about that time, I had become acquainted at the house of the Baron Wetzlar, his great admirer and friend, and who, although endowed with greater talent, perhaps, than any composer in the world, past present or to come, had not been able, thanks to the cabals of his enemies, to exercise his divine genius in Vienna, and remained unknown and obscure, like a precious jewel which hides in the entrails of the earth the brilliant glory of its splendor. I cannot recal without exultation and self-satisfaction that it was solely to my perseverance and firmness, that Europe and the whole world, in a great degree, are indebted for the exquisite compositions of this admirable genius. The injustice and envy of the journalists, the gazetteers, and still more, of the biographers of Mozart has not allowed them to concede such glory to an Italian; but all Vienna, all who knew me and him in Germany, in Bohemia, and in Saxony, all his family, and, more than all, the Baron Wetzlar, under whose roof was kindled the first spark of his noble flame will bear witness for me of the truth of what I now state.

"After the good success of the 'Burbero,' I went to Mozart and related to him what had passed between me and Casti and Rosenberg, as well as the Sovereign, and asked him if he would like to set to music a drama written by me for him. 'I would do it most willingly,' he replied immediately, 'but I am sure that I shall not obtain permission.' 'That,' I answered, 'I will take care of.' I then began to reflect on the choice of two subjects which should be suited to two Composers of the highest genius, but diametrically opposite in the style of their composition. . . .

"This failure (of L'Aveugle Clairvoyant) did no great harm to my reputation; so that I began very quietly to reflect on the dramas which I was to write for my two dear friends, Mozart and Martini. As for the first, I easily understood that the immensity of his genius demanded a subject at once extended, multifarious and sublime. Con- versing with him one day upon the subject, he asked me if I could easily transform into a drama the comedy of Beaumarchais entitled Le Nozze di Figaro. The proposition pleased me well and I promised to do it. But there was a very great difficulty to be overcome.

"The Emperor had from the first forbidden the Company of the German Theatre from performing this comedy, which was written, as he said, too freely for a refined audience. How then could it be presented in the form of a drama? Baron Wetzlar offered with great generosity, to give me a good price for the words and to have the opera performed in London or in France if it could not be done in Vienna, but I refused his offers and proposed that the words and the music should be written secretly and to wait for a favorable opportunity to exhibit it to the directors of the theatre or to the Emperor, and with this I fearlessly charged myself. Martini alone knew the secret, and he most liberally, on account of his esteem for Mozart, consented that I should postpone writing for him until I had completed the drama of Figaro.

"I then set myself to work, and as fast as I wrote the words, he composed the music. In six weeks all was finished. The good fortune of Mozart would have it that a score was wanted at the theatre. I seized the opportunity and without a word to anybody, went to the Emperor himself to offer the Figaro. What did he say? 'You know that Mozart, most excellent in instrumental music, has never written but one vocal drama, and that was no great thing!' 'Neither should I,' I replied submissively, 'without the favor of your Majesty, have written more than one drama in Vienna.' 'True,' said he, 'but as to this Nozze di Figaro, I have forbidden the German Company to perform it.' 'Yes,' I replied; 'but having composed a drama for music and not a comedy, I have been obliged to omit many scenes and still more to modify it, and I have omitted and modified everything that can offend the delicacy and decency of a spectacle at which your sovereign Majesty is to preside. And then as to the music, so far as I can judge, it seems to me of marvellous beauty.' 'Well, if that is the case, I rely on your good taste as to the music and to your prudence as to the morale. Give the score to the copyists.'

"I hastened to Mozart, but had barely imparted to him the good news, when an aid of the Emperor's came to him, bearing a note in which he ordered him to come immediately to the Palace with the score. He obeyed the royal command; he caused the Emperor to hear several pieces which pleased him marvellously and, without any exaggeration astounded him. He had an exquisite taste in matters of music, as indeed he had in all the Fine Arts, and the great success which this opera has enjoyed all over the world, shows that his judgment was not mistaken.

"Mozart's opera was produced to the great shame of the 'we shall hear' and 'we shall see' of the other Masters and their partizans, to the shame of the Count of Casti, and a hundred other devils; it pleased universally and was considered by the Emperor and all real connoisseurs as a most sublime and divine Composition."

CIMAROSA delighted in noise and mirth; surrounded by a party of gay friends, he conceived his operas; and, as the ideas presented themselves, he seized and embodied them. In this way he planned that beautiful comic opéra, Il Matrimonio Segreto.

A Letter from A. W. T. on Oratorio Practice, American Voices, &c.

DEAR DWIGHT: I am glad to see that you suggested to the members of musical "Conventions" the purchase and practice of some Oratorio at home with their choirs and friends as a preparation for the annual meetings, which are now getting to be so common. Some years since, I used what little influence I could exert among the members of a convention, and through the columns of a country musical journal, then pretty extensively circulated among our country choirs, to effect this purpose, but in vain. One or two individuals can do little—they may perhaps get the ball in motion, but it requires the strength of many persons to keep it going.

It is certainly much to the credit of Mr. Baker, and those who have coöperated with him for several years past, that they have made the study and practice of Oratorio music a grand feature of their annual assemblages at the Melodeon. Many persons of a good deal of natural taste have been enabled thus to get some idea of the "Creation" for instance—and this has been their only opportunity in their lives of knowing anything of that noble composition, otherwise than by the extracts, which they have seen in collections of psalm tunes—of about as much value as Skolastikos' brick, which he carried about as the sample of the house he wished to sell.

What our people want is not natural taste, but the opportunity of cultivating that taste which they possess. The charge which one continually hears abroad against us Americans, that we are a practical people and have no "sense" of music, that is, no natural love for it, is as absurd as it is false, and so is that other charge, that in our climate there is no such thing as a good voice. Sheer humbug, this; and every one must admit it who has had opportunity to hear a mixed multitude sing in New England, and a similar multitude in Europe. It may be that in Italy good voices are more the rule than in countries farther north; yet of the great female singers of modern times, several of the first rank were natives of Germany and other northern countries. Mrs. Billington, one of the most remarkable sopranos that ever lived, was born at London; Malibran and her sister Pauline Garcia at Paris; Mara, that wonder, at Cassel, in Germany; Jenny Lind, at Stockholm, in Sweden; Sontag at Coblenz on the Rhine; Madame Fodor, a name connected with the first performance of some of Beethoven's stupendous vocal works, was born in the north of Germany, and went to Italy first after a residence at St. Petersburg; thirty-five years ago the Italians themselves called her the greatest living songstress. Madame Schroeder Devrient, was a native of Hamburg, and the Wagner also, I think. I mention these examples to show that in the most disagreeable climates of Europe—save Russia—some of the greatest voices have been produced; and if there, it is nonsense to suppose that in the clear fine atmosphere of America, there must necessarily be a defect in the physical organization necessary to the great design. But the experience of any one who has been abroad, and has paid attention to the one point of the quality of voices, both there and at home, must show him that the American voice is as good as either the German or the English—I cannot speak farther from personal observation.

The finest chorus I ever heard was that of the Sing-Akademie at Berlin, numbering about two hundred voices. Among the oratorios which I heard performed by that Society was Mendelssohn's "Elijah." Afterwards I heard the same at Exeter Hall, London, under Costa's lead, with a chorus of some five hundred. The Berlin performance was far the most effective. It was perfect! I was excited until my sensations became actually painful, and at one time I feared that I must leave the church in which it was given. And yet that splendid, magnificent chorus was made up of no better voices than those which compose our own choruses.

I was struck last winter on my return, with the excellent quality of the voices, taken generally for all parts, (except the Tenor, in which there are too many very poor barytones struggling to do what they cannot do, and never will, that is, sing up to E, F, and G, with a voice,) at the Handel and Haydn chorus. And at some concerts of the little "Musical Association" at Cambridgeport last winter, the dozen sopranos and seven or eight altos, produced a volume and excellence of tone, which I hardly ever heard surpassed by the same number. Again, who of us has not heard here and there voices, utterly uncultivated and used only as nature teaches, which in some familiar song have startled and astonished us by their strength, purity and sweetness? Many a voice of this sort do I remember having heard in our New England villages. What magnificent basses and tenors may be heard among our firemen, when making merry together and singing "Uncle Ned," "Old Dan Tucker," or "Lovely May!" There is real feeling in some of these songs, and the singers entering into the spirit of them will often lament for "May," or "Uncle Ned," in strains that would bring the house down, were they cultivated up to the pitch of the opera.

There is, I venture to declare, so far as nature is concerned, no want either of vocal organs or accurate musical ears among us. And that brings me back "to our mntons."

We want two things: the general cultivation of taste, and the proper development of our musical capacities. Country singing schools will do neither, and the practice of the common choirs is equally useless. In both these cases the time is devoted to learning to hobble along in reading the notes of psalm tunes, and to getting up a few anthems, for Fast, Thanksgiving, an ordination, a dedication, or the grand concert with which the singing master closes off in a blaze of glory. Were all this felt to be but the means to an end, as the reading of the American First Class book, at school, is a means to learn to read newspapers and everything else, and is not studied simply that one may read the particular pieces in it, it would be all very well. But here is just the trouble; a school or a choir practice a set of these tunes, as the great end of learning to sing. I would have the singing master constantly impress upon his pupils that all which they can learn from a "singing book" is simply preparatory, as their reading lessons at school prepare them afterwards to read Shakspeare, Milton, Gibbon or Webster.

Now how easily, how simply, how pleasantly might the process of cultivating the public taste be carried on, if those who care at all for music would adopt your suggestion. Suppose in some country town half a dozen tenors and basses should purchase copies of "Elijah," and should invite a few sopranos and altos to unite with them in studying out the music of those sublime choruses. Next summer these dozen singers would be prepared to meet with dozens from a hundred other towns, and two or three general rehearsals would bring all into order so far as the mere correct reading of the music goes. From that moment every rehearsal would be attended with the purest enjoyment. Many of us who have had the good fortune to sing in either of our great Boston choral societies, can speak from experience of the delight of this kind of practice, when once an oratorio is rehearsed up to this pitch.

This is the way the great musical festivals are managed abroad. The chorus singers are all prepared with a general knowledge of the music, and the conductor, when he comes to take charge of the general rehearsals, has only to teach his masses the effects which he wishes to produce. Could we call together such a convention, as we might thus easily do, the proceeds of such performances as would be given, would enable us to employ an orchestra, and it would be a matter of pride, as well as for the advantage of great singers to join in the exercises; the profit would be mutual, the singer would make him or herself known, and the members of our choirs would have the opportunity, denied them in the country, of hearing great music sung in great style. Thus would taste be cultivated, both for the highest vocal and the highest instrumental music, for "Elijah" combines the two,—you know, how well. But enough of this rambling disjointed matter for this time. Good bye.

The Berlin Academy of Music.

The Berlin Academy of Music was founded in the year 1850, by Dr. A. B. Marx, Dr. T. Kullak, and Herr Julius Stern, of Berlin, and has risen rapidly in the estimation of the European public. We heartily wish the enterprising projectors God speed! in their noble undertaking.

We give the following translation of details transmitted to us by our erudite friend, Dr. Marx:—

§ I.

This Academy of Music offers complete instruction, both theoretical and practical, to all Students desirous of obtaining a thorough knowledge of the Art. It offers the same advantages to all who, whether as Singers, Pianists, Violinists, Violoncellists, Directors, Composers, or Teachers, select either of these branches as a profession.

Amateurs also, to whom Music is not a profession, but an ornament of life, will likewise be received, in as far as they observe the regulations of the Academy.

§ II.

The plan of Instruction includes the following objects:

a. GENERAL DEPARTMENTS.—1. ELEMENTARY INSTRUCTION—Sound and Notation, with the practical development of the Ear, and exercise in the understanding and representation of the relation of Sounds; the Science of Rhythm, with the development of the knowledge of Time, and exercise in the division and keeping thereof; first Foundations of the Science of Melody and Harmony, with practical exercises; Encyclopædic Survey of Music in general. 2. Universal Instruction in Music (Allgemeine Musiklehre— methode). Method of Delivery, Direction. 3. HISTORY OF MUSIC. 4. KNOWLEDGE OF THE ART. 5. Instruction in the ITALIAN LANGUAGE.

b. EXECUTION. THE ART OF VOCALIZATION.—(comprising exercises in Church, Chamber, Concert, and Dramatic Music, by ancient and modern composers). 6. Pronunciation, Formation of the Voice, Solfaing. 7. Chorus Singing. 8. Superior Education of the Voice, and Solo Singing. 9. Dramatic Delivery. Piano forte-playing (devoted to Chamber and Concert Music, from the earliest to the present time.) 10. Elementary Class. 11. Intermediate Class. 12. Orchestral-playing—general execution by several executants for developing confidence, Playing in Time, and at Sight, as likewise the Ground work. 13. Superior Style of Playing. 14. Ensemble-playing, piano forte with accompaniment of one or more Instruments or Orchestra. Playing from Score. VIOLIN AND VIOLONCELLO-Playing; especial lessons in each of these branches. 16. Elementary Education. 17. Superior Style of Solo-playing—then both combined. 18. Quartet and Orchestral-playing. Special Instruction is given in all these branches of Execution.

c. INSTRUCTION IN COMPOSITION—(Kompositionlehre). Indispensable not only for Youthful Composers, but, especially with the contents of the first course, for every aspirant to a more solid Education—in four courses. 19. Science of Melody, Harmony, Accompaniment; the Choral Style; Induction into the Song Style. 20. Song Style, Figured Style, Fugue Style, with double and treble Counterpoint and Canon Style. Foundation of Vocal Composition, Recitative, Song, Chorus. 22. Orchestra Style. Quartet Style. Compositions for the combination of Song and Orchestra.

§ III.

The choice of the branch of Science is, provided the requisite competency exist, left free for the Pupil's decision, assisted by the counsel of his relations and masters. And the transfer from the branch first chosen to another will not be opposed, provided mature reflection and reasonable grounds be given; but, on the other hand, the selection and arrangement of the Departments of Instruction, in all its branches, must be unconditionally left to the Directors of the Academy.

§ IV.

Each Student is entitled to the right of participating in all the departments of instruction named in § II, provided he be sufficiently forward in his studies.

All are bound to participate in the studies mentioned under Nos. 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, 10, 11, 12, 19, and 20.

All Students, intended for the profession of Solo Singers and Singing Masters, are bound to attend the courses mentioned under Nos. 4, 5, 8, 9. All Students, in the higher style of piano forte playing, intended for the Profession of Pianists, are bound to attend the course enumerated in Nos. 4, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 21. And, lastly, all Students intended for Composers, Directors and the higher branches of the Art, are bound to attend the courses mentioned under Nos. 4, 9, 15, 21, and 22. It is, nevertheless, to be borne in mind that participation in the courses, 1 to 20, previously mentioned, is indispensable.

§ V.

Opportunities of appearing on a private Stage will be provided to those Students devoted to Dramatic Vocalization. Instruction upon Instruments not mentioned in § II, will be provided so soon as a Class for any particular one be formed. Opportunities will likewise be provided for the EXECUTION and DIRECTION OF COMPOSITIONS by the STUDENTS.

§ VI.

The Vocal Department is entrusted to the Court-Music Directors, MESSRS. STERNE, STOLLE, WUERST, and FLÖGEL. The Piano Forte to the Court-Pianists, Dr. TH. KULLAK, Herr LÖSCHNORN, Dr. A. KULLAK, Herr WEHLE and BRIEST. The Violin, to the Court-Chamber Musicians, MESSRS. ZIMMERMANN and OERTLING. The Violoncello, to the Court Concert Master, MORITZ GANZ. Instruction in Theory and Composition, to Professor Dr. MARX, Herr F. GEYER and R. WUERST (as Principal Masters in this Department) with the assistance of able and trustworthy coadjutors. Herr Professor SCHNACKENBURG has undertaken the Instruction in Italian.

The Pupils—classified according to sex, especial calling, and talent—will be referred to their various departments, and to the masters appointed thereunto.

§ VII.

Conditions of Admission into the Academy are, that the Pupil shall have entered his or her twelfth year, and have already gained some proficiency, (including the most requisite portions of Elementary Knowledge) upon some instrument, or in Singing. Especial circumstances, or developed Musical Talent, will only be admitted as exceptions to this Rule.

§ VIII.

Entrance into the Academy, which must be preceded by an Examination on the part of the Directors, takes place regularly at the commencement of April and October.

The Time of each Pupil's Continuance at the Academy cannot be precisely determined in advance, as the talent, industry, and genius, of the Pupil exert, in this matter, a powerful influence on such determination. But for the perfect Education, as sketched under § II, a PERIOD OF THREE YEARS will, in most cases, suffice, inasmuch as, during this period the studies in all the departments of instruction therein-mentioned are completed.

In the Autumn of each Year, a Public Examination of the Pupils is appointed to be held.

§ X.

The Pupils have to deliver, in quarterly advance payments, a YEARLY HONORARIUM of 100 Thalern ($15); and to announce, by letter, at least one month before the commencement of a quarter, their intention of departure, or, in case of default, to pay the Honorarium for the ensuing quarter.

They are to submit to the regulations of the Academy, and are not to assist, without the permission of the Directors, at any Concerts, or on the Stage; nor to make known their Compositions. Flagrant violation of the Rules, or total Illness, will occasion the Student's dismissal. But this can only be determined upon by the concurrent resolution of the Directors, assisted by the other Masters.

Those Students who have attended the Academy AT LEAST ONE YEAR, will, upon their departure, be presented with a Testimonial, drawn up at the Conference of the assembled Directors and Masters, stating CAPABILITY, THE AMOUNT OF KNOWLEDGE GAINED, AND CONDUCT DURING THE TIME OF STUDY.

§ XI.

Communications to be addressed, postage free, to either of the undersigned, who will be happy to provide, for those living at a distance, a suitable lodging, upon the most reasonable terms; and will further undertake, as a duty—especially when requested by Parents or Guardians—to watch over the Pupils when out of the Academy, to counsel them, and, in cases of necessity, to forward a report to their friends.

Dr. A. B. MARX.
Dr. TH. KULLAK.

MEMORY OF MUSIC. The readiness with which the memory lends itself to the service of music is another standing phenomenon peculiar to her. By what mysterious paradox does it come to pass that what the mind receives with the most passivity it is enabled to retain with the most fidelity, laying up the choicest morsels of musical entertainment in its store-houses, to be ready for spontaneous performance without our having so much as the trouble of summoning them? For not even the exertion of our will is required; a thought—aye, less than a thought—the slightest breath of a hint, is sufficient to set the exquisitely sensitive strings of musical memory vibrating; and often we know not what manner of an idea it is that has just fluttered across our minds, but for the melody, or fragment of a melody, in its passage. By what especial favor is it that the ear is permitted a readier access to the cells of memory, and a steadier lodging when there, than either of the other organs? Pictures, poetry, thoughts, hatred, loves, promises of course are all more fleeting than tunes! These we may let be buried for years; they never moulder in the grave, they come back as fresh as ever, yet showing the depth at which they have lain by the secret associations of joy or sorrow they bring with them. There is no such pitiless invoker of the ghosts of the past as one bar of melody that has been connected with them; there is no such sigh escapes from the heart as that which follows in the train of some musical reminiscence.—Quarterly Review.

Fine Arts.

HESPER—THE EVENING STAR. At COTTON'S well known store in Tremont Row, there is now on exhibition an ideal bust to which the name of Hesper has been given by the fair artiste whose work it is. The sculptor is Miss HARRIET HOSMER, a young lady of Watertown, of whose remarkable talent in this department of art we had heard something previously, on the completion of the bust of NAPOLEON, of which some account will be found below. The Hesper we consider a very remarkable production as the work of so young an artist, and of a lady. It represents the Evening Star, personifying it by a female head of full size, crowned with poppies, the emblematic star upon her brow, and the crescent moon upon her breast. The expression of the face is, in some respects, quite successful; the outlines of the lower portion being very delicate and beautiful, but the brow and the upper part of the face seem a little heavy and not entirely correspondent to the delicacy of the lower part. The extraordinary success of the fair sculptor in the mechanical execution of her work which is obvious to the most careless inspection, and the evident power of imagination and true conception displayed in the work are enough to disarm criticism, and almost compel us to surrender at discretion. Miss HOSMER, we understand, is about to spend several years in Rome, to receive from Mr. Crawford a thorough instruction in the divine art to which she has determined to devote herself. We find in the New York Tribune the following account of the Hesper and of the artiste, which we are tempted to transfer entire to our columns.

A NEW STAR IN THE ARTS.

The title has a double sense; for the young artist is a new star in the constellation of American genius, and the production which first makes her known to the world is THE EVENING STAR. The name of this young aspirant for fame is HARRIET HOSMER. She is the daughter of a skilful and experienced physician in Watertown, Mass. and is little more than twenty years of age. In her own circle she has long been spoken of as a girl of strong character, peculiar in her habits and pursuits, holding in light esteem the elegant frivolities with which her sex generally employ their time, and uniformly refusing to pay society the perpetual tribute of conventional small coin, by which the world always tries to enslave the genius of women, and generally with success. Miss HOSMER preferred the silence of the woods to the buzz of drawing-rooms. She hunted butterflies, climbed trees for crow's nests, rowed a boat like ELLEN DOUGLASS, and managed horses as fearlessly as FANNY KEMBLE. But through all Nature the hand of Art was ever beckoning to her. She observed the form, the proportions, the grouping of all things. Her drawings and statuettes in plaster very early indicated a good deal of talent, and she was so earnest in these pursuits that her father built a small studio for her in his garden, where she could devote the hours to her favorite occupations without danger of interruption. Two years ago, she made for her father a very fine copy in marble of the bust of Napoleon as he appeared at St. Helena. All her friends perceived that she had uncommon talent for sculpture; but I think no one was prepared for the genius manifested in a bust she has just completed. The poetic conception of the subject is the creation of her own mind, and the embodiment of it is all done by her own hands; even the hard, rough, mechanical portions of the work. She employed a man to chip off some large bits of marble; but as he was unaccustomed to assist sculptors, she did not venture to have him cut within several inches of the surface she intended to work.

This beautiful production of her hand and soul is called Hesper, the Evening Star.

It has the face of a lovely maiden gently falling asleep with the sound of distant music. Her hair is gracefully arranged, and intertwined with capsules of the poppy. A star shines on her forehead, and under her breast lies the crescent moon. The hush of evening breathes from the serene countenance, and the heavily drooping eye-lids. I felt tranquilized while looking at it, as I do when the rosy clouds are fading into gray twilight, and the pale moon-sickle rises slowly over the dim woods.

The mechanical execution of this bust seemed to me worthy of its lovely and life-like expression. The swell of cheek and breast is like pure, young, healthy flesh, and the muscles of the beautiful mouth are so delicately cut it seems like a thing that breathes.

One has no need to qualify praise by saying this is an extraordinary production for a woman, and a very young woman, too. It is certainly eminently feminine in its character, but the best sculptors of our country need not feel ashamed to have produced such a work. If Miss HOSMER's future efforts are of progressive excellence from this starting-point, a world-wide celebrity awaits her.

Her father was not aware that he was training his only child for such result; and had he not been unconscious what the germ would unfold, he probably could not have aided nature so well as he has done. The death of her little sister made him willing to sacrifice every thing to insure her health; therefore he encouraged her to live in the woods and on the rivers, and was wise enough not to insist upon conquering her aversion to the thousand Lilliputian cords by which society binds down the bodies and souls of women. She inherited strong, good sense, but she did not inherit a genius for Art. Whence came the glorious endowment? It was the growth of her unfettered life, of her free communion with rivers, trees and stars. If she had gone to parties, and returned calls, and consulted milliners for new fashions as most young ladies do, the Evening Star would never have unveiled its transcendent beauty to her son. Though in the full flush of eager, youthful aspiration, Miss HOSMER places a just value upon scientific rules. Few artists among us have such an accurate knowledge of anatomy. Her father's profession was of service to her in this respect; but she was not satisfied until she had gone through a systematic course of anatomical instruction. It does not comport with Bostonian ideas of propriety to admit women to medical lectures and experiments, whatever faculties they may have to be developed, or however high may be the object to which they propose to consecrate those faculties. There is more freedom in the West in this respect; therefore the energetic girl went to St. Louis, where she devoted an entire winter to medical lectures and anatomical drawings. Her constant refusal to attend parties, and her unremitting application to Science, as the handmaid of Art, of course appeared very eccentric to some. The world is assuredly moving onward, but it is very slow to learn that Woman, also, has a right to be an individual. The world is prone to treat genius as the Tom cat treated the "Ugly Duck," in Andersen's inimitable story. "Can you purr?" he enquired; and when he found his own accomplishment was wanting, he contemptuously set down his companion as a fool. Even the ducks only observed that his ways were different from their ways; they did not conjecture that his peculiarities were owing to the fact that he was hatched from a swan's egg. But when his plumage was grown, kindred swans recognized and welcomed him.

Miss HOSMER proposes to visit Rome for a few years, with the view of becoming a sculptor by profession. May her genius meet as cordial a reception there as the duck did when he discovered his kindred and swam towards them on them on the bright waters.

If she wins the laurel crown which now seems floating over her youthful brow, she will do even more for the cause of Womanhood than for the cause of Art. A truly great work performed, like "Uncle Tom's Cabin" in literature, and the Hesper in sculpture, does more to elevate Woman than a hundred conventions to maintain her rights. Whoever does a thing well, proves her right to do it. That species of argument is unanswerable.

It is rather surprising that the world has produced so few artists of celebrity among women. Music, the soprano of the Arts, would seem to be peculiarly adapted to feminine genius, being the expression of sentiment and passion, in the most graceful and pliable of forms; but as yet there is no woman whose name ranks high among musical composers. Several women have distinguished themselves in painting, but no one approaches the greatness of Raphael or Titian. Sculptors among women have been more rare. A few meritorious works have been produced, but none likely to live through all time. God speed all who devote themselves to these noble and beautiful pursuits with genuine earnestness of soul.

Mrs Jameson, speaking of female artists, says: "In general, the conscious power of maintaining themselves, habits of attention and manual industry, the application of our feminine superfluity of sensibility and imagination to a tangible result—have produced fine characters." X. Y. Z.

The Musical Convention.

(Concluded.)

9. THE SACRED CONCERT.

This took place on the Wednesday evening of the second week, when the Melodeon was well filled with audience at a low price, and the stage well packed with singers, numbering from four to five hundred apparently. The chorus was of course rather miscellaneous in its composition, since the same seats contained the old nucleus of former conventions, the pupils and raw recruits of this year, and a sprinkling of volunteers from the choirs of Boston and the neighborhood. For accompaniment, Mr. Cutler presided at the organ, assisted by Mr. Southard at a grand piano, and Mr. N. Fitz at a square. The music consisted of a selection from the "Classical Choruses," and from the Oratorio of "David," which had formed the material for practice during all the evening sessions.

The parts of "David" were sung from the new collection of psalmody, &c., before alluded to, called the "Melodia Sacra." We think it some improvement on the everlasting manufacture of psalm books, to allow something solid, like an oratorio, to occupy half the space of the volume and so far reduce the multiplication (without variety) of the old used up long and short staple of the psalm-tune. But in the name of good taste and the popular need of knowing good and great music, why select Neukomm's "David," when there are so many grander, deeper, more inspired works, which deserve first to be known? How long shall the musical instincts of the people be kept out of the golden portion of their birth-right, Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, &c., when it may be as easily procured as cheaper "German silver." Neukomm is at least but a learned and clever composer; he has no title to rank among the inspired masters of the art; and "David," though for some time "popular," because effective in a superficial sense, and performed year after year by our Handel and Haydn society, soon exhausted its charm with the genuine music-lovers. Perhaps the ears of the country choirs and singing schools are tickled by the often returning jingle of its common-place chorus of "Victory," sure to cut short any deep and rich passage of harmony, which may seem to promise well for a few bars; or their imaginations may be hugely excited by the musical smiting of Goliath in the forehead; or generally they may find the choruses less difficult and less above the ordinary standard of the Thanksgiving anthem of domestic manufacture. But precisely for all these reasons, do the people need the more to be fed upon better meat, until they shall know the taste of what is good.—Of course, we do not deny that there are many beautiful and pleasing things in "David," and here and there a truly effective chorus; and some of them gave pleasure on this occasion; but we speak out of a sense of economy of our musical privileges:—when there is so much, which we only need to know, that is first rate, why spend the time and pre-occupy the market with what is only second or third rate!—But, perhaps it is too ungracious in us to give no thanks for what we get, because we do not get the very best. Therefore understand us, Messrs. Editors of the "Melodia Sacra," and take in good part this digression. We come back to the Concert.

Of the singers, some knew the music well, having sung it often in the "Handel and Haydn Society, &c.; others had barely broken ground in it for the first time at this Convention; of course some were well "up" in it, some lagged, and many only got into step occasionally so as to make part and parcel of the harmonious movement. All this was to be taken into the account; nor would it be reasonable to view it as much more than an extemporaneous affair; an indifferent performance was in the nature of things to be expected, and whatever excellent or good points were realized, were fit signals for a more joyous applause than would be admissible in a standard and artistic presentation. Several such points there were. A few of the choruses came out with a unanimity, an emphasis, and a balance of voices, that left comparatively little to be desired; while others were confused and lame, the desperate race between the lumbering organ and the two pianos doing not much to reassure the timid or subdue the over-venturous chorister. Yet after the unpromising rehearsals before alluded to,—especially that of the preceding evening, we were truly astonished to hear so much of order brought forth out of chaos. Matters had been a good deal mended in the morning by an hour's drill extraordinaire, under Mr. Southard's batôn, upon the choruses that suffered worst the night before. Of the solo parts too, we must praise the singing of "Return, O David," that sweet pastorale, by Miss BOTHAMLY, whose sweet, clear, flexible soprano seemed adapted to such music. Also the tenor songs by Mr. Low, who has truly a delicious quality of voice, of good compass, smooth and flexible and even, and very gracefully and expressively modulated in all strains of a cantabile and gentle character. In recitative, and in all declamatory passages, where a bold and crisp delivery of the voice was needed, he was less effective. But there was a tenor organ, with apparently good natural feeling of music, worthy of sound cultivation. Miss BOND displayed a rich, large, penetrating quality of voice, which it would seem, should do somewhat the same good service as that clarion soprano of Miss STONE's, upon the top of a great Handelian chorus. But it did not seem to us at all finely attuned to strains of solo melody, and was often forced in the high passages into a painful substitute for musical tone.

Of the miscellaneous choruses, that from Cherubini was impressive, but the one from Bellini was sung the best, and with "more of a will" on the part of the singers. It would have been very pleasing, but for the incongruity of sacred words. Miss BOTHAMLY needs still a deeper musical culture, physically and spiritually, before essaying in public the arduous height of "I know that my Redeemer liveth;" her delivery of it lacked sustained dignity and purity and loftiness of style; yet it was creditable as an exercise for a young singer. Much of the time the movement was hurried.—If there were other solos, we cannot at this late hour recall them. Under the circumstances we feel bound to congratulate the conductors and participators in that concert on a greater success than might reasonably have been feared. Still more so of the next night:

10. THE MISCELLANEOUS CONCERT.

This was really brilliant. The choruses from the "Union Glee Book," under the direction of Mr. Southard, were finely performed; especially that excellent piece of his own, before alluded to: "When thou, O Stone," &c., which was repeated at the close of the concert by request. The rich, distinct body of the middle parts (altos and tenors) moving with individual character in the harmony of the whole, was refreshing and strengthening to hear; and the fugued conclusion told impressively. The light, cheerful chorus by B. F. Baker, too, "When o'er lake and forest streaming," was spirited and quite acceptable in its way. The young ladies and gentlemen, who sang solos, showed a laudable aspiration in their selection of pieces. Miss FRANKLIN gave us Mozart's lovely and most touching andante: Porgi amor, from the "Marriage of Figaro," with a mezzo soprano voice of much richness and expressiveness, and with some good ideas of style; only she never attenuates or varies the round, even volume of her tone, so that there is a heaviness and want of elasticity about her singing; and moreover the piece was hardly taken slow enough. But welcome, we say, heartily welcome to symptoms of a re-action in the public taste, or in the taste of teachers, who, instead of the ambitious tours de force of Verdi and of Donizetti, seem to be inspiring their pupils with a desire to drink from such pure wells of song as Mozart, Weber, and the like. We will patiently hear these good things "murdered" sometimes, for the hope there is in knowing that they are beginning to be studied.

We must credit Miss BOTHAMLY for the same good intention in undertaking the glorious scena from "Der Freyschiütz": Und ob die Wolke, &c., which she sang in English. But she must learn that lesson anew; blot out, if possible, her whole present style of singing it and make a clean new beginning. For it was altogether a false conception of the music. It was a painful effort to Italianize and Donizetti-ize a music which knows nothing of all that. Think of interpolating a series of those common-place operatic cadenzas,—elaborate ones too,—into that chaste and even strain of prayerful melody: Leise, leise, fromme Weise, which does not admit of the slightest note of ornament! The same sophistication extended through all the melodies and recitatives of the whole scena; time and accent wrong; a vain attempt to force the music into some likeness, which it was not in it to affect, with the fashionable Italian patterns to which singers' tastes are now-a-days so almost generally moulded. Our sympathies were with the fair singer; it did not seem to be her fault; she had the voice, the power of execution, the soul apparently, for something truer; but to such hot-house nursing are our young and tender plants exposed.

There was a creditable tenor song, by Mr. FROST, and several others now lost to our memory in the thick-coming and commingling currents of events. We could not, however, see the good of introducing the hacknied sentimental duet: "I've wandered in dreams," except to show its worthlessness in the company of good music. There would have been other songs and duets, but for the welcome surprise of Sig. BASSINI's violin, and the voices of Mme. WIDEMANN and Mons. GENIBREL, who sang cavatinas from La Favorita, I Lombardi, &c., with what éclat we have before recorded. After these splendors the native stars were pardonably shy, and hence the wise resort to a repetition of Mr. Southard's Glee.

This article has already reached an unconscionable length, or we should wish to speak of certain pleasant episodes which varied and brightened the course of the Convention;—of songs volunteered or elicited by enthusiastic perseverance of request, from various singers; of the excellent samples of bass singing by Mr. G. F. ROOT, now of New York, though from the first identified with Boston classes and conventions; of the sparkling little feast of brass instrumental music, kindly contributed one afternoon by Mr. Schnapp's "Serenade Band;" of the breaking up social soiree on the last evening; &c., &c. But we must here close, thanking the conductors for a couple of weeks full of suggestion and of interest—although, as we began with saying, more interesting in the future possibilities than in results already realized, much room as there was for congratulation even in these. If we have made any individual criticism, it has not been in any spirit of unkindness or of levity, but from a sincere desire to point out ways to better and still better things. And as to any personality, we disclaim the slightest particle thereof. Read what our correspondent, A. W. T., writes on another page, and let us hope and labor for an improved, a glorious Convention next year!

The Marseillaise of German Origin.

The Rhine Musik-Zeitung, [edited by Dr. Bischoff of Bonn, but published at Cologne] contains an interesting article, in which the origin of the Melody, to which Roguet de Lisle wrote his Freedom's Hymn, is again brought into discussion. Though not decisive, it casts doubt at least upon the sentimental tale, to which Lamartine has recently given new currency. That the music was of German origin is an old opinion. One report makes it partially a production of J. F. Reichardt, —at all events this is a mistake — and partially an old popular German melody. Even the poet Roguet de Lisle was attacked, and the real authorship, when once the doubt was raised, was attributed to George Förster.* The doubt of de Lisle's authorship of the Marseillaise was strengthened by the fact that in 1830 the Liberty song, La Parisienne, borrowed its melody from that of a popular song of Northern Germany, which in the years 1813–15 was sung by the English-German Legion, and the Hanoverians, and by these troops probably brought to France. There is no doubt in regard to this,—and the fact was well known also to the French musicians. More thorough investigations, however, and especially an article in the Revue et Gazette Musicale, in the year 1848, written by a German doctor, seemed in the meantime clearly to prove, that Roguet de Lisle was also the composer of the music of his song; the Sculptor David, of Angers, was said to have heard this from the author's own mouth. Now, however, an article by Castil Blaze in the France Musicale gives the matter an entirely new appearance. He says:

"In the year 1778, Madame de Montesson had a theatre constructed in her hotel, and labored for it as poetess, actress and singer down to 1785, the year in which her consort, the Duke of Orleans, died. Here for the first time, in the year 1782, was heard a German song consisting of chorons and refrain, a melody of several verses, which ten years later, like a volcanic irruption, burst forth upon the world with a new text, given it by Roguet de Lisle, an officer of the Genie corps. Gluck's triumphs in Paris had raised respect and admiration for German music to the highest pitch, when Julien, the elder, then violinist at the Italian Opera, produced this beautiful composition in the concerts at Madame de Montesson's. The highly aristocratic and noble assembly applauded and received with their high approbation, a song which at that time expressed only sentiments of deep and tender feeling, and did not yet possess that strength, that sometimes brutal fury, which in later times thousands of voices have given to it; in a word, a melody which became the Marseillaise, and carried fire and sword and desolation into the domains of the feudal nobility.

"The melody was afterwards attributed to various composers. First to Julien who had introduced it at the Concerts at Madame Montesson's; then to Gossee, Pleyel, Mehul, who harmonized and arranged it for orchestra; he gave it a characteristic and powerful harmony, which it lost when the musical vandals, who followed, in July 1830, changed and degraded it; others have honored Dalayrac as the author. Nobody at that time thought of Roguet de Lisle as the author of the music to his hymn, and they who knew nothing of the German melody, sought in vain for the creator of this precious pearl. The forty-nine melodies which Roguet de Lisle appended to the Marseillaise when he published his fifty French airs, would have proved fully, that he was only the author of the text of the Marseillaise, if at that time there had been the least doubt on the point among well informed musicians. If you now ask me, who was then the author of this powerful and exciting melody, I reply, by requesting you to tell me, who was the tavern musician guilty of having patched together the strains of La Parisienne."

* Förster and Reichardt, the author and the composer of the Nightingale's Nest.

HURRYING BEETHOVEN'S MUSIC. We are glad when we can quote any high authority against the modern tendency to accelerate the tempo in orchestral music in an unreasonable manner, as if speed were the sole condition of vivacity. Mr. Lowell Mason, in a letter from Frankfort, which appears in the New York Musical World, relates an interview with Professor SCHINDLER, the biographer of Beethoven.

"He has many relics of Beethoven which he values very highly. He conversed for nearly two hours, with great interest, on his favorite author, and his works. He says that Beethoven is played in quicker time now than formerly, and especially the allegros in his symphonies. These, he thinks, lose much of their true effect by the quickness of the time in which they are played. The first violin, or the leading melody, is heard, but the inner parts lose their efficiency. He thinks Mendelssohn has injured Beethoven, by giving his great influence in favor of the quicker movement. He illustrated and proved his remarks on the degree of quickness with which Beethoven himself directed his own compositions, by anecdotes of Hummel, Hiller, Czerny, and others, who all agreed as to the general fact. He makes the same remark, also, with reference to Mozart and Haydn. There can be no doubt that the time is now taken quicker, in the performance of the compositions of these masters, than it was when they themselves directed it; but it is doubtful whether it will be restored. Modern associations and habits seem to require the change; and it is not improbable that, had Beethoven lived, he too might have changed with the times. Prof. Schindler remarked, that in Paris he has heard Beethoven played with very great perfection, notwithstanding the quickness of the time. The inner parts were there distinctive and clear, but generally it is not so."

Some Boston correspondent of the London Musical World writes as follows to that paper.

"The New Music Hall is rapidly approximating a finish. It will, in some respects, be far ahead of the Metropolitan Hall. It is hardly needed in this city, and will pay a feeble interest to the stockholders. It is strange that every magnificent project started in Boston must be stained with the imprint of the hand of meanness! In the case of the new Hall, after the immense cost of the building and decorations, an old organ, unfit for a second-rate church, is to be placed in the building. Why not carry out a uniform design, and procure a large and new instrument, especially designed and manufactured for the Hall?"

The correspondent, if he knew anything at all of the matters of which he pretends to write, must have known that his statement was simply false. We understand that it is intended to place in the Music Hall an organ of the first class, as fine an instrument as can be obtained.

We hope too that it will be Boston made, as we need not go away from our own city to get an instrument that shall be every way worthy of the Hall in which it is to be placed. We wish, by the way, that the English papers would resort for their information on matters musical, as well as other matters in this country, to some more reliable source than the New York Herald (from which the Musical World often quotes,) which seems to be their chief dependence, and their beau ideal of an American newspaper, or to the letters of anonymous correspondents. The attempted slur at Boston meanness in the letter referred to, needs no refutation or contradiction.

PROVISION FOR THE MUSICIANS. Apropos to this topic, on which we recently copied (at the request of a musician) an article from a London journal, see now the report of a meeting of the Am. Musical Fund Society, in New York, under our head of Intelligence.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

We do not know of any local musical intelligence that will give more pleasure than the announcement of the safe arrival of Mr. AUGUST FRIES, after an absence of several months in Europe, where he has, we believe, been purchasing music for the libraries of the Musical Fund Society and the Mendelssohn Quintet Club. We received from Mr. Fries, whom we had to-day the pleasure of welcoming home, the most agreeable accounts of our friends Messrs. Perkins and Parker of this city, who make their home this winter in Leipsic, where they are industriously engaged in the study of music. We learned also from him that arrangements have been made with Mlle. CAROLINE LEHMANN, of whom we gave some account in a former number, which render it certain that she will come to America in the course of a few weeks in company with her brothers.

Mlle. Lehmann has, we understand, received the most flattering offers to induce her to remain in her native country, but has determined to try her fortune here. Before her departure for America she is to appear at the Opera in Hamburg, as Fidés in Le Prophète, Romeo in I Montecchi e Capuletti, and in several other rôles of the same rank. We have seen some highly complimentary notices of her performances abroad, and think we may confidently anticipate much pleasure from hearing her in Boston, where she will make her first appearance, in connection, of course, with the Mendelssohn Quintet Club, for whom probably a brilliant season is in prospect.

We are glad to see that Mr. KIMBALL, of the Boston Museum, has engaged Madame WIDEMANN, (of whom some notice will be found in another column,) to give one or more Concerts at the Museum. We are pleased to see that music and singers of such a character are to be made familiar to the many frequenters of this establishment, who would hardly be able to attend the concerts of such artists, at the usual prices. We hope that Mr. Kimball will not stop short in this good work, but give his patrons many more entertainments of the same sort.

In the New Music Hall, a Boston audience is, at last and for the first time, to be seated comfortably. More infamously uncomfortable and crowded quarters than it has been hitherto the misfortune of Boston audiences to be packed in, from a time to which the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, we do not believe exist anywhere else in the world, and any improvement in this respect will be most welcome. The seats of the new Hall are actually comfortable, and compared with those of our other public halls, positively luxurious. We have tried a sample seat, and find, by actual experience that every individual will have abundant room, in every direction, and a well cushioned and well stuffed seat.

We would again call attention to the New Series of Afternoon Concerts by the Germania Serenade Band, an advertisement of which will be found in another column.

To those who have attended the former Concerts, the simple announcement will be sufficient to ensure their attendance in the new Series, which commences on Wednesday afternoon next at 3 o'clock, at the Melodeon.

Mr. HENRY BANDT is the gentleman from Baltimore, who has assumed the agency of the Germania Musical Society. — See Card.

Mr. HELMSMÜLLER is about to take up his abode in Providence, where he will give lessons on the piano, guitar, &c., and continue to compose pieces, some of which are already contracted for by publishers.

It is delightful to see grave legislators yielding for a moment to gentler influences and turning aside from the acerbities and personalities which characterize the proceedings, even of our highest legislative bodies, to the consideration of matters such as form the subject of the following resolution of the Indiana House of Representatives. Happy Blakely Family! Happy Legislators!

Hall of House of Representatives,
Indianapolis, May 31, 1852.

"BLAKELY FAMILY:"—I have the honor to communicate to you the following resolution adopted this day by the Indiana House of Representatives.

"Resolved, That the 'Blakely Family' be respectfully requested to favor this House with a few patriotic songs in this Hall immediately after the adjournment of this evening."

I am very respectfully,
GEORGE L. STILEL,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

AMERICAN MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY. A meeting was held at three o'clock, Monday, (30th ult.) at Metropolitan Hall. Henry C. Watson was called to the chair, and John C. Scherpf appointed Secretary.

The chairman stated the objects of the Society. Heretofore, he said, when a poor musician was compelled by poverty or misfortune to abandon the practice of his professional pursuits, it was necessary to send round a subscription list to the members of the profession, and in such cases the burden of the relief almost entirely fell upon a few humane persons. A society of this nature was suggested as a remedy; and, although a little difference existed at first amongst them, as to the best method of bestowing relief, yet the Society was organized on its present basis, and it has now succeeded to their entire satisfaction. An immediate relief fund was established, from which many poor members have been relieved, and one buried. Assistance has been received from many persons not connected with them, particularly artists, and their funds are now increased to $7,000. Although this is gratifying, yet there is something more wanted. The objects and condition of their Association are not sufficiently before the public. The comparatively limited state of their means has prevented them from employing the services of the press in the usual manner; but, nevertheless, it must be said the press has come forward in a praiseworthy manner, and up to this has given them support. He wished that an appeal were now made to these gentlemen to give their assistance on the approaching occasion, and it may be the means of increasing their funds by some thousand dollars.

John A. Kyle proposed a resolution, that a circular be addressed to the members of the press, explanatory of the objects, position and prospects of the Society, and requesting them to urge the support of it upon the public.

The Society has only $7,000, and it is required by the Legislature that they have $20,000 before any of it can be employed to advantage. This they were expected to have in three years, and the time will be now shortly passed. An opportunity is now offered to the public to patronise them, and if there were no other motive than the novelty of a concert, in which all the military bands in the city will take part, it should be sufficient attraction, and if well patronised, it will be an honor to New York as well as a benefit to the Society.

This resolution being adopted, another made by Mr. T. Roberts to the effect that an appeal be made to all musicians generally to form Committees for the purpose of disposing of as many tickets as possible, was also passed.

Mr. Roberts proposed that a serenade be given to Madame Sontag as soon after her arrival as practicable. A discussion ensued upon this as to the propriety of a public reception. The Secretary read a letter addressed to him by the Private Secretary of Madame Sontag, which see below, wherein he advises that the reception be strictly artistical. It was agreed that the suggestion be adopted.

Resolutions were passed inviting other musical societies to co-operate with them, and empowering the Committee to increase their numbers, and make all necessary arrangements for the serenade. A vote of thanks was now tendered to Walter E. Harding, Esq., for having given the use of the Metropolitan Hall free of charge on this occasion, and the meeting adjourned.

We may here state that very considerable improvements are being made in this fine building. A new hotel, the La Farge, is to be in connection with it, so that the concert-room is to be entered through the hotel. Two fine stair cases are to be made at each of the entrances; so that in case of panic within, a means of exit is afforded. The work progresses rapidly.

NEW YORK, Aug. 20, 1852.

DEAR SIR,—Having been informed that one of the objects of to-day's meeting of the A. M. F. S. is the taking into consideration the practicability of a public demonstration in honor of Madame SONTAG's approaching visit to this country, I take the liberty of submitting to you an extract from a letter received from her with the last steamer.

"You can now see that I have very well succeeded in securing the services of talented artists for my concerts. This important matter thus disposed of, I have only to recommend you every caution with regard to my début. I have received so much contradictory advice that I am quite puzzled, but I am inclined to think that that given to me by Mr. —, the American Ambassador at —, is the best. He says: 'I have spoken with many of my countrymen about your visit to America, and your chances of success. Those likely to know feel convinced that you have a very great one. Also, all advise you doing what you intend: that is, putting yourself under no management; address yourself to the public through your talent, and prevent your business-men resorting to those extraordinary measures which some of your predecessors have adopted.'"

I am certain that every mark of respect offered by such a distinguished corporation as the A. M. F. S. will be highly prized by Madame Sontag; yet I believe you will but consult her interests by avoiding a public reception, and making the intended demonstration a strictly artistic one.

To JOHN C. SCHERFF, Esq., Secretary A. M. F. S.

LONDON. HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—On Saturday Sonnambula was repeated, when the charming Charton achieved even a greater success than on the first night. Familiarity with the house seemed to have given her more command of voice, for she displayed a power in the finale, and a volume of tone we had not heard before. Madame Charton was liberally applauded throughout, and was recalled at the end, and received with genuine enthusiasm.

On Monday Balfe took his benefit, and selected Don Giovanni for his opera, with relays of minor entertainments from minor operas, all at minor prices. The bait was good and took hugely. Balfe and Don Giovanni brought a great concourse, but the opera was not over-relished by the mixed million—we opine, from a lack of sufficient rehearsals. . . . Calzolari made an excellent Ottavio, and sang "Il mio tesoro" magnificently, and was rapturously encored; but he refused the encore, and merely came forward to bow his acknowledgments. In this Signor Calzolari committed a decided mistake. We have no doubt modesty alone prevented him. Finer or more perfect singing we have not heard from any tenor at Her Majesty's Theatre for many years. Lablache was as glorious as ever in Leporello, and was less lavish of his comic touches in the ghost scene.

Cosilda was repeated on Thursday with Zelie, and to-night, the Barbiere will terminate the season.—London Musical World, Aug. 14.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—On Saturday the Prophète was repeated and drew a very large attendance. The performance was exceedingly fine, and excited the highest enthusiasm.

MUSIC AT OSBORNE HOUSE.—A performance of vocal music took place on Wednesday night week before her Majesty and the royal family. The following was the programme:—

Duetto, "Aus dieses Tempels," Herren Formes and T. Formes (Jessonda). Spohr.
Gesänge, "Die Maiennacht," "Das Blumen Mätschen," Mlle. Anna Zerr. Dessner.
Lied, "Das Wirthshaus," Herr Formes Schubert.
Lied, "Die Neugierige," Herr T. Formes F. Schubert.
Quartettino, "Nur näher blöde Mädchen," Mlle. Anna Zerr, Mlle. Magner, Herren Theo. Formes and Formes (Martha) Flotow.
Arie, "Die Krähe," Herr Formes Schubert.
Romanze, Mlle. Anna Zerr (Faust) Spohr.
Arie, "Ach, so from," Herr T. Formes (Martha) Flotow.
Notturmo, "Mitternacht," Mlle. Anna Zerr, Mlle. Magner, Herren Formes, and T. Formes (Martha) Flotow.

After the performance her Majesty conversed some time with Mademoiselle Anna Zerr, and complimented her in express terms on her singing.—Id.

Mr. J. L. HATTON is at the Surrey Zoological Gardens. Fiorentini has declined the offers made her from Berlin—she will remain in England to sing in oratorios and concerts. Don Pasquale and portions of Lucia and Sonnambula were recently given at the Lyceum by the performers at Her Majesty's, on the occasion of the benefit of Mr. Harris, the stage manager of the last named establishment.

BIRMINGHAM. The Birmingham Gazette gives the following account of the origin and objects of the famous festivals. The arrangements are now in active progress for the Festival of 1852, which begins on the 7th of September.

"The Birmingham Musical Festival may be said to be coeval with our General Hospital; and the whole of the great sums which it has been the means of raising have been applied in assisting the growth of this magnificent charity. When our Festival was set on foot, in 1769, the Messiah had for many years been annually performed in London for the benefit of our Foundling Hospital; a practice begun by Handel himself, and continued long after his death. So we may conclude that it was from the "mighty Master" himself that the founders of our Festival took the idea of applying it permanently to the benefit of one great benevolent establishment. This mode of application has been peculiar to the Birmingham Festival. While the profits made by all others have been divided among a number of objects of greater or less utility, the benefit from ours has been concentrated upon one, the importance of which cannot be surpassed. The power of money is enhanced, like every other power, by being brought to bear upon a single point; and had the immense funds realized by the Birmingham Festival during the greatest part of a century been frittered away among a multitude of minor purposes, can any one believe that the sum of good would have approached the result gained by the constant support and progressive growth of the Birmingham General Hospital?"

"The people of Birmingham and its neighborhood know and feel the good done by the General Hospital; but many persons are probably not aware of its vast amount. Between the years 1779—when the Hospital was opened for the relief of sick and lame poor, without limitation as to birth-place or settlement—and 1851, 83,475 in-patients, and 262,913 out-patients—nearly three hundred and fifty thousand poor people have been admitted and have received every relief which careful tending and skilful treatment could bestow. What an alleviation of human suffering! This sum of benefit, too, has been constantly increasing; from 529 patients in the year 1780, to 23,580 in the year 1850; an increase of good which has regularly followed the gradual increase of means, and which, in time to come, will have no other limit.

"Now this increase of means has flowed from the Musical Festival, which has been the main support of the Hospital, and, indeed, essential to its very existence. As the Hospital has grown, the Festival has supplied the life-blood which has fed its growth. Such has been the case for many years past, and such, we trust, it will be for many years to come. Our Festival has flourished through many changes of musical taste and fashion; and, while some have disappeared and others languish, it shows no signs of decay.

"Its long existence has embraced a period which may be regarded as the most eventful in the history of music, a period of constant and rapid progress. And this progress the Birmingham Festival has contributed to accelerate, because it has not only kept pace with, but has rather been in advance of, the taste and knowledge of the age. In truth, when we peruse the records of the Birmingham Festival, we seem to be reading the History of Music for three quarters of a century; for we find that the greatest works of genius in every branch of the art have been brought under the notice of our provincial public as soon as they were known, and sometimes before they were known, to the metropolis itself; nay more, several of the most sublime of these master-pieces have derived their being from the Birmingham Festival. And its records, in like manner, bear the name of every great artist, vocal or instrumental, who has appeared in England during the whole period of its duration."

Paris.

MATHIEU made his second appearance at the Grand Opera, as Eleazer, in the Juless. Although the French papers do not speak so highly of him in this part as in that of Arnold, in William Tell, they agree in looking on him as a very fine singer.

BAUCHE made his début, at the Grand Opera, as Raoul, in the Huguenots.

Madame TERESCO was announced to make her first appearance as Léonor, in La Favorite, at the Grand Opera.

Germany.

DUSSELDORF. A correspondent of the London Literary Gazette, who is evidently an Englishman, writes to that journal a glowing description of the Dusseldorf festival which concludes with a frank acknowledgment that even the London Sacred Harmonic Society must yield the palm to German choristers.

The hall in which this festival took place was a temporary structure 300 feet long by 200 broad, and beside the great mass of singers, at least 3,000 spectators were present. On the first day various associations had a friendly competition for seven silver cups awarded the seven best performances, the first prize being worth £15. This fell to the Concordia Society of Bonn. The Polyhymnia of Cologne had the second and the Choral Society of Neup the third. The writer says the precision attained was generally most remarkable. When mistakes occurred the audience were not slow to express their discontent. The applause bestowed on good singing was loud and vociferous. On the second day eight societies competed for a painting to be awarded the best comic song, and the imitation of animals were very droll. On the last day the Grosses vocal and instrumental concert with the united societies in chorus, the music chiefly from Beethoven, Spohr and Mendelssohn drew from the correspondent this comment. The choruses were quite glorious and the entire music was performed in a style rarely equalled. Oh, that we had such choruses in Exeter Hall. D. Schumann and D. Knappe conducted this performance, and Mme. Schumann with Mlle. Wieck played Weber's variations from Preciosa in a brilliant manner.

Dusseldorf was illuminated on Sunday evening, and the various societies with bands of music and colored lanterns marched about the streets.

The singing of the hymn by Mendelssohn, So ruht denn in die Rinde, by the Bonn chorists, created unabated enthusiasm. At the concert, Mme. Schumann (Clara Wieck) was the chief pianiste; her sister also played. Mlle. Schloss was the leading vocalist. Herr Schumann's Julius Caesar overture was executed, as also Beethoven's Op. 124 in C. A new work, The Calm of the Sea, by Herr Fisher, of Mayence, was also performed.

Madame LACRANGE had been engaged for the Vienna Opera at a very high salary, and will therefore not be available this winter.

Mlle. WAGNER, the subject of such contests between the proprietors of the rival Operas, is singing at Hamburg with great success.

SPAIN, &c. Mr. Swift, the English tenor, is engaged to sing at the Italian Opera House in Lisbon, at which Mme. Castellan will be the prima donna. The Madrid Opera House will open on the 2d of October, with Verdi's Due Foscari; Signora Capriana prima donna, Roppa tenor, and Colletti baritone. Mme. Clara Novello and Mlle. Angri will make their débuts in the second week in Rossini's Semiramide; Bellini's Beatrice di Tenda, Donizetti's Martiri. Verdi's Luisa Miller and Lombardi will also be given.

CONSTANTINOPLE. Servais, the celebrated violoncellist has been presented recently to the Sultan by the Belgian Chargé d'affaires. He came from Bucharest, after having passed through the whole of the southern part of the Russian provinces; and had been everywhere received with every mark of the admiration due to his unrivalled talent. The Princes had made him many rich presents, and he had given some very productive concerts. After having performed before the Grand Turk, who in a devoted lover of music, he returns to St. Petersburg by the way of Moscow.

MANUAL of the SCIENCE of MUSIC,
ADAPTED TO THE WANTS OF
TEACHERS AND SCHOLARS.By HERMAN S. SARONI,
Editor of "Marx's Musical Composition," etc.

THIS work is what its title imports, a most useful companion to every musician and amateur, and an invaluable aid to every student. The work is divided into six general parts, as follows, viz.

- PART I.—Melody.
PART II.—Rhythm.
PART III.—Organology,—(Descriptions of the various human voices, and different instruments, together with their scales, and the manner of their notation.)
PART IV.—Harmony and Composition—The Elementary Forms.
PART V.—Harmony and Composition—The Aesthetic Forms.
PART VI.—The Artistic Execution of Music.

To these are added a Condensed History of Music by Epochs, and a very full and carefully arranged

ALPHABETICAL INDEX,

containing not only the terms employed in the book, but also all the terms used by musical writers with their explanations. The work forms a handsome duodecimo volume, printed on superfine paper and elegantly bound in cloth.

THIRD EDITION, NOW READY,
OF THETranslation of MARX'S GREAT WORK on MUSICAL COMPOSITION.

THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF MUSICAL COMPOSITION, of Dr. A. B. MARX, of Berlin, is celebrated as the MASTER TREATISE on this subject, and any emination of its merits seems superfluous. Competent judges are unanimous in bestowing the highest praise on the manner in which Mr. SARONI has translated the original. The publishers have received strong testimonials of approbation from Messrs. Scharfberg, Willis, Root, Bradbury, and Jackson, of New York; Messrs. Webb and Kreissman, of Boston, and other distinguished teachers and professors; and the following extract from a letter, recently received, will show in what estimation the translation is held by Dr. MARX, the distinguished author of the original.

BERLIN, June 23d, 1852

GENTLEMEN,—Your polite communication and the copy of a translation of my work on Musical Composition, have been duly received, for which I accept my warmest thanks. * * * I find that your translator (as far as I am able to judge from a somewhat imperfect acquaintance with the English language) has done his work very practically and successfully; and I beg you to express to him, as also to the eminent men who have honored my work with their approval, my sincerest thanks; and also yourselves to accept the same for the very elegant style of the edition. * * *

The present volume comprises all that portion of the original work which it was supposed would be at all adapted to the wants of this country, and embraces two of the German books, viz.: The Elements of Musical Composition, and the Harmonization of a Melody, including Chorals and Popular Songs.

The rapid sale of two editions has proved its adaptation to the wants of our musical teachers and students. It forms an elegant octavo volume, in cloth.

WEBER'S DER FREYSCHUTZ.

BY HECTOR BERLIOZ.

We are in the middle of June, and it is almost cold; the wind groans, the trees cry and are agitated; the clouds seud over the heavens; melancholy memories are awakened. . . . Seems it not that, thus sorrowfully moved, it should be easy for me to speak of the work and of the artist that just now pre-occupy our musical world exclusively? Yet it is not so. Certain impressions are so deep, the ardor of certain enthusiasms is so chaste, and there are reminiscences of youth connected with such painful circumstances, that the heart bleeds to let them escape. I seem to have lived a century during the fifteen or sixteen years that have elapsed since the day when for the first and last time WEBER passed through Paris. He was on his way to London, to witness there the failure of one of his chef-d'œuvres (his "Oberon"), and die. How I longed to see him then! with what palpitations I followed him, the evening when, already suffering and a few hours before his fatal departure for England, he wished to be present at the resumption of Olympie! My pursuit was vain. The morning of that very day, Lesueur had said to me: "I have just received a visit from Weber! Five minutes sooner you would have heard him playing to me upon the piano entire scenes of our scores; he knows them all!" Entering a music store a few hours after:

"If you only knew who was sitting there a moment since!"

— Who then?

— "Weber!"

Arriving at the Opera in the evening, and hearing the crowd repeat: "Weber just passed through the green room;—he has gone back into the hall;—he is in the first boxes." I despaired of ever being able to reach him. But it was all useless; nobody could point him out to me. Just the reverse of those poetical apparitions of Shakspeare, visible to all, he remained invisible to one alone. Too unknown to dare to write to him, and without friends in a position to present me to him, I had to go off without a sight of him. O! if the inspired men could divine the great passions which their works engender! if it were given to them to discover those admirations of a hundred thousand souls concentrated and absorbed in one, how sweet it would be to them to be surrounded by them, to receive them, and find consolation in them from the envious hatred of some, the unintelligent frivolity of others, and the tediousness of all!

In spite of his popularity, in spite of the tremendous éclat and vogue of Der Freyschütz, in spite of the consciousness he undoubtedly had of his own genius, Weber, more than any one perhaps, would have been happy at these obscure but sincere adorations. He had written admirable pages, treated by the virtuosos and the critics with the most disdainful coldness; his last opera, and his grandest, Euryanthe, had only half succeeded; it was permissible for him to feel some anxiety about the fate of Oberon, considering that for such a work it needs a public of poets, a parterre of the kings of thought;—finally, the king of kings, Beethoven himself, for a long time had failed to appreciate him. We may conceive then that he might, as he wrote at that time, have doubted his own musical mission, and that he died of the blow which struck his Oberon.

If the difference was great between the destiny of this marvellous score and that of his eldest, the Freyschütz, it is not that there is anything vulgar in the physiognomy of the fortunate elect of popularity, anything mean in its forms, anything false in its brilliancy, anything tumid or emphatic in its language. He has not placed the one more than the other under the patronage of the executants; he has never made the least concession to the puerile demands of fashion, or the still more imperious requirements of the great proud singers. He was as simply true, as proudly original, as much an enemy to formulas, as dignified in the face of the public, whose applause he would not buy by any cowardly condescension, in short as great an artist in the Freyschütz as in the Oberon. But the poesy of the first is full of movement, of passion and of contrasts. The supernatural there brings in strange and violent effects; melody, harmony and rhythm combined thunder, blaze and lighten; all conspires to rouse the attention smartly. Moreover, the personages, taken in common life, find more numerous sympathies; the portrayal of their sentiments, the painting of their manners occasion too sometimes the employment of a less lofty style, which, restored by an exquisite elaboration, acquires an irresistible charm even for those who despise musical sweatmeats, and, thus adorned, seems like the ideal type of art, a miracle of invention.

In "Oberon," on the contrary, although human passions play a great part in it, the fantastic still predominates, but it is a graceful, calm, fresh fantasy. Instead of monsters of horrible apparitions there are choirs of aerial spirits, sylphs, undines and fairies. And the language of these gently smiling people, a language by itself, which borrows its principal charm from harmony, whose melody is conspicuously vague, whose rhythm, slow and veiled, often becomes difficult to seize, and so much the less intelligible to the crowd, as its fineness cannot be perceived, even by musicians, without an extreme attention added to a great liveliness of imagination. The German reverie no doubt sympathizes more easily with this divine poesy; for us, Frenchmen, it would only be, I fear, the subject of a curious study for an instant, soon ending in fatigue and ennui. There was an opportunity to judge when the troupe from Carlsruhe came in 1828 to give representations at the theatre Favart. The chorus of undines, that song so softly cadenced, which expresses a happiness so pure and so complete, is composed of only two tolerably short strophes. But as the constantly sweet inflexions balance themselves upon a slow movement, the attention of the public died out at the end of a few measures; after the first couplet the uneasiness of the audience was evident, they murmured, and to make the second repeat heard became impossible; they attempted it but once.

Whatever the difficulty of making "Oberon" popular with us, the popularity of the "Freyschütz" was rapid, general, and seems not likely to decline. The mise en scène of this masterpiece at the Opera, has just revived it; there can be no doubt that it will still grow. The public comprehends now and appreciates in its ensemble and in its details this composition, which once seemed to it merely an amusing eccentricity. It sees the reason of things obscure till now; it recognizes in Weber the severest unity of thought, the most exact sense of expression, of dramatic fitness, joined to a superabundance of musical ideas employed with a reserve full of wisdom, to an imagination whose immense wings nevertheless never carry the author beyond the limits where the ideal ends and the absurd commences.

It is in fact difficult, in the old or the new school, to find a score so irreproachable in all points as that of Der Freyschütz; so constantly interesting from one end to the other; whose melody has more freshness in the various forms with which he invests it; whose rhythms are more captivating, whose harmonic inventions more numerous, more salient, and whose employment of masses of voices and instruments more energetic without efforts, more sweet without affectation. From the end of the overture to the last accord of the final chorus, it is impossible for me to find a measure the suppression or the change of which would seem desirable. Intelligence, imagination, genius shine in all parts with a powerful radiance which only an eagle's eye could bear, unless a sensibility as inexhaustible as it is chaste, softened its brilliancy and spread over the hearer the sweet shelter of its veil.

The overture is crowned queen to-day; no one thinks of contesting it. It is quoted as the model of its kind. The theme of the Andante and that of the Allegro are sung every where. There is one which I must cite, because it has been less remarked and because it moves me more than all the rest. It is that long moaning melody, flung by the clarinet across the tremolo of the orchestra, like a distant complaint scattered by the winds in the depths of the woods. That strikes right to the heart; and, for me at least, that virginal strain, which seems to exhale towards heaven a timid reproach, while a sombre harmony roars and menaces beneath it, is one of the most novel, most poetic and most beautiful contrasts which modern art has produced in music. In this instrumental inspiration you may easily recognize already a reflection of the character of Agatha, which is soon to be developed with all its impassioned candor. Yet it is borrowed from the rôle of Max. It is the exclamation of the young hunter in the moment when, from the height of the rocks, he fathoms with his eye the abysses of the infernal vale. But a little modified in its contours, and instrumented in this manner, this phrase completely changes its character and accent.

The author possessed to a supreme degree the art of working these melodic transformations.

It would require a volume to study separately each phase of a work so rich in various beauties. The principal traits of its physiognomy too are very generally known. Every one admires the sarcastic gaiety of Kilian's couplets, with the refrain of the laughing chorus; the surprising effect of those women's voices grouped in the major second, and the boisterous rhythm of the men's voices which complete this bizarre concert of raileries. Who has not felt the despondency, the desolation of Max, the touching kindness which breathes in the theme of the chorus seeking to console him, the exuberant joy of those robust peasants starting for the chase, the comical platitude of that march played by the village artisans at the head of Kilian's triumphal procession; and that diabolical song of Caspar, with its laughing grimace, and that savage clamor of his grand air: "Triumph! Triumph!" which in so menacing a manner prepares the final explosion! All now, amateurs and artists, listen with rapture to that delicious duet, in which are sketched from the outset the contrasted characters of the two young maidens. This idea of the master once recognized, one has no more difficulty in following its development to the end. Agatha is always tender and dreamy; while Annette, happy child who never loved, is always pleased with innocent coquetties; always her joyous prattle, her linnet's song, give out sparkling sallies in the midst of the interviews of the two anxious lovers, pre-occupied with sadness. Nothing escapes the hearer of those sighs of the orchestra during the prayer of the young virgin awaiting her affianced lover, of those sweetly strange murmurings, where the attentive ear seems to hear "The low sound of the night winds stealing through the pines;" and it seems as if the darkness become suddenly more intense and colder, at that magical modulation into C major: "All is now sleeping." What a sympathetic shudder afterwards comes over one at that rapturous outburst: "'Tis he! 'tis he!" and above all at that immortal cry which shakes the whole soul: "Now heaven opens for me!"

No, no, I must say it, no where else is there so beautiful an air. No other master, German, Italian or French, has so made speak successively in the same scene sacred prayer, melancholy, anxiety, meditation, the sleep of nature, the silent eloquence of night, the harmonious mystery of the starry heavens, the torment of expectation, hope, half-certainty, joy, intoxication, transport, desperate love! And what an orchestra to accompany these noble vocal melodies! What inventions! What ingenious researches! What treasures which a sudden inspiration has discovered! Those flutes in the low notes, those violins in quartet, those sketches by altos and violoncellos in sixths, that palpitating rhythm of the basses, that crescendo mounting and bursting forth at the climax of its luxurious ascension, those pauses during which the passion seems to recover its forces to launch forth again with the more violence. There is nothing like it! it is the art divine! it is poetry! it is love itself! The day when Weber heard this scene for the first time rendered as he had dreamed that it could be rendered, if he ever heard it so, that radiant day, doubtless, made all succeeding days look sad and pale to him. He should have died! What could he do with life after such joys as that! . . .

[To be concluded in our next.]

MUSIC A STIMULANT TO MENTAL EXERTION. Alfieri often, before he wrote, prepared his mind by listening to music. "Almost all my tragedies were sketched in my mind, either in the act of hearing music, or a few hours after"—a circumstance which has been recorded of many others. Lord Bacon had music often played in the room adjoining his study. Milton listened to his organ for his solemn inspirations; and music was even necessary to Warburton. The Symphonies which awoke in the poet sublime emotions, might have composed the inventive mind of the great critic in the visions of his theoretical mysteries. A celebrated French preacher, Bourdalou or Massillon, was once found playing on a violin, to screw his mind up to the pitch, preparatory to his sermon, which, within a short interval, he was to preach before the court. Curran's favorite mode of meditation was with his violin in his hand; for hours together would he forget himself, running voluntaries over the strings, while his imagination, in collecting its tones, was opening all his faculties for the coming emergency at the bar.—D'Israeli on the Literary Character.

The Mathematics of Music.

Sound is the result of the vibration of sonorous bodies. A particular sound is musical when its vibrations are uniform. Experiment shows that, of two sounds at the interval of an octave, the higher has twice as many vibrations as the lower. The comparative number of vibrations is the ratio of two sounds to each other. If middle C have 256 vibrations in a second, concert C will have 512.

The ratio of the octave is	. . .	1 to 2
"	"	fifth, . . . 2 to 3
"	"	fourth, . . . 3 to 4
"	"	major third, . . . 4 to 5
"	"	minor third, . . . 5 to 6
"	"	large tone, . . . 8 to 9
"	"	small tone, . . . 9 to 10
"	"	diatonic semi-tone, 15 to 16

Omitting for the present the ratios of other intervals, I give those of the major diatonic scale, premising that the more convenient way of writing them is in the form of fractions.

Do.	Re.	Mi.	Fa.	Sol.	La.	Si.	Do.
$\frac{8}{8}$	$\frac{9}{8}$	$\frac{10}{8}$	$\frac{11}{8}$	$\frac{12}{8}$	$\frac{13}{8}$	$\frac{14}{8}$	$\frac{15}{8}$

By combining these, we may ascertain the ratios of all possible intervals within the scale. Suppose, for example, that it be required to determine that of the interval Mi to Sol. Multiply together the ratios, $\frac{10}{8}$ and $\frac{8}{9}$. The result, in the lowest terms, is $\frac{5}{9}$, the ratio of the minor third. Hence by recurring to what has been said above, it may be seen that if a string sounding Mi, vibrate 400 times in a second, a string giving G, will vibrate 500 times in a second.

Let us determine the ratio of Re to Fa. Multiplying the two fractions, $\frac{9}{8}$ and $\frac{11}{10}$, we have $\frac{99}{80}$, which reduced is $\frac{27}{20}$. This is less than the ratio of the minor third. Hence, in any scale the interval from Re to Fa is less than a minor third. The reader can easily learn by a similar calculation that it is less than a fifth from Re to La. I omit the demonstration.

The ratio from Do to Re is $\frac{9}{8}$; that from Re to Mi is $\frac{10}{9}$. Deduct the less from the greater, which is accomplished by inverting the less and then multiplying as before. Thus $\frac{9}{8}$ multiplied by $\frac{9}{10}$ gives $\frac{81}{80}$. This last is then the ratio of the difference between the large and the small tone. This interval is called the comma.

If 53 commas be combined, or, which is the same thing, if the ratio $\frac{81}{80}$ be multiplied into itself 53 times, the result will be within a minute fraction of $\frac{1}{2}$, which is the ratio of the octave. Hence it is convenient, and also sufficiently accurate to regard the octave as an interval composed of 53 commas.

It appears from the above, that there are steps of three different dimensions in the common scale, viz: large tones, small tones, and diatonic semi-tones; the large tone consists of 9 commas, the small tone of 8, and the diatonic semi-tone of 5.

The order of intervals in the scale is as follows: Do to Re, 9 commas; Re to Mi, 8; Mi to Fa, 5; Fa to Sol, 9; Sol to La, 8; La to Si, 9; Si to Do, 5.

It will be easy to determine the measure, in commas, of all diatonic intervals.

The octave is	53 commas.
The fifth is	31 "
The fourth is	22 "
The third, major, is . . .	17 "
The third, minor, is . . .	14 "
The large tone is	9 "
The small tone is	8 "
The diatonic semi-tone is	5 "

I propose to examine the subject of Temperament, in some future articles, to which this is preliminary. E. H.

American Voices.

MR. EDITOR: I have read with much pleasure the remarks of your correspondent on "American voices." Everybody has heard at our Musical Conventions, in the churches, the streets, voices of remarkable beauty. Why do they so seldom reach that perfection of which they are capable? There are several reasons for this, some of which I propose to mention. Many, I think, are spoiled by injudicious use, and particularly by chorus singing. We will suppose a young soprano of good musical capacities, but without any knowledge of the proper use of the voice, beyond what may be acquired in a large singing school. She becomes a member of a church choir with twenty or thirty others, or joins one of our Sacred Music Societies. Here she learns to read music, it is true, but she also learns to scream. Having never been taught to develop the tone in the Italian method, (the only true method of vocalization, by the way,) knowing nothing of the importance of preserving the different registers within their proper limits, and having to sing against many others, whose chief aim is to produce as much sound as possible, without special regard to its quality, the result is that the voice is strained and in many cases permanently injured.

The remedy for this is instruction from a teacher who understands the Italian method of vocalizing. Not instruction in classes, because no two voices are alike or to be developed by the same rules, but individual instruction, solfeggio practice at the piano. This is very expensive, but is, I am confident, the only way in which a young voice can be properly trained. Many good voices are not discovered till the proper season for their cultivation has passed. After a certain age, and that not an advanced one, the vocal organs become intractable. With the increased attention given to music among us, and the greater respect in which it is held, we may hope that, in future, good voices will be more readily recognized early in life. We are sorry to confess another reason for the scarcity of first rate singers, and this is that many persons promising good voices are so flattered by their friends and admirers that they become conceited, and fancy that nobody can teach them anything. A few hours of solfeggio practice under a competent master would, we are sure, in many cases, dispel this delusion.

But I will not further trespass on your limits. We hope for better things. Several excellent teachers of the voice are now doing service in Boston, and if there is any truth in my remarks, we shall profit by their labors. X.

A SERENADE.

BY R. H. STODDARD.

The moon is muffled in a cloud,
That folds the lover's star,
But still beneath thy balcony
I touch my soft guitar.

If thou art waking, Lady dear,
The fairest in the land,
Unbar thy wreathed lattice now,
And wave thy snowy hand.

She hears me not; her spirit lies
In trances mute and deep;—
But music turns the golden key
Within the gate of sleep!

Then let her sleep, and if I fail
To set her spirit free,
My song will mingle in her dream,
And she will dream of me!

Mozart's "Magic Flute."

Beethoven pronounced Zauberflöte the masterpiece of Mozart, which goes far to substantiate what has been often asserted, and as often denied, that the composer of Fidelio was jealous of the reputation of the composer of Don Juan. Without presuming to offer an opinion on so delicate a point—without wishing to pry into the inward depths of the heart of Beethoven, or to arraign human nature on the plea that the greatest and most gifted have the failings of the weakest—we may state, without reserve, that so far as a close acquaintance with the dramatic writings of Mozart can entitle us to judge, the opera of Die Zauberflöte, viewed as a whole, appears not comparable to Figaro, Don Giovanni, or even to Idomeneo, a much earlier effort. That the score is crowded with beauties—that the melodies are abundant, fresh, and genuine—that the fact of having a tale of enchantment to set to music conducted Mozart into a new world, where the inexhaustible fertility of his invention was triumphantly demonstrated, cannot be denied. But several causes militated against the possibility of the Zauberflöte (any more than the Clemenza di Tito, its inferior, which was composed almost at the same time) being one of the greatest and most perfect works of its author. The circumstances under which it was written were unfavorable. Emanuel Schikaneder, the manager of one of the Vienna theatres, an old companion of Mozart's, when on the brink of ruin, prevailed on the great musician to promise him an opera in which the frivolous tastes of the majority of the habitués of his establishment should be in some measure consulted. Schikaneder himself wrote the book, and though the task was very unwelcome to Mozart, who was uncompromising in all that concerned his art, he undertook it to save his friend. How this kindness of heart was repaid by the basest ingratitude, is well known. Mozart never received a florin for the music of Zauberflöte, although the opera met with great success and revived the fortunes of the theatre. Schikaneder (who was also the original Papageno) disposed of copies of the score to the directors of other theatres, and appropriated to himself what it had been agreed should be the only remuneration for the time and pains Mozart had bestowed upon it. During the progress of composition Mozart was suffering under constant ill health, and forebodings of his approaching end were incessantly tormenting him. But, worst of all, the book of Schikaneder is little better than a farrago of absurdities, which no genius, however transcendent, could possibly succeed in elevating to serious interest. A brief sketch of the plot may help to substantiate this assertion. Sarastro, high priest of the temple of Isis, is desirous of educating Pamina, daughter of Astrifiamante, Queen of Night, in the faith and mysteries of the true religion. To carry out his purpose he has her conveyed away secretly from her mother's custody. Tamino, Prince of Egypt, is enamored of Pamina, and tracing her to the temple of Isis becomes a novice in the mysteries, in the hopes of regaining possession of the object of his love. To test the constancy of his nature, Sarastro, a very well-meaning personage for a priest of Isis, condemns him to a temporary separation from Pamina, and causes him to undergo sundry ordeals by which his truth and courage may be established. Pamina is condemned to similar trials. Both come out victorious, and in spite of the arts of the Queen of Night, who, burning with the desire of vengeance against Sarastro for having robbed her of her daughter, attempts to persuade Pamina to kill him and steal his crown, the lovers are found worthy of Isis and of each other. The comic action is divided between Papageno, a birdcatcher, who follows Tamino in his adventures, and Monostatos, the chief of the slaves of Sarastro, a traitor, who betrays his trust and endeavors to seduce Pamina. As a safeguard, Tamino is provided with a magic flute, by means of which he is enabled to give alarm and summon aid in case of danger. Hence, it is needless to add, the name of the opera—Die Zauberflöte. Papageno is also gifted with an instrument of music, which, when played upon, turns anger into mirth and sets everybody dancing. The effect which Mozart has made out of this, in the finale to the first act, where the famous tune, O dolce concerto, is introduced, must be well-remembered by all who have seen the opera. The other personages of the drama are three attendants on the Queen of Night, three good genii (boys of the Temple, in the German libretto) in the interest of Sarastro; an old woman, who afterwards becomes Papagena, the wife of Papageno, Demofentes, an orator, styled "initiated," who plays a part in the second act, into the secret of which the audience is not initiated; Oronte, a priest; and two men in armor, whose precise business is inexplicable.

Out of such materials it would have been strange if an interesting story had been constructed. Schikaneder could not do it, with Mozart to assist him, as the result shows. While the first act at least verges on the intelligible, the second would require an Iamblichus (not translated by a Taylor) to explain. Genii of either sex, priests, slaves, monsters, armed men, orators, and lions are mingled with the chief actors, in happy confusion. The real signification may possibly have something to do with the mysteries of Isis and Osiris; to the multitude it is "caviare," and sets comment at defiance. Goethe, the poet, nevertheless, wrote what he called a second part of Zauberflöte, one of the least generally read of his works. Our intention is not to enter into a critical analysis of an opera which, composed for a German stage in 1791, is at the present moment (60 years after) brought out at an Italian Opera as a certain means of profit. Moreover the music, thanks to its beauty and variety, is familiar "as household words." The short pieces have enjoyed an unchanging popularity in the concert room, and are known to amateurs as well as to musicians. The overture, the most learned and admirable of all Mozart's orchestral preludes, is probably the finest ever composed. Mozart would seem to have written it to console himself for those ephemeral portions of the opera which he was persuaded by Schikaneder to write, and rewrite, until Schikaneder was satisfied. It is a regular feast of counterpoint; but the beauty and sublimity of the ideas, and the exceeding clearness of their development, take away all vestige of pedantry. The chorale, or canto fermo, in C minor, for the two armed men, in the finale to the second act, is also an elaborate and majestic composition, the fugal accompaniment in the orchestra betraying the hand of the consummate master. In opposition to these grand pieces we may cite the first air of Papageno, the birdcatcher; the duct between him and Pamina; and, in short, all the music in which Papageno is concerned, as among the lightest music Mozart has produced — although, on the other hand, extremely lively and pretty. But, as a counterbalance, there are many passages in Zauberflöte which discover neither the beauty of melody, nor the prodigious science, nor the lofty and passionate expression for which the dramatic music of Mozart is generally remarkable. The march, with flute solo, when Pamina and Tamino are passing through the ordeals of fire and water, with another flute solo near the opening of the first finale, are absolutely trivial, and are evident proofs of Mozart's contempt for the excessive absurdity of the situation. Wherever opportunities for dramatic effect present themselves, Mozart, as usual, has availed himself of them in a masterly manner. A striking example of this is found in the introduction to the first act, where Tamino is pursued by a serpent, and saved by the intervention of the three attendants of the Queen of Night. Of the passionate declamatory music — a style in which Mozart has never been surpassed and rarely equalled — there are several fine specimens in Zauberflöte, among which the most remarkable are the largetto of the first air of the Queen of Night (in G minor), the song of Pamina (in the same key), and the exquisite quartet in E flat, at the commencement of the second finale, for Pamina, and the three boys of the Temple. The power of endowing each of his characters with a distinct and well-sustained individuality, so noticeable in Figaro and Don Giovanni, is scarcely less remarkable in Zauberflöte. The solemnity of the music given to Sarastro and the priests of Isis is wonderfully contrasted with the reckless levity of that of Papageno; while between the bravura songs of the Queen of Night (from the profuse employment of the highest notes of the register, destined, no doubt, for some exceptional voice) and the music of Pamina, the difference is equally well maintained. Even in the trios for the female attendants of the Queen of Night, and those for the boys of the Temple of Isis, the contrast is preserved with scarcely less felicity; and it must be noticed that the separate characteristics are set forth quite as strongly in elaborate morceaux d'ensemble as in solos, duets, and airs, where, of course, its exhibition would be comparatively easy. If we would refer to isolated pieces, we need only point to the beautiful air, in E flat, of Tamino, O cara immagine; the merry little song of Papageno, Gente è qui l'uccellatore, one of the most sparkling tunes ever written; the recitative and air of the Queen of Night (in B flat), Infelice consolato, with its pathetic adagio and extraordinary passages of bravura; the one song of Monostatos, the chief slave, to which the sparing employment of the contrabasso, and the incessant reiteration of semi-quavers, impart a special character; the second, and by far the grandest, air of the Queen of Night, Gli angui d'inferno (in D minor), in which a mother's curse is conveyed with such terrible power, while the unnatural strain upon the higher notes of the voice in the last movement is overlooked in the belief that the personage and the situation is unnatural; and last, not least, the solemn and magnificent air of Sarastro (in E), Qui sdegnò, which the efforts of all the bass singers, bad, good, and indifferent, for the last half century, have failed to render commonplace or hackneyed. This song is an apostrophe to Peace, and music never spoke in language more tranquil, expressive, and sublime. The air in G minor of Pamina, Ah lo so, stands alone in pathetic loveliness, and we have therefore separated it from the rest, as incomparable with anything else. Among the best concerted pieces we may include the morceaux d'ensemble for the three attendants of the Queen of Night, and those for the three boys of the Temple, which only differ in character, not in degree of beauty. The first finale, though very long and varied, is not to be named in the same breath with the finales to Figaro and Don Giovanni; but the second is full of musical beauties, and were it not for the ineffective march of the action, which necessitates so many changes and full closes, would be unexceptionable. The opening quartet and the concluding chorus, both in E flat, are both exquisite in their way. The two quintets are ingenious and interesting pieces of concerted music; but that in the first act (in B flat), where Papageno begins to sing with the padlock in his mouth, is by far the most beautiful. The little duet, in E flat, La dove prende amor ricetto, is as simple and popular a tune as, O dolce concerto, and has been as long the property of the orgues de Barbarie and other instruments of street harmony. Its melody will be recognized by the uninitiated as the "Manly Heart." To the introduction of the first act we have already alluded, as to one of the finest and most dramatic pieces. The instrumentation of the whole opera is masterly, transparent, and gorgeously colored. Among the effects peculiarly impressive, we may note the use of the trombones in the opening of the overture, and in the beginning of the second act; the sparing manner in which these solemn instruments (too often made the representatives of mere noise by composers) are employed throughout, is worth attention. As in Don Giovanni the trombones are only brought in when the statue of the Commendatore appears, so in Zauberflöte they are (after the overture) entirely confined to the music of the priests; and we cannot commend the taste of those who, violating Mozart's intention, for the sake of an imaginary increase of power or brilliancy, force them into other parts of the score, and deprive them of their individuality in the points where the composer has himself introduced them. Without entering into further detail, however, we may bring this rapid sketch to a close by repeating that, though the opera of Zauberflöte contain some of the best, it also contains some of the least admirable music of Mozart, and, therefore, cannot justly be cited as his chef d'œuvre. What is feeble or trivial, however, we readily lay to the stupidity of Schikaneder and the libretto; while that which is great and beautiful springs exclusively from the immortal genius of the composer. — London Times, July 11, 1851.

Napoleon a Pianist.

Historians have written much about the musical talents of Frederick the Great, Charles IV. George IV. and other monarchs; but no one has hitherto related one word about the musical genius of Napoleon.

The following anecdote will therefore serve to fill up a gap in the history of this Emperor, by illustrating the memorable moment when his musical talent, without giving any premonitory symptoms, shone forth in all its glory!

One evening, a concert took place in the Tuilleries, upon which occasion a number of distinguished French and Italian singers had assembled to contend for the palm. The productions were unquestionably brilliant.

Napoleon, however, seated in his arm chair, appeared very impatient. Every minute he shifted his position, shook his head with vexation, and displayed most unmistakable signs of weariness and ennui. The company apprehended a storm; and they were not mistaken; for, suddenly, while Kreutzer was performing a most lovely andante, he was requested by Marshal Duroc to desist.

"You tire his Majesty, who desires you will not play any further." The great artist turned pale at this humiliation: but fortunately the concert was nearly at an end. Napoleon arose, and passing by the tragic singer, Madame Branchu, returned her salute, saying "Madame, you had better have your throat planed smooth," and then moved on.

Upon the termination of these concerts, the singers were accustomed to remain in the saloon a short time to enjoy a little chit-chat. And the events of that evening afforded them an exclusive subject for conversation. They were well aware, that, when once the Emperor had quitted the room, he never returned; but scarcely had a quarter of an hour elapsed, when, to the complete dismay of the artists, the door opened, and Napoleon stood in the midst of them.

"I want you to sing me the chorus from Nina."

The musicians looked at each other, not one daring to reply; at length the boldest stuttered out, "Pardon, sire, we do not know that chorus."

"You must know it; every one knows it."

"The chorus-singers, sire, perform it on the stage; we are solo-singers."

"You will sing me the chorus from Nina: I want to hear it."

"But, sire, we have not the music here."

"Then sing it from memory."

"But, sire, the members of the orchestra are gone, and we have thus no accompanying instruments."

"Here is a piano forte."

"Sire, no one here can play it."

"Very well! then I will accompany you myself." And to the amazement of all present, Napoleon sat himself down to the instrument and struck the keys, which, far from producing an agreeable harmony, awakened a most ear-rending discord.

"Now, begin," exclaimed the Emperor, quite insensible to the harsh dissonances he was creating. "Now begin, and keep good time!"

The voices arose in wild and discordant strains, the instrument groaned beneath the imperial hands, and in this style the chorus from Nina was performed: performed, for life or death, as indeed could not otherwise be done by singers who knew not one note of the music, and in the presence of an Emperor, whose only instrument was the sword. At length the concert terminated, and the Emperor, rising from the piano and addressing the artists:

"I am satisfied," he said; "see, every thing succeeds when one but wills it."

Thus saying, he left the room. The ensuing morning, Prince Eugene departed for the court of Franz II. to solicit, in the name of the Emperor of France, the hand of Marie Louise.

During the performance of the chorus from Nina, Napoleon had weighed in the scales the doubts of his secret thoughts, and had formed a resolution. He, at that moment, required occupation for his hands, that his mind might be unfettered. Thus he became a pianist.

CORRECTION. By a careless mistake, which we failed to discover in the hurry of leaving the city last week, in our article on "The Musical Convention," we called the scene in "Der Freyschiütz": Wie nähte mir der Schlummer, by the first words of another piece in the same opera: Und ob die Wolke.

Franz Schubert—His Life and Works.

So very little is known of the history of this remarkable song composer, or of his numerous other works besides his songs, that the reader will thank us, or rather the good friend who for us has compiled the following facts:

Ferdinand, Ignaz and Franz were the three sons of school-teacher Schnbert, of the Lichenthal parish, one of the suburbs of Vienna. Ferdinand was born in that parish on the 18th Oct. 1794, Franz in the suburb Himmelfortgrand, on the last day of January, 1797; Ignaz it is presumed was the youngest of the three, but we have no means of ascertaining. The father was their first music teacher, but their studies in singing, violin, piano forte, and organ playing, as well as in the science of music, were perfected under the guidance of Michael Hobzer. Ferdinand's progress was such that at the age of thirteen years he played the violin concertos of Fodor, in the choir of the church, and is now one of the most distinguished organists in the Austrian capital. He, however, does not make music his profession. At the age of sixteen (1810) he was appointed assistant teacher in the imperial orphan house, six years later was advanced to the post of teacher, and since 1824 has been a professor in the imperial normal school of St. Anna, at Vienna, as well as visitor to many of the suburban schools. As a musician, he is director in several Church-music Societies, and also of the great "Society of the Friends of Music in the Austrian Capital." He is a man of much influence, and is connected in various capacities with many charitable associations. He has made himself known as a writer on subjects connected with schools and teaching, as well as a composer. Among his musical works, a portion only of which have been published, the principal are, one Regina Coeli; one Seelen Messe in German; four Songs for the Orphan Boys; two Tantum ergo; one Parade March; twenty-four Cadenzas for Organ or Piano Forte; two Children's Operettes ("The Little Mischiefmaker" and the "Gleaner Girl") one Grand Mass; one Requiem to the Memory of his brother Franz—a Requiem being the last musical performance at which he was present;—two Salve Regina; one Sonata for the Piano Forte and Czakan (a sort of flute, used much in Austria). In his style he followed his brother Franz, for whom his affection was strong to an extraordinary degree. He took him into his house, which Franz never left during the last two months of his life, and in the arms of Ferdinand, the gifted young composer breathed his last.

Franz profited so greatly by the instructions of his father and Michael Hobzer, that at the age of eleven, he was placed among the singing boys of the Court Chapel,—a place for which his uncommonly fine voice peculiarly fitted him. In this position he remained five years, studied the piano forte and stringed instruments with such success, as soon to be able to lead the rehearsals of the orchestra as first violinist. The Court organist, Ruzica, was his instructor at this time in thorough bass, and old Salien in composition. After his voice changed he left the institution, being about seventeen years of age, and lived sometimes in lodgings, sometimes in his father's house; studied the works of his great triumvirate, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven; gave lessons, and devoted all the rest of his time to original composition. Long before he had mastered the rules of composition, and with no one to guide him, he had written quartets, symphonies and piano forte music; now he tried his hand at every possible style and form of composition, and the result of his labors, both as to quantity and quality, almost surpass the limits of credibility.

Operas, Symphonies, Choruses, Overtures, Cantatas, Psalms, Masses, Graduals, Offertories, Stabat Mater, Hallelujahs, many Sonatas, Trios, Variations, Fantasias, Rondos, Dances, Marches, Impromptus, Vocal and String Quartets, Italian Arias, a Grand Octet, &c., &c., prove his wonderful productiveness. In Ballads and Songs it would be difficult to find his equal in musical history; more than two hundred were long since printed and have become the common inheritance of the musical world, and many others were left in manuscript.

The highest originality, deep poetical feeling, surprising truth of expression, the nicest perception of the slightest hint of the poet, a fancy full of fire,—tempered by a tendency to sadness, a simple but beautiful style of melody, the highest richness of modulation and never failing novelty in form, are some of the leading characteristics of these wonderful songs. But as genius ever finds new paths, it naturally follows that the master pays little attention to anything but the kernel, and difficulties of intonation are thrown in the way of the singer, and unexpected figures and changes in the path of the accompanist.

His only absences from Vienna were short excursions into Hungary, Steyermark, and Upper Austria. He was happiest when among the friends of his boyhood and youth, and loved the pleasures of society, especially when he could throw off all the trammels of fashionable and conventional life. He was ever cheerful, upright, and open-hearted; an enthusiast for his art, an affectionate son, an obedient and thankful pupil. His accurate perception of what his genius was fitted to accomplish, and his unerring judgment in estimating his own works, saved him from the usually ill effects of the injudicious encomiums of flatterers, and the valueless praise of mere partisans. So little did he care for the applause of the multitude, that he made it a point not to be present at the first performances of his works, choosing to have their success, if successful, depend entirely upon their intrinsic merits, rather than upon an unwillingness on the part of the audience to injure the feelings of their author. Two or three anecdotes will show the estimation in which the songs of Franz Schubert were held, while yet they were new and their author unknown out of the circle in which he moved.

One of the first of Schubert's songs was that wonderful production the "Erl König," composed when he was still very young. This piece struck John Michael Vogl, then a leading singer in the Imperial Opera, so forcibly, that he made it a point to sing it with all that force of expression for which he was noted, in the art loving circles of the Capital; thus bringing the boy musician at once prominently before the musical world of Vienna.

Schindler brought the "Songs of Ossian" and some other of Schubert's works to Beethoven, while he was lying on his death bed. Beethoven looked them through, and with a voice full of emotion exclaimed: "Truly Schubert is animated with a spark of heavenly fire!"

Jean Paul, "the Only One," he of the deepest poetic heart perhaps that has blessed the earth, he knew and felt the depths and heights of the young composer's genius; and as he drew near his last great change, a few hours before he breathed his last, he called for music, and that music the singing of several of these songs.

For the stage Schubert composed "The Friends of Salamanea," "Der vierjährige Posten," "Fernando," "Die Bürgschaft," "The Twin Brothers," "Alphonzo and Estrella," "Fierabras," "The Devil's Chateau," "Claudine von Villa Bella," "Rosamond," "The Conspirators," and "The Minnesingers." Two other operas, "Adrastus" and "Sacotala" were left unfinished.

The Autumn of 1828 came on. Schubert's fame was beginning to extend far beyond the bounds of Austria. He was already honorary member of the "Society of the Friends of Music," and of the "Philharmonic Societies" of Graetz and Innspruck, and seemed destined to supply the place of the great Beethoven, in whose funeral procession he had borne a lighted candle on the 29th March the preceding year. Franz at this time went into the family of his brother Ferdinand to reside. From the middle of September he never left the house. A quick consumption destroyed his vital powers, and on the 19th of November he breathed his last in the arms of his brother, at the early age of 31. It was one of his last wishes to be placed by the side of Beethoven. That place had been filled. But the second simple monument to the left of the great master is adorned with the bronze bust of the disciple—a speaking likeness. There lies Schubert.

Ferdinand still recalls as the happiest days of his life, the period when the three brothers still dwelt beneath their father's roof and scarcely allowed a day to pass without joining in the performance of some quartet. Father Schubert would take the violoncello, Ferdinand the first and Ignaz the second violin, while Franz made up the quartet with his viola.

And thus Franz—for these happiest days were while he still continued in the imperial choir—during those five years of study—by practising and proving each new composition of his own, and comparing them all with the works of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, learned to see with unerring judgment his successes and his failures.

The translator and compiler of the above sketch was thrown by a fortunate accident, in the summer of 1851, into the company of Ferdinand, and though twenty-three years had passed since he had parted from Franz, and time had begun to leave its impress upon his fine features, the tones of his voice as he spoke of the deceased, showed how deeply and sincerely he still mourned the loss of the young master—the beloved brother.

A Central Opera House or Theatre.

It may be fairly doubted whether there is any very general desire for an Opera House or first-class Theatre in this city. The history of the past six months' agitation on this subject justifies this doubt. Yet it is clear to a demonstration, that such an establishment is needed by the city of Boston. Let us see why it is that the movement of the past Spring has not resulted in effecting this object. Is the absence of a general desire for it, the reason of its non-accomplishment? We think not. That this desire does not exist, we think accounted for by the fact that the mass of the community have no faith in its being a necessity of the times and of this place. That such is the fact, however, was recognized and illustrated with force and eloquence by the knot of practical and active business and professional men, who met at the Revere House in — to carry out such a project. To one familiar with Boston faces, and with Boston characteristics, the assemblage of that night, for such a purpose, must have caused great astonishment, until the main-spring of the meeting was developed. He must have looked around in amazement, asking himself, "Where are our musical men? our theatre-goers? our men of leisure? Why, these are our merchants! not even our capitalists; no,—brokers, importers, bankers, domestic-goods merchants! What have stocks, hemp, exchange, calico, sugar, to do with an opera house!"

But his amazement would have been soon changed into admiration, by Mr. P. P. F. Degrand, who with racy good humor and practical good sense, shewed the company why the need existed, and why they were the very persons to supply it. The business of the city required it! The argument was not one of mere plausibility, for it were folly to attempt to impose, in this way, upon such a body of men. Facts were at hand to sustain every argument. The main point, viz.: of the necessity of such an establishment to the business interests of the city, was fully proved — that nail was driven home and clenched! The ardor of habitually cool men saw it so clearly, that to will and to do seemed one thing with them; and with the justifiable pride of their class they said: "Let us do this ourselves, — we, the merchants of Boston, — the active men who are to be benefited by it, and with whom, eminently, it rests to maintain the character of our city, — and let us not call in the retired capitalist; we do not need him!" Here was, however, mistake No. 1. They needed him in more senses than one. They needed his ready capital to put the enterprise at once on a sure footing, they needed the prestige of his wealth to give confidence and encouragement to the less public-spirited, and they needed, most of all, the far-seeing faith and enlarged commercial views of that sober class, to keep them true, on the calm morrow of that excited occasion, to their great idea of an establishment that would do honor to their city and so, indirectly, benefit their fellow citizens and themselves. They needed the guidance of these men to keep the question of dividends or no dividends out of their heads, and to keep a great public enterprise from degenerating into a corporate speculation. Not a word was whispered, at that meeting, of its being good property to its subscribers. The higher ground was distinctly taken, of an indirect benefit from making the city attractive to strangers.

A Committee was selected to carry the enterprise forward, perhaps as judiciously composed as the materials permitted. Our only criticism on it is, that it did not represent sufficiently diversified interests: for not a month had passed before we heard on all sides that they were discussing, which place will pay best? the project of shops underneath, &c., &c. As soon as this aspect of the business became prominent, and these secondary and collateral considerations were advanced to a principal position, the outsiders lost all faith in the project, at least in its being carried out on the scale and in the spirit of that first ardent and harmonious meeting.

The period of that meeting was a remarkably auspicious one. The Tremont Temple was just burned; so was the National Theatre. The "Old Drury" was in process of demolition. The Mayor spoke ardently for the enterprise. He recounted the foregoing incidents and strengthened the urgency of the new scheme by informing the company that the two remaining places of public assemblage, the Howard Athenæum and the Melodeon, were so unsafe that he should not renew their licenses, which would expire in the coming autumn, unless they should be entirely re-modelled and made safe of ingress and egress.

Money was then and is abundant and cheap. The National Theatre, then level with the ground, has in this short interval, by the energy and capital of a few individuals, been re-built and is almost ready for occupation. What has become of the Theatre and Opera House? Why is it not built, commenced, the money raised, applied for? The papers first announced it all subscribed, the location selected, the plans drawn. It was to be on the Coolidge Estate in Bowdoin Square. Then the Apthorp Estate in Boylston Street; then the Estate on the corner of Hayward Place and Washington Street; then corner of School and Tremont; and last of all, the papers lately assured us that the Gas Company's lot, in Mason Street, was decided on, and then came a contradiction to this, with the explanation that the Gas Company asked too much money for it; and we have more recently heard, on pretty good authority, that the Gas Company have never received a proposal for their land! In the midst of all these announcements and contradictions, all, we believe, unauthorized, shall we hazard a guess as to the facts, and an opinion on the reasons of the facts? We think that the Committee were discouraged, not at the price of the various Estates offered them, but at the very small amount subscribed. And the difficulty experienced in raising the money, we think, is ascribable to the mistaken plan of procedure. But instead of going into the details of these mistakes, we will here give our own views of the best course to fairly test the question, "Is a central Theatre or Opera House wanted or not?"

Enlarge the Committee to fifteen or twenty members. Ascertain, by discussion in committee, which location ranks A No. 1, independent of cost, and which A No. 2. Get the refusal of both estates for thirty days, which is long enough; get it gratis, if you can, but get it, even if you pay $1 to $500 for it. Having learned the lowest price of each, take a vote in committee on the point, which, on the whole, is most desirable? Call such one A and the other B. Go to an Architect with the shape and contents of the lot, agree with him upon a plan, take his estimate of the cost of construction, and with these data, form your own opinion of the whole cost of the enterprise. Thus prepared, go to some ten or twenty of our most public-spirited men, either by circular or orally, and say to them as follows: "Gentlemen, the merchants of Boston say that a first-class Theatre or Opera House is required for the prosperity and character of the city. You have heard the arguments and seen the need recognized in the papers generally. We have been selected to carry out this design. We have obtained an act of Incorporation and have secured the refusal of two lots of land, both suitable for the purpose, and both within the limit of — street on the North, and — street on the South. Our plans and estimates have been carefully made, and we, after making allowance for a contingent excess, have determined that — thousand dollars will be required. We have fixed the par of the shares at so much. We wish you to take the lead and give us your names for thirty days; — this, if you encourage it, will be sufficient to determine whether the commercial and monied interest of the city have faith in the want, and faith in these means to meet it." We think there is little doubt that a sufficient number of this class, if appealed to in this practical and straightforward way, could easily be found to furnish $75,000. If not, then give the project up as premature and not required. If you get this sum subscribed, exhibit these names and sums at the Music Stores, Hotels, Merchants' Exchange, and in the daily newspapers, — annexed to a circular stating explicitly the above details of your plan, and add, in substance, as follows: "The undersigned Committee, &c., selected, &c., have consented to devote thirty days to raising the amount of — dollars to purchase the land and build a first-class Theatre for Dramatic and Operatic representations. Believing this period of time to be amply sufficient to test the desire of the public to encourage such a project, they have obtained the refusal of two eligible estates within the above-mentioned local limits, and the promise of the sums hereto annexed on the part of the above-named gentlemen, — said promise to stand thirty days and no longer. If the sum required is made up on the — day of — (thirty days from date) the undersigned hereby pledge themselves to carry out the work in a manner which shall do honor to the city and gratify the pride of the citizens. If not, they, and perhaps the public at large, will rest satisfied that the time is not yet ripe for such a project." One more caution, which we consider of vital importance. Let the shares be made small (say not over $250) and no privileges reserved to ANY ONE. Thirty days, we confidently believe, would bring the money, whether it were two or three hundred thousand dollars; for we think the first case has not yet occurred, where the retired merchants and men of wealth of this good city, have refused an appeal to their purses for a public object which they believed required for the interest and honor of Boston. Should they refuse it, it ought to be conclusive that they do not so believe, and if they do not so believe, the public, including our humble selves would, we think, assent to their conclusion and sit down quietly with the Museum, the "National," the Music Hall, and the re-modelled Howard Athenæum, or, with the Southern and Western traders, will go to New York for our amusements and save the cost of the journey in buying our knick-knacks and a new suit of clothes cheaper there; for anxious as we may feel, in the character of musicians, to have a suitable place to attract and listen to the world-renowned artists who seem to be all coming to our shores, we will not pretend either that we are more cognizant of the true interests or more jealous of the true honor of our city, than the class we refer to. SPES.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

THE GERMANIA SERENADE BAND gave their first afternoon Concert on Wednesday, to a good audience. We were not so fortunate as to hear the overture to Oberon, with which the Concert began, but heard high praise of the manner in which it was performed. The quartet by Mozart which followed, was played in the best style by Messrs. Suck, Verron, Eichler, and Wulf Fries. Mr. Suck's violin solo was also a very finished performance, and called forth warm applause. The brass music was of the best, and a friend whose musical privileges have been greater than our own, assures us that no where has he ever heard better. To our own taste, however, it is rather loud for the limited size of the Melodeon. A march composed by Mr. Schnapp was especially well performed, and received much applause. The waltzes were given with much spirit, quite rivalling in their execution that of the Germania Society. The Rail Road Galop, by Gung'l, was, however, decidedly wanting in the go-ahead energy with which the Steyermärkische Company played it; the Conductor evidently had the fear of the law before his eyes, and did not put on quite steam enough. The improvement which has always been remarked between each Concert of this Society, was even more noticeable after the vacation just ended; and we observed an addition of one violon-cello and one violin to the ranks of the orchestra. The time, it should be observed, has been altered to 3 o'clock.

THE GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY. We hardly need even ask the attention of our readers to the advertisement of the Germania orchestra. With the delightful recollections of last winter still fresh in our minds, it is unnecessary to say anything more than that the Germanians are to be with us on the 15th of November, and that their first concert will be given as soon as the Music Hall shall be finished, which there is no reason to suppose will be at a later day than that named above. It will be seen that JAELE is to assist them in the whole series of their concerts, and we also are informed that the orchestra has been enlarged by the addition of six stringed instruments, making their whole number to consist now of thirty performers. This addition goes far towards that perfect proportion in the composition of the orchestra which has seemed to be almost the only thing wanting to its perfection. We are indebted to this society for the finest orchestral performances that have ever been given in this city. More than that, we are indebted to them for the knowledge of many of the choicest treasures of classical music. They have done much, both by the perfection of their execution and the selection of their programmes, to elevate the standard of musical taste in our audiences, and to quicken and stimulate the ambition of our resident musicians to keep pace with the advancing standard. For this we owe them much, and would welcome them back to Boston with most sincere wishes for their success.

THE MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY, (as we learn from the daily papers,) has entered the field for the coming season. Their afternoon concerts will commence on Friday, September 17, at the Melodeon, and will be given there until the completion of the Music Hall, when they will be continued there. The crowd of competitors against whom this Society will have to contend will be greater this season than ever before, and it behooves our old friends to take good care that they lose none of the laurels already won. We are glad to observe that private rehearsals have already been begun, which have become absolutely necessary to ensure that proper performance of the music which could not be had by rehearsals before an audience of a thousand persons. The new music selected in Europe, by Mr. August Fries, to replace the library of the Society destroyed by fire last winter, has already arrived, and, under the auspices of Mr. Fries, who this season holds the conductor's baton, (which Mr. Webb, by the pressure of other cares has been obliged to resign,) we doubt not that the performances of this Society will equal, if not surpass, those of former seasons. We have but one other wish as regards this Society, and that is, that we might hear some of its members on the instruments for which they are best fitted, and on which they especially excel. The performances of the GERMANIA SERENADE BAND have shown us what gentlemen who are also members of the Fund can do on their favorite instruments, and the public will hardly be satisfied with a less degree of perfection in these particulars than we have seen may be attained merely by some changes most easily made.

New York.

The steamship Arctic arrived at New York on Sunday evening last, bringing HENRIETTE SONTAG, the celebrated prima donna. Her party consisted of her husband Count Rossi, Signor Pozzilloni, tenor, from the Imperial Opera; and Monsieur Eckert, conductor, from the Italian Opera, Paris. On the voyage, Sontag gave a concert, and distributed the proceeds among the crew. At divine service on board the ship on Sunday, she took part in the singing.

ALBONI gave her first Concert on Tuesday evening, assisted by SAN GIOVANNI and ROVERE. The Tribune says:

"To our mind her Sonnambula was her triumph.—Nothing could be more perfect throughout than the plaintive but rich Ah! non credere, followed by the delicious Ah! non giunge. We have heard most of the stars of song in this air, and we are bold to say that Alboni showed as correct a conception of the sentiment, and rendered the music of the composer as brilliantly, more purely, and with less extraneous ornament, than any whom we can call to mind. It afforded her a fine opportunity of displaying those rich contralto notes of which everybody has heard. The ill-contained impatience of the audience to applaud proved the wonder and admiration with which they were received. If we mistake not, Madame Alboni herself will concur with us in the opinion that the Ah! non giunge was her great piece: she exerted herself far more in singing it than in the other airs, and, when the audience insisted on an encore, could not conceal symptoms of fatigue."

CALIFORNIA. SIGNORA BISCACCANTI. This popular and talented cantatrice returned last evening from Santa Clara Valley. She gave a concert at San José last evening, which was one of the most brilliant and most largely attended of the season. The Signora leaves in a few days, to favor the citizens of Stockton with her angelic strains — Alla California, 14th ult.

England.

LONDON. HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—On Saturday night, her Majesty's Theatre closed its doors for the season, the opera being the "Barbier de Séviglia." It was exceedingly well performed, and we have scarcely ever seen it go off with greater spirit. Madame de la Grange is really a charming Rosina. The elegant gaiety of the character is quite suited to her style of acting. She sang with marvellous brilliancy, performing prodigies of execution with such graceful ease and such exquisite clearness and finish, that one could not help admiring them even when they were most questionable in point of taste and propriety.

The past season, in so far as this theatre is concerned, has been so monotonous and so destitute of interesting occurrences, that it does not furnish matter for any detailed retrospect. That it has been a very unfortunate one is a fact of public notoriety; and it would have come to a premature close had not a number of the establishment stepped forward to its support. There can be no doubt that this want of success was owing, in a considerable degree, to Mademoiselle Wagner's breach of engagement. Upon this celebrated lady the lessee certainly depended (as he had formerly done upon Jenny Lind) as the great feature of the season; and it was with reference to her that he had made his calculations and arrangements. Disappointed in this most essential object, the plan of his campaign was upset, and he was precluded from bringing forward those pieces in which Mademoiselle Wagner's appearance would have constituted an interesting novelty. He was thus thrown back upon the ordinary repertoire of the theatre; and, although the performances during the season have always been respectable, and often excellent, yet the pieces performed have been too well known to be attractive. With the solitary exception of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg's "Casilda," not a single opera has been produced this season that was not quite familiar to the public. During a large part of the season, the great weight of the performances lay upon Mademoiselle Cruvelli, whose labors were zealous, unremitting and efficient. But, for a reason that may be guessed at, she suddenly withdrew; increasing by her secession the lessee's difficulties.

The circumstances most worthy of commemoration have been the introduction to the English public of Madame de la Grange and Signor Bassini; and the debut of Madame Charton upon the Italian stage. Madame de la Grange has become, and most deservedly, a very great favorite. Signor de Bassini we regard as the most satisfactory baritone we have possessed since the best days of Tamburini. And Madame Charton promises to be as admirable on the Italian as she is on the French stage.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. Few events in the operatic world have been anticipated with a greater degree of curiosity than the production of M. Jullien's long-promised opera of Pietro il Grande. Many were, indeed, sceptical about the matter, and would not be persuaded that the grand master of quadrilles and waltzes, the director of Promenade Concerts, who animates the feet of the dancers and revellers at the Bal Masqué, could find time, inclination and ability to devote to the composition of an opera. The "man of the people," however, disappointed his patrons for the first time. That M. Jullien has a soul above polkas must be sufficiently evident to those who have watched his progress for years, and appreciated his untiring efforts to render the highest class of orchestral music acceptable to the crowd. Whoever, noticing these indications of a more serious bent in Jullien, has been used to regard him as much in the light of a reformer as of a public amuser, must have been rather pleased than surprised at the announcement of a grand opera from his pen.

It is a more difficult task to speak of the music of M. Jullien. Its prevalent defects are a want of sustained style, a superfluous employment of modulation, chromatic scales and harmonies, and a method of instrumentation which sometimes leads to obscurity, though it frequently attains new and striking effects. As with the orchestra, so with the voices; M. Jullien, in pursuing the phantom of originality, which never yields to wooing, but comes naturally or not at all, is tempted to hazardous experiments, not always crowned with success. Add to these a diffuseness, showing M. Jullien to be a contemner of the maxim "Brevity is the soul of wit,"—a tendency to that fragmentary kind of writing which Meyerbeer began and Hulevy emulates, but which, not being excellent in art, cannot be imitated with success—an excessive use of the brass instruments, and those of percussion, and a tolerable number of reminiscences from the forms and ideas of other composers—and we have exhausted our catalogue of objections. On the other side of the balance-sheet there is happily enough to atone for many more sins of omission and commission. One great quality in M. Jullien's music is its unflagging spirit. However ambitiously elaborate, and however lengthy in certain places, it is never dull. Tamberlik, Mad'le Anne Zerr, and Herr Formes sustained the principal parts, and their performance is highly commended.

As a spectacle few operas have been more liberally put upon the stage. The costumes are magnificent, and the scenery and decorations appropriate and picturesque. In the finale to the second act—the battle of Pultava—the stage was literally covered with supernumeraries, and the processions were gorgeous and extravagant. The horses, however, excited some marks of dissatisfaction the moment they appeared; although they looked very much like the same horses that have been applauded in the Juive and the Huguenots, and conducted themselves quite as well.

M. Jullien himself presided in the orchestra, and received a hearty welcome on his appearance.—The Times, Aug. 18.

The London Daily News says of this opera: "We thought the author of the Huguenots and the Prophète had carried the power of physical sound in music as far as it could well go; but he roars 'like any sucking dove' compared to the author of Pietro il Grande. Jullien, moreover, has not merely borrowed Meyerbeer's general manner, but has directly imitated many particular passages. Rossini's war-song, sung by Formes in the second act, is taken from Marcel's famous 'Pif-paf' in the Huguenots. The chorus of conspirators in the same act is a reminiscence of the 'benediction of porlards' in the above opera; and in the third act there is a passage, also in a chorus of conspirators, which strongly recalls the duet between Valentine and Marcel. There are constant traces, too, of Mozart, Rossini, and Weber; and a large proportion of M. Jullien's phrases have, by frequent previous use, become common property. He is most successful in his choruses, several of which are most spirited and effective; and least successful in his airs, every one of which is a decided failure. . . . The gem of the opera is the national Russian hymn, Di Moscoria cletti figli, sung in the first act as a solo and chorus; afterwards as the finale to the opera. The melody has much simple grandeur; and it is harmonized and arranged with great skill and the happiest effect.

MUSICAL VADE MECUM.

MANUAL of the SCIENCE of MUSIC,

ADAPTED TO THE WANTS OF
TEACHERS AND SCHOLARS.

By HERMAN S. SARONI,
Editor of "Marx's Musical Composition," etc.

THIS work is what its title imports, a most useful companion to every musician and amateur, and an invaluable aid to every student. The work is divided into six general parts, as follows, viz.

- PART I.—Melody.
PART II.—Rhythm.
PART III.—Organology.—(Descriptions of the various human voices, and different instruments, together with their scales, and the manner of their notation.)
PART IV.—Harmony and Composition—The Elementary Forms.
PART V.—Harmony and Composition—The Æsthetic Forms.
PART VI.—The Artistic Execution of Music.
To these are added a Condensed History of Music by Epochs, and a very full and carefully arranged

ALPHABETICAL INDEX,

containing not only the terms employed in the book, but also all the terms used by musical writers with their explanations. The work forms a handsome duodecimo volume, printed on superfine paper and elegantly bound in cloth.

THIRD EDITION, NOW READY, OF THE

Translation of MARX'S GREAT WORK on MUSICAL COMPOSITION.

THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF MUSICAL COMPOSITION, of Dr. A. B. MARX, of Berlin, is celebrated as the MASTER TREATISE on this subject, and any enumeration of its merits seems superfluous. Competent judges are unanimous in bestowing the highest praise on the manner in which Mr. SARONI has translated the original. The publishers have received strong testimonials of approbation from Messrs. Scharfenger, Willis, Root, Bradbury, and Jackson, of New York; Messrs. Webb and Kreissman, of Boston, and other distinguished teachers and professors; and the following extract from a letter, recently received, will show in what estimation the translation is held by Dr. MARX, the distinguished author of the original.

BERLIN, June 23d, 1852.

GENTLEMEN,—Your polite communication and the copy of a translation of my work on Musical Composition, have been duly received, for which accept my warmest thanks. * * * *
I find that your translator (as far as I am able to judge from a somewhat imperfect acquaintance with the English language) has done his work very practically and successfully; and I beg you to express to him, as also to the eminent men who have honored my work with their approval, my sincerest thanks; and also yourselves to accept the same for the very elegant style of the edition. * * * *

The present volume comprises all that portion of the original work which it was supposed would be at all adapted to the wants of this country, and embraces two of the German books, viz.: The Elements of Musical Composition, and the Harmonization of a Melody, including Chorals and Popular Songs.
The rapid sale of two editions has proved its adaptation to the wants of our musical teachers and students. It forms an elegant octavo volume, in cloth.

Recollections of Beethoven.

BY CARL CZERNY.

In Cocks's Musical Miscellany, a very interesting weekly published in London, which we are glad to place on our list of exchanges, we find the following anecdotes of BEETHOVEN, contributed to that Journal by the veteran CZERNY, which will be interesting to all our readers.

[The publication of the anecdotes of Beethoven, in our last number, has led to the re-discovery of a few reminiscences of the great composer, which were furnished by Herr Czerny some considerable time ago. The translation was roughly and hastily made, and as we are, at the moment, unable to compare it with the original, there may be some verbal errors, which will perhaps not detract materially from its value; and, at any rate, must not be charged upon the talented narrator.]

The character of Beethoven, as we formerly said, has been unfairly treated by the anecdote-mongers. This was foreseen by Beethoven himself. "They will be relating all sort of things of me—but let them say what they like, only let them adhere exactly to truth—sparing neither me nor any one else." His biographers assure us that he was most sensitively alive to moral propriety; as he was to the painful impressions which make him an object of profound and tender sympathy. His life was, as he mournfully wrote to M. de Seyfried, "miserable, oh! very miserable; with an organization so nervous, that a very trifle causes me to pass from the happiest frame of mind, to a condition of great suffering."

HIS STYLE OF PLAYING.

In the year 1792, Beethoven, then a young man in his twenty-second year, came to Vienna, and very much distinguished himself by his excellent performance, as well as by his Twenty-four Variations on Righini's Vieni Amore, which he had at that period completed. Some years before this, he had chanced to play before Mozart, who at once foresaw that he would become a great genius. At this time Mozart and Clementi were the most renowned pianists. Beethoven, who had heard Mozart play, afterwards said that his performance was neat and clear, but rather empty, tame and old-fashioned.

The legato and cantabile upon the piano forte was at that time unknown; and Beethoven was the first to discover quite new and grand effects upon that instrument—a much more difficult style of execution, as well as the harmoniously sustained and cantabile style.

He had, as he often said, practised day and night during his youth; so much so as to impair his health; and the bodily pains which affected him with a constant tendency to hypochondriac malady, no doubt arose from this cause.

HIS IMPROVISATIONS.

As to his bravura style, and the genial freedom of his execution, no one then equalled him; and even to this day none but Franz Liszt can be set in comparison with him. His improvisation was most brilliant and striking: in whatever company he might chance to be, he knew how to produce such an effect upon every hearer, that frequently not an eye remained dry, while many would break into loud sobs; for there was something wonderful in his expression, in addition to the beauty and originality of his ideas, and his spirited style of rendering them. After ending an improvisation of this kind, he would burst into loud laughter, and banter his hearers on the emotion he had caused in them. "You are fools," he would say. Sometimes, however, he would feel himself insulted by these indications of sympathy. "Who can live amongst such spoiled children," he would cry; and only on that account (as he told me) he declined to accept an invitation which the King of Prussia gave him after one of the extemporary performances above described.

A THEME.

Sometimes he chose the most unimportant and trite pieces for extemporizing. In the year 1808 or 1809, old Pleyel came to Vienna, bringing his last Violin Quartet with him, which he played before the Prince Lobkowitz. Beethoven was also there, and was at length asked to play something. As usual, he allowed himself to be pressed for a long while, and, in the end, dragged to the piano by the ladies. He flies in a passion, seizes one of the parts of Pleyel's Quartet—it happened to be the second violin part—throws it open at random on the desk, and begins to extemporize. Never had he been heard to produce anything so spiritual, so enchanting, so artistic; but in the midst of his fantasia might be distinctly heard an unimportant passage of the violin part as it chanced to lie there. He had constructed all his beautiful improvisation on this passage.

ANOTHER THEME, — Op. 77.

A foreign pianist once, in a mixed company, ended with begging his auditors to give him a theme to extemporize upon. Beethoven, who was always merry and mischievous in company, went to the piano and ran up the scale through the several octaves, and sat down again, laughing. The stranger asked again for a theme.

"I have given you the theme already," said Beethoven.

"What, is that to be the theme!"

"Certainly—and a very good one, too."

The puzzled artist was obliged to improvise as well as he could. Shortly afterwards, the Fantasia, Op. 77, of Beethoven appeared, which is founded on such a scale, and is merely the fruit of Beethoven's humorous fancies.

THE BIRD'S SONG AND THE SYMPHONY IN C MINOR.

The most trifling things served to supply Beethoven with musical ideas, and the groundwork of compositions. For instance, the song of a bird, which he chanced to hear in a wood, gave the theme for his great Symphony in C minor (No. 5): and the scherzo of the Ninth Symphony (D minor) occurred to him in a garden while the birds were singing.

THE HISTORICAL CHARACTER OF HIS WORKS.

In the year 1801, when Paer's Opera, Sargino, was given in Vienna, and the funeral march was very much liked, Beethoven was angry, and wrote the March in A minor (on the death of a Hero), for the Sonata Op. 26. The historical events of that period exerted a great influence upon him, and determined the character of many of his works. His Third Symphony (Eroica) originated in a mistake, inasmuch as the first news that arrived at Vienna of the battle of Aboukir, was to the effect that Nelson was killed. The character of the Symphony, as well as the theme of the first movement, was well adapted to the occasion, though not well suited to a land fight. The Symphony, however, appeared only after some years; for Beethoven worked a very long time at his compositions.

HIS FACILITY IN READING.

It was surprising how rapidly he glanced through compositions (even in manuscripts and large score), and how well he played them. In this respect no one could equal him. His rendering was always determined, but sharp and hard. So also of the compositions of the great masters; he played Handel's Oratorios and Gluck's works wonderfully, and so as to elicit much applause; as likewise Sebastian Bach's Fugues.

SELF-APPRECIATION.

He once told me that he was careless, and not well treated when a boy, and that his musical education was very bad. "But," he continued, "I had talent for music." It was touching to hear him utter these words seriously, as if no one knew it before. On another occasion, the conversation turning upon the praise which his name had won in the world, "Oh! nonsense," he said, "I never thought of writing for fame or honor. What is in my heart must come out, and that is why I write." Except when in the dark humor which fell over him at times, and which arose from physical suffering, he was always merry, mischievous, witty, full of raillery, and did not care for anybody.

HIS POSITION AND CHARACTER.

Beethoven, when a young man, found good friends at Court. He might have lived, if he had pleased, in the highest style. His character was very much like that of Jean Jacques Rousseau, but still his temper was noble, magnanimous, and refined.

WEBER'S DER FREYSCHUTZ.

BY HECTOR BERLIOZ.

(Concluded.)

Certain theatres in Germany, to carry truth in the horrible to the utmost limit, accompany, it is said, the scene of the casting of the balls with the most discordant noises, cries of animals, howlings of dogs, shrieks, roars, hissings, creakings of trees, &c., &c. But how can one hear the music in the midst of this hideous tumult? And, in case that we can hear it, why place the reality side by side with the imitation? If I admire the hoarse baying of the horns in the orchestra, the voices of your theatre bounds can only inspire me with disgust. The natural cascade, on the contrary, is one of those scenic effects which are not incompatible with the interest of the score; so far from that, it adds to it. That even and continuous sound of water induces reverie; it is particularly impressive during those long organ-points which the composer has so skilfully introduced, and blends in the best possible manner with the sounds of the distant bell, which slowly strikes the fatal hour.

I need not tell the Germans that, in this scene, I have abstained, in writing the recitatives, from making Zamiel sing. That would have been too formal; Weber has made Caspar sing, and Zamiel speak the few words of his response. Once only is the devil's speech made rhythmical, each of his syllables being supported by a note of the drums. The rule forbidding spoken dialogue in the opera is not so rigorous, that one may not introduce into a musical scene a few words pronounced in this manner; one is obliged to use this latitude to preserve this idea of the composer.

The entire score of Der Freyschütz, as I have said before, but it is not useless to repeat it, is executed integrally and in the exact order in which it was written. The libretto has been translated [the French version] in a manner always simple, often poetical, and not arranged. It is a labor which does honor to the talent and the taste of Emilien Pacini.

From the fidelity, always and everywhere too rare, with which the Grand Opera has placed this masterpiece upon the stage, it results that the finale of the third act is almost a novelty for the Parisians. Some had heard it fourteen years ago at the summer representations of the German troupe; the majority were unacquainted with it. This finale is a magnificent conception. All that Max sings at the feet of the Prince bears the impress of repentance and of shame; the first chorus for in C minor, after the fall of Agatha and Caspar, has a fine tragic coloring and announces in the best possible manner, the catastrophe that is about to be accomplished. Then Agatha's return to life, her tender exclamation, "O Max!" the vivats of the people, the menaces of Ottokar, the religious intervention of the hermit, the unction of his conciliating words, the prayers of all these peasants and hunters to obtain pardon for Max, a noble heart for a moment led astray; that sextuor in which you see hope and happiness revive, that benediction of the old monk who curbs all these excited waves and from the midst of the whole prostrate crowd, causes a hymn to leap up that is immense in its laconic brevity; and finally that final chorus where for the third time re-appears the theme of the allegro in the air of Agatha, already heard in the overture; all this is beautiful and as worthy, neither more nor less, of admiration as that which precedes. There is not a note that is not in its place, or that can be suppressed without destroying the harmony of the ensemble. Superficial minds perhaps will not be of this opinion, but for every attentive listener the thing is certain, and the more one hears this finale the more will he be convinced of it.

The Genesis of Musical Sounds.

The sounds employed in Music are distinguished from mere random noise, not only by the uniformity of their vibrations, but by the relationship, more or less intimate, which they sustain with respect to each other. Every composition has its key. Indeed the whole system of music has a relation to some grand central point, about which all its elements revolve, towards which they constantly gravitate, and from which, as a vivifying sun, they all derive vitality and force. In truth the whole tribe are from one common stock, and are directly descended from one common progenitor, as were the Israelites from Jacob.

To set forth a genealogical tree of this family, let us take great C, which is written on the second leger line below, in the Bass. Suppose a string 120 inches in length of such thickness and tension as to give this C. Divide the string successively by 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, and the results will be as exhibited below, the whole string being represented by 1.

Proportion of String.	Length of String.	Number of Vibrations.	Name & description of Sounds.
1	120 in.	64	C. Root.
$\frac{1}{2}$	60 in.	128	C. Octave.
$\frac{1}{3}$	40 in.	192	G. 12th.
$\frac{1}{4}$	30 in.	256	C. 15th.
$\frac{1}{5}$	24 in.	320	E. 17th.
$\frac{1}{6}$	20 in.	384	G. 19th.
$\frac{1}{8}$	15 in.	512	C. 22nd.

These sounds may all be produced upon any instrument of the horn species, as the Trombone, the French Horn, &c., with no change except in the manner of blowing.

A string of the Violoncello or Violin will give the same series by touching lightly with the finger of the left hand the several points indicated by the division of the length as stated above.

The Æolian harp of one string, gives of itself all these tones. When the force of the current of air is barely sufficient to produce a tone, the string vibrates throughout its length, with one motion. A gradual increase of the wind causes at first an augmentation of the power of tone, but beyond a certain intensity of the current, the string divides itself successively by the natural series of numbers to an indefinite extent, and gives forth a numerous progeny of harmonics. The higher and more remote of these I shall not at present notice further than to state that some of them are merely octaves to the Root and its derivatives, some have no name, some have no place theoretical or practical in present systems, and some are more directly derived from other Roots.

The Root C alone, does not furnish us with a continuous system of sounds proceeding wholly by conjunct degrees, but on the contrary with a diastematic series, proceeding more or less by skips. Of course what are called scales cannot be constructed from these materials alone. We have abundant resources, however, in the offspring of other roots most simply related to C. These roots are first, G, which, after the octave, is in the simplest ratio to C, viz: 2:3; Secondly, F, which is in the ratio of 3:4. Among the harmonics of G are B and D. Among those of F we find A.

Scales, so called, are merely an arrangement into a progressive series of some or all of the sounds employed in music. They differ in the number of sounds composing them and in the intervals or steps by which they proceed. A scale may have two sounds, or three, or any number we please. The scale of Scottish music has but five sounds. That which is called eminently the scale, has seven sounds, viz: c, d, e, f, g, a, b. These are harmonics of the three Roots C G F as seen below:

do.	c.	fifteenth of great C. (2nd leger line below—Bass.)
re.	d.	twelfth of G. (fifth above great C.)
mi.	e.	seventeenth of C.
fa.	f.	fifteenth of F. (fourth above great C.)
sol.	g.	fifteenth of G.
la.	a.	seventeenth of F.
si.	b.	seventeenth of G.
do.	c.	twenty-second of C.

Such is the genesis of the sounds constituting the major diatonic scale, and such is the relation of that series to its Roots.

In my next I shall attempt to trace the lineage of the sounds constituting the minor mode.

Church Music.

MR. EDITOR: I have been hoping, ever since the establishment of your Journal, that the subject of Church Music would come up for discussion. What sort of music, what school, what style is worthy of adoption and imitation in our churches. I confess my own ideas on this point are not positive, and I wish for light from you and others. Most persons like to hear in church the music to which they have been accustomed, and this is all they care about it. Others, among whom I must reckon myself, have a strong dislike to music of a secular character, feeling that the music of the Church should be sui generis, having only religious associations; but exactly what it should be, is not so easy to determine. Psalmody is a passion with us New Englanders. In no way is our puritan origin more evident than in this disposition to sing psalm tunes. The quantity of material which is manufactured to meet this taste is astonishingly great, and the quality generally poor. Indeed, I cannot help thinking that if our choirs would take the old "Handel and Haydn Collection," published many years ago, and discard all the rest, they would find there all that is really needed for this part of the musical service.

There is, however, of late years, a feeling that psalm tune singing is not sufficient, and chanting has been very generally adopted. This is truly devotional and impressive when the words are taken from the Bible, or have peculiarly sacred associations, as in passages from the prayer-book. But our choirs are not content with chanting, but perform anthems and set pieces. These are found attached to the psalm tune books, some of them original, others drawn from various sources, sacred and profane. There seems to be an uncertainty in the minds of many choir leaders as to what is proper for performance in this connection, which needs to be corrected. Thus I have heard chorusses from Italian operas, set with sacred words, and sung as anthems in our churches, melodies from the same source played as voluntaries on the organ, and other adaptations equally impious.

All this shows, I think, among other things, the want of a proper school of church music. The English Church has had in her service in past times musicians of the highest eminence, but their music seems not fitted to the present day. The services and anthems of Purcell, Gibbons, Boyce, &c. require for their proper effect means which we have not at command. A double choir of well trained boys for the treble parts is indispensable, and these, owing to a variety of causes, cannot be had. The Catholic church has much music of a lighter character, but still devotional, which seems better fitted for our uses. Attempts have been made, with partial success, to furnish English words to portions of the masses of Haydn and Mozart. There is much among the modern Catholic music, published by Novello, which might also be useful. If some good musician would set himself to arranging this music with appropriate English words, and publish it by itself, without encumbering the volume with vocal exercises or hymn tunes, I think it would be profitable and useful. It seems to me there is a want of genius to create a new and original school of devotional music, suited to the present times. Some Purcell or Handel must appear before the want is supplied.

I hope, Mr. Editor, you will let us hear from you on this subject. x.

A UNIVERSAL LANGUAGE.—Music has hitherto been generally regarded rather in the light of a luxury than as one of the prime necessities of life; but a Mons. F. Sudre proposes to turn it to practical account by making it no less than a perfect means of international communication—the dragoman, in short, of all the nations of the earth, just as Latin was of the mediæval savans. Seeing what takes place in every frontier country, M. Sudre conceives that there would be no difficulty in every person learning two languages—"la maternelle," or that of his mother-country, and "la générale," or the musical language which he has invented. Of course if this were done, the object he has in view would at once be accomplished. His new language professes to be characterized by great simplicity. It is founded upon the seven notes of the scale, and no word contains more than four sounds. It may be played on any instrument or sung; or the notes may be simply named or indicated, à la Hullah; or the fingers; so that the system would be available for the use of the deaf, the dumb, and the blind. M. Sudre likewise proposes to substitute for the cumbrous codes of signals in use in the army and navy, a code of his own, founded upon the three sounds, G, C, G, executed on a bugle or drum, or represented by cannon of different calibre, or indicated on a telegraph. Yesterday he performed at the Hanover-square rooms a number of experiments before a large and respectable audience. Various phrases were propounded to him by ladies and gentlemen present. He gave expression to them in the different modes enumerated, and his pupil, Mlle. Josephine Hugot, instantly supplied the correct interpretation. The experiments in telegraphing, or signalling, were particularly striking, and whatever may be thought of the larger scheme of the ingenious inventor, this at least promises to be of great utility. M. Sudre and his scholar were exceedingly well received.

AUTUMN THOUGHTS.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

Gone hath the Spring, with all its flowers,
And gone the Summer's pomp and show,
And Autumn, in his leafless bowers,
Is waiting for the Winter's snow.

I said to Earth, so cold and gray,
"An emblem of myself thou art:"
"Not so," the Earth did seem to say,
"For Spring shall warm my frozen heart."

I soothe my wintry sleep with dreams
Of warmer sun and softer rain,
And wait to hear the sound of streams
And songs of merry birds again.

But thou from whom the Spring hath gone,
For whom the flowers no longer blow,
Who standest blighted and forlorn,
Like Autumn waiting for the snow:

No hope is thine of sunnier hours,
Thy Winter shall no more depart;
No Spring revive thy wasted flowers,
Nor Summer warm thy frozen heart.

The First Oratorio.

The first oratorio was entitled "Rappresentazione di Anima, e di Corpo." It was composed by Emilio del Cavaliere, and was performed and printed at Rome in 1600. It was represented in action on a stage, in the church of La Vallicella, with scenes, decorations, and chorus, à l'antique, and analogous dances, as appears both from the editor's dedication to Cardinal Aldobrandini, and from the composer's instruction for the performance.

Emilio del Cavaliere, as well as the rest of the early composers of dramatic music, imagined that he had recovered, in his recitative, that style of music which the ancient Greeks and Romans used in their theatres. And a singer of such music is required by Cavaliere to have a fine voice, perfectly in tune, and free from all defects in his delivery; together with a pathetic expression, the power of swelling, and diminishing the tones, and an equal respect for the composer and poet, in singing plain, and being particularly attentive to the articulation and expression of the words.

It is recommended to place the instruments of accompaniment behind the scenes, which, in the first oratorio, were the following.

Una lira doppia, . . . A double lyre, perhaps a viol da gamba.
Un clavicembalo, . . . A harpsichord.
Un chitarone, . . . A large, or double guitar.
Dui flauti, o vero dui,
Tibri all' antica, . . . } Two common flutes.

No violin is mentioned here; but what excites the most surprise at present, in these instructions for the performance of an oratorio on a stage in a church, are the directions for the dances.

There are, however, examples of religious dances in the sacred writings, as well as in the history of almost every ancient people, in which their religious ceremonies are mentioned. Most of these dances are performed to the music of choruses, which are singing at the same time, in the manner of those in the old French operas.

On many occasions, it is recommended for the actors to have some instruments in their hands, as the playing, or appearing to play upon them, would assist illusion better than a visible orchestra.

Besides these general rules, for such as might wish to write, or bring on the stage other poems of the same kind, Cavaliere gives the following instructions for the representation of this particular species of musical drama.

1. The words should be printed with the verses correctly arranged, the scenes numbered, and the characters of the interlocutors specified.

2. Instead of the overture, or symphony, to modern musical dramas, a madrigal is recommended as a full piece, with all the voice parts doubled, and a great number of instruments.

3. When the curtain rises, two youths, who recite the prologue, appear on the stage, and when they have finished, Time, one of the characters in this morality, comes on, and has the note, on which he is to begin, given him by the instrumental performers behind the scenes.

4. The chorus are to have a place allotted them on the stage, part sitting, and part standing, in sight of the principal characters. And when they sing, they are to rise, and be in motion with appropriate gestures.

5. Pleasure, another imaginary character, with two companions, are to have instruments in their hands, on which they are to play, while they sing, and perform the ritornels.

6. Il Corpo, the body, when these words are uttered, "Si che hormai, alma mea," &c., may throw away some of his ornaments; as his gold collar, feather from his hat, &c.

7. The World and Human Life, in particular, are to be very gaily dressed; and when they are divested of their trappings, to appear very poor and wretched, and at length dead carcasses.

8. The symphonies and ritornels may be played by a great number of instruments; and if "a violin" should play the principal part, it would have a very good effect."

9. The performance may be finished with or without a dance. If without, the last chorons is to be doubled in all its parts, vocal and instrumental: but if a dance is preferred, a verse beginning thus, "Chiostri altissimi, e stellati," is to be sung, accompanied sedately and reverentially by the dance. These shall succeed other grave steps and figures of the solemn kind. During the ritornels, the four principal dancers are to perform a ballet, saltato con capriole, "enlivened with capers, or entrechats," without singing. And thus, after each stanza, always varying the steps of the dance; and the four principal dancers may sometimes use the galiard, sometimes the canary, and sometimes the courant step, which will do very well in the ritornels.

10. The stanzas of the ballet, are to be sung and played by all the performers within and without.

These curious and minute instructions, will convey to the reader an idea of the manner in which the oratorio was performed in its infant state.

The word aria, air, never occurs in this oratorio; but though there are fewer recitatives, and more choruses in it, than in the first operas, the choruses are all in plain counterpoint, without a single attempt at fugue or imitation; and consequently the words are more intelligible, and free from confusion, than in an air for a single voice loaded with accompaniments.

No musical drama, under the title of oratorio, can be found in print, says the diligent Quadrio, before the time of Francesco Balducci, who died in 1642: among whose poems are found two, the one called La Fede, on the subject of Abraham's sacrifice, and divided into two parts; the other entitled Il Trionfo, or the Coronation of the Blessed Virgin, in one act only. These, as resembling the dramas performed at the church of the Fathers of the Oratory, he calls ORATORIOS; an appellation which was soon adopted by many others. And in 1662, several religious dramas were performed in Italian, in the imperial chapel at Vienna, called Oratorios.—Burgh's Anecdotes.

The Handel Society.

The publications of this society are now solely in the hands of the enterprising firm of Cramer, Beale & Co., who have taken upon themselves the pecuniary responsibility of publishing the volumes of the society as they issue from the hands of the respective editors. This fact was pretty generally disseminated when the Israel in Egypt, supervised by Mendelssohn, appeared. Certain difficulties, it seemed, had crept into the management of the society itself, principally from the non-payment of the annual subscriptions, upon which, as in all co-operative associations of the same kind, obviously depended the power of going on with the undertaking, and fulfilling the conditions of the initiatory prospectus. It is probable that the issues by Messrs. Cramer & Co. may appear at longer intervals than the original scheme contemplated; but it is much to be desired that sufficient success will await the enterprise to enable them to complete the Handelian library, and produce such an edition of the great master's works as shall be without doubt or blemish, and eventually extinguish all the others in ordinary use, in which inaccuracy, interpolation, and abridgment, are more or less the notorious attributes. The edition by Clarke has been the best known of the collected editions, but this wants the proper clefs in the vocal score, besides which it is far from being carefully edited; the same kinds of disfigurements as regards occasional error being also the characteristic of Dr. Arnold's edition. But numberless are the reprints of the most popular of Handel's works, emerging, for the most part, from the press without any particular care as to authenticity, and perpetuating those mistakes which either negligence or inadvertence left uncorrected in the more pretentious editions to which we have alluded. The object of the Handel Society was two-fold. Not only did it propose to reprint the whole of Handel's oratorios and lesser works from the original scores, under the special and individual superintendence of the most eminent musicians of the day, but it was also part of the scheme to make such parenthetical additions, such elucidations of the figured basses, &c., as should place the work at once within the reach of the amateur. The original text was to be exhibited in its truest purity, settled by the severest collation with the original manuscripts. The accompaniments for the piano forte or organ, where added to meet a popular exigency, were to be so incorporated into the page as to be in no way confounded with the score of the composer. How zealously, delicately, and profoundly these principles have been carried out are visible in the Coronation Anthems, the L'Allegro ed il Penseroso, the Esther, the Acis and Galatea, and the Israel in Egypt, which have been subjected to the ripe and reverential editorship of Dr. Crotch, Mr. Moscheles, Mr. Lucas, Mr. Sterndale Bennett, and Dr. Mendelssohn. The editions of the imperishable compositions named above, which have thus been given to the world, must evidently supersede all others, not only in the essential qualities of fidelity and exemption from vulgar and unworthy tamperings, but in typographical clearness and beauty. The lofty and generous enthusiasm which has tempted Messrs. Cramer & Co. to go on with a publication evidently involving risk of no ordinary kind, but in which the highest interests of music are at stake, merits, therefore, encouragement at once solid and persevering, and we shall be glad to observe that the profession, no less than the public at large, evince a disposition to give the necessary help to an undertaking of such great and onerous magnitude.

The new volume consists of the Chamber Duets and Trios, written soon after Handel's return to Hanover, "for the practice of the Queen, the electoral princess." Mr. Henry Smart, to whom the task of editorship has been confided, intimates that, upon examining the original MSS. preserved in Buckingham Palace, he found others of the same class, including four duets, "which furnished the immortal composer as drafts for four of the chorusses of the Messiah"—namely, "His yoke is easy," "And he shall purify," "For unto us," and "All we like sheep." These, with others, have never been printed in their original form, and it is likely, therefore, that a second volume of Chamber Duets may by-and-by be prepared. To the volume now issued, Mr. Smart, for the reasons cited above, has affixed an independent piano forte accompaniment. "It seemed to him," it is observed in the preface, "that something more was intended by the composer than either a compression of the vocal score, or the bare insertion of such chords as the unfigured bass seemed to permit. He has, therefore, placed himself in the situation of an accompanist at the period when these compositions were produced, and in this character has endeavored to embody some of those features of contrapuntal garniture in which Handel is recorded to have extemporaneously indulged when accompanying his own music. The original bass is given under the voice parts, so that those who prefer the old mode of accompaniment are at liberty to reject that proposed by the editor." This modest announcement sufficiently declares the spirit of editorial exactness which has animated Mr. Henry Smart, and we have only to add that the labors for which he is avowedly responsible afford ample evidence of his judgment, knowledge, and genuine Handelian taste.—London Herald.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary.

NEW YORK, July 20. To-day I have been looking from my window at the immense procession formed to do honor to the remains of Henry Clay. Band after band of music has passed, and their strains came floating up, above all the noise and confusion of the crowds, as pure and free from all mingling with discordant tones, as are the pure thoughts and holy aspirations of a good heart amid the turmoil, distractions and confusion of business and fashionable folly. It is curious to note how little I can hear of music in the street below, when I lean out of the window and place myself within the upward current of the noise from the pavements, and how, when I retire from the reach of this, the tones of music seek me out and follow me to the place of quiet. I anticipated great pleasure from the music to-day, but of all the bands which have followed the remains of the great orator, one only,—yes, only one,—has played music which, in my folly, I could consider appropriate. After listening to the inappropriate fifing and trumpeting of band after band, until disgust destroyed the wish to listen longer, I caught the sad and solemn measures of Handel's march in Saul. Oh, how inexpressibly beautiful, may sublime, is that Dead March. Yet how simple! Handel himself must have felt its excellence, for though he wrote another for Samson, he has also introduced this into that sublime Oratorio. But before the strains of the Dead March had fairly died away in the distance, the clang and slash of some namby-pamby air from another band came within hearing, and I almost "Cursed the gods who had not made me deaf."

Now, why is this? Why at funerals can we not have funeral music? Why is it, that on such an occasion as this, when even those who have persecuted and slandered and reviled the great man in his life, now feel the eye moist as his mortal remains are passing by on their way to their last earthly resting-place, that the over-wrought feelings should listen in vain for a tone of sadness and grief from all this array of instruments? Why not sometimes, at least, a minor chord? But no, we must listen to music little more solemn than that of ordinary parades—or not listen at all. "They order these things better"—abroad.

The heart on such an occasion longs,—if the bands are incapable of arrangements of Beethoven's wonderful "Marcia Funebre," that in the Heroic Symphony, or that in the Sonata, opus 26,—at least for some of the noble choral strains with which the music of all civilized nations is enriched. Germans now form the bulk of our bands, at least in the large cities. Have they forgotten the noble, dirge-like melodies and harmonies with which at home they accompany the good and the great to the tomb? They may be assured that even in so barbarous a land as ours, there are some who do not like to see funeral solemnities conducted to music only fit for the country muster-field, or city parade-ground.

Aug. 6. I came across to-day, in some periodical, an article purporting to be an extract from a collection of sketches of the great musicians. Judging from this specimen, I must find out what the work is and procure it; for the library of no lover of music should be without such a specimen of—the trash which people write and read in this country for musical literature. This particular "brick" is a description of Beethoven's death. The excellence of the historical novel or tale lies mostly in its correctness as a historical picture; it allows of no departure from any known facts, though these may be put in such a light as suits the powers and intentions of the author. Now for an examination in this light of this description of Beethoven's last hours. No writer upon this great master would venture to write without Moscheles' translation of Schindler before him, at least until a better work be published, of which, alas! I see no prospect at present; for the only person who has made the necessary researches and collections is too busy, soul and body, in other pursuits, to use the materials he has collected. Let me compare this famous sketch with Schindler.

"Once more we find Beethoven in the extreme decline of life. In one of the most obscure and narrow streets of Vienna, on the third floor of a gloomy-looking house, was now the abode of the gifted artist."

"The Funeral will take place from the dwelling of the deceased, the Schwarzspanier house, No. 200, on the Glacis opposite the Scottish Gate."—From the Card of Invitation to Beethoven's Funeral.

"One of the most obscure and narrow streets of Vienna!" The Schwarzspanier house is a huge building in the suburb of Vienna, having, from Beethoven's windows, a splendid prospect of the city across a parade ground nearly half a mile in width!

"They wrong me who call me stern or misanthropic," said he to his brother, who came in March, 1827, to pay him a visit. "God knoweth how I love my fellow-men! Has not my life been theirs? Have I not struggled with temptation," &c., &c.

Which brother? Carl, of course, for with Johann he was hardly on speaking terms, and besides, this is the beginning of a long conversation with Carl. Unfortunately for the sketch, Carl died in November, 1815, twelve years before. The pathetic speech, too, put into the composer's mouth, is drawn from his will written in 1802!

"The servant of the house entered, and gave Beethoven a large sealed package, directed to himself. He opened it; it contained a magnificent collection of the works of Handel, with a few lines stating that it was a dying bequest to the composer, from the Count di N—."

Compare this with the following note, in Moscheles' work, to a letter written by Beethoven, February 22, 1827.

"Mr. Stumpff, [Count di N—,?] the proprietor of a harp manufactory in London, presented to Beethoven, the year before, the complete works of Handel, in upwards of forty folio volumes, [a large sealed package!] of the rare and costly London Edition."

"Disturbed by his nervous restlessness, the aged composer went to the window, and opened it with trembling hands."

Aged composer;—Beethoven was 56 on the 27th December, 1826, and died on the 27th March following.

"The malady increased. The sufferer's eyes were glazed; he grasped his brother's hand with a tremulous pressure."

"'Carl! Carl! I pardon you the evil you did me in childhood; I have pardoned all. Pray for me, brother!' cried the failing voice of the artist."

"His brother supported him to the sofa, and called for assistance. In an hour the room was filled with the neighbors and friends of the dying man. He seemed gradually sinking into insensibility."

"Suddenly he revived; a bright smile illumined his whole face; his sunken eyes sparkled. 'I shall hear in heaven!' he murmured softly, and then sang in a low but distinct voice the lines from a hymn of his own:—

"'Brüder!—über'm Sternenzelt,
Muss ein lieber VATER wohnen.'

"In the last faint tone of the music his gentle spirit passed away."

"Thus died Beethoven, a true artist, a good and generous man."

Now for Schindler's account. Carl, as said above, died a dozen years before. Schindler says, vol. ii. p. 76: "Symptoms of a speedy termination to Beethoven's sufferings appeared early on the 24th of March, after the holy sacrament for the dying had been administered at his own desire, and received by him with true devotion. The first symptoms of approaching dissolution manifested themselves about one o'clock on the same day. A most terrible struggle between life and death now began, and continued without intermission till the 26th, when a quarter before six in the evening the great composer breathed his last, during a tremendous hailstorm, aged fifty-six years, three months and nine days. Schindler goes on to say that neither he nor Von Brenning were present to close the dying man's eyes; Herr Anselm Hüttenbrenner, from Gratz in Styria, did this sad office. Where were the neighbors and friends?"

Mr. Rau writes Moscheles, (see as above, page 322.)

"Beethoven is no more; he departed this life in a most painful struggle, and with dreadful sufferings, on the 26th inst., between five and six o'clock, P. M., after having been insensible for the last twenty-four hours."

The extraordinary success of this sketch, if it be a correct sample of the whole bale of goods, of the descriptions of Mozart, and Handel, and Haydn, is such that I hope hereafter to add, not only this to my collection, but some half dozen volumes by the same hand, in which all our great statesmen, Washington, John Adams, Zachary Taylor, Calhoun, Clay, &c., may be "done up" in a similar style. No, that would be too bad—worse than Headley!

Aug. 20. Learned to-day that Professor J. B. Woodbury, the author of the Oratorio of Absalom, has been back from Europe for some time. I learned some time since, when I was in Detroit, that this Oratorio pleases the musical people there very much, particularly the quartette and chorus, "Hear those soothing sounds ascending," and the sextette, "Though the sinner bloom at morning."

New Publications.

Schumann's Album for the Piano Forte. 43 Clavierstücke für die Jugend, von ROBERT SCHUMANN. In four numbers, each 75 cts. net. Boston: G. P. Reed & Co.

We have already spoken at length of this delightful addition to the library of the pianist, and have now only to add that Reed's edition is a fac-simile of the German copy, with a well engraved title, far superior to the writing-master scrawls and shabby lithographs which usually embellish our American musical publications. Why should not real artists oftener lend the aid of the sister art to decorate our Music? Every pianist will be glad to place this Album among his choicest treasures.

The Singing School Companion, a Collection of Sacred and Secular Music, &c. By JOSEPH and HORACE BIRD. Boston: Wilkins, Rice & Kendall.

We confess that we look with some considerable apprehension on every addition to this class of musical literature. Every year and every Convention held adds to this shelf of our library; each new book, as far as we can see, merely ringing the changes of the old song, and reminding us not a little of the arithmetical puzzles which distract the brains of little children, the problem running much after this fashion: Given—A certain number of tunes, to arrange them so as to make a new singing book at such a price. This problem is every year solved to the satisfaction of the authors, but to our mind, and we think in public opinion, one book is very like another. The book whose title is given above has this new feature, we believe, that one half of it is devoted to songs, glees and other secular music, and the second part to sacred music—psalm tunes, anthems, choruses, &c. The object of the authors is to furnish such a book as shall be adapted to the use of common singing schools, and to meet "the desire of a large and respectable body of singers, who regard the use of sacred words for the mere purpose of learning to sing as irreverent." The object is an excellent one and commends itself at once to all, and we think the authors have given an excellent selection of music in both departments and well adapted for the purpose in view, and also a pleasant book for the family circle, as well as for the use of choirs. The manner of dividing the words of the chants we think decidedly embarrassing and inconvenient, the dashes being placed parallel with the lines, instead of transversely, as is usual; thus rendering it difficult to catch readily the proper divisions. We notice also some departures from the familiar arrangements of well known tunes which we think should be always avoided.

Church Music.

The communication of our correspondent in another column, on the subject of Church Music, opens a field of inquiry which certainly, in church-going New England, is of great interest to all. For here everybody goes to church, as a matter of course, everybody criticises both the preaching and the music, everybody goes with eyes and ears open, eager to find some new thing. In every form of worship Music has always formed an important part of the service. Sanctioned and enjoined by Scripture, familiar by long use, and noble and elevating in itself, the praise of God in song, for it is nothing else, is surely not the least solemn or impressive part of the service of our churches. We say is, but alas, it too often is as far from solemn, as far from impressive, as far from what it should be, as can well be imagined. Ignorant choristers, uneducated organists, untrained choirs, and more than all and worse than all, the abominations in the shape of musical compositions—chants, anthems, and psalm tunes, which make up the trashy flood of new singing books, published every day for the benefit of the authors, rather than for the glory of God or the improvement of musical science, are among the difficulties which lie in the way of having good church music. To these is to be added the ignorance of our congregations as to what church music should be, and a general ignorance of the whole subject of music. We are but beginning to learn what music is here, and, till within some few years, the only notion that our people have had of this noble Art is that it is the science of psalm singing, as taught in country singing schools. The abominations in the shape of tunes have, by long use, become familiar, and thought to be the proper form of praising God in song. To this list new abominations are daily added, partly original compositions, so called, defying all known laws of composition, partly arrangements from secular music, supposed to be inaccessible and unknown, and so, a little altered in form, introduced, like wolves in sheep's clothing, into the service of the sanctuary. We never hear such tunes in our churches without a shudder. We cannot, for example, hear Batti, batti, sung in church, without its calling to mind the simple peasant girl of the opera and her rustic lover. It is impossible that such associations should not be awakened, with thoughts as unfit to fill the mind of the devout worshipper as angels of light are to keep fellowship with the devils of the pit. This is but a single example. The Psalm books in common use are crowded with tunes drawn from similar sources equally objectionable. To persons ignorant whence these come, such music may appear devotional and appropriate; but we imagine that they would be scarcely less shocked at hearing Zerlina (to take the same example) sing on the stage, the melody familiar perhaps to their ears in the service of their church, when sung to the words "Gently Lord, Oh, gently lead us," than others are on hearing the same air in the church.

We find in the New York Musical World and Times a letter from Prof. Erickson to a friend in Norway, giving the impressions of an intelligent foreigner and musician, of our American church music. We quote some passages from this letter, which is full of intelligent criticism and useful suggestions.

"Concerning the music of our public worship, I could say much; but, at present, can only give you a few particulars, by way of showing how greatly this Ars sacra is misunderstood in New York. Only think, that the churches and congregations, instead of joining in the singing of the psalms and hymns, keep a choir, and sometimes only a 'Quartet,' who perform this important part of the worship almost entirely alone! What are psalms and hymns, but prayers and praises? And, what is the intention of their being sung in the house of God, other than that the whole congregation should unite, as with one soul in the music, and, on the wings of melody, rise to the throne of the Most High?"

"Here, the organist has a choir around him, chiefly employed as a substitute for congregational singing. In some churches there is also a so-called leader; who, in many cases, knows so little about music, that he is unable to distinguish a chromatic interval from a diatonic, or make a proper distinction between the major and minor scales; nevertheless, he takes upon himself the responsibility of judging upon all musical matters in the church; not knowing that properly to understand the science of music requires the study and practice of a life.

"The members of the choir are generally only amateurs, and destitute often of that strong conviction of duty, which is so essential to real improvement.

"Between the verses, you very often hear the organist, in a too light and secular movement, play fragments of opera pieces, and every kind of music, in fact, except solemn organ music; thereby displaying his vanity, and forgetting that the contents of each verse are in close connection, and that, therefore, the interludes—according to every idea of rhetoric—ought to be in full harmony with the sentiment of the words. You may easily imagine how the closing voluntary in most cases is performed: the organist sometimes draws out every stop in his organ, and quite forgetting the place where he is playing, and only thinking of displaying the dexterity of his fingers, performs overtures, grand marches, etc.; and it has sometimes really seemed to me as though he aimed to drown the impression made by a solemn sermon, or as though he wished to express his joy that the sermon was ended. It has reminded me of our military funerals in Europe: while proceeding to the grave, the band will play a very solemn tune, perhaps Beethoven's Funeral March, or the Dead March in Saul; but no sooner is the body deposited in the silent tomb, than drums and fifes are brought into requisition, and in double quick time they countermarch to the tune of the Marsellaise, or one of Labitzky's gallopes, and seem glad that all is over.

* * * * *

"When, on Sundays, I am playing the organ, I do not hear the sweet and hearty voices from the pews! The congregation do not join, as the pious worshippers in my native land did, in the singing of the psalms and hymns. I only hear the three or four voices in the choir; but this cannot inspire me to so high a devotional feeling, as when the voices from a whole worshipping congregation (properly guided and conducted) are in melodious and harmonious accords heard together in solemn hymns of praise and thanks, to the glorious and beneficent God. Here, a few amateur voices are heard, because they are hired to sing; whereas, in my native land, the members of the church and congregation sing; because they came to the house of God for the very purpose of worshipping, and to pay to Him their thanks and praises.

"In the different American collections of psalm and hymn tunes, I often meet with not only bad, and—for the purpose—very improper music, but also with great mistakes against the rules of harmony and thorough base. Yet there are also some few good collections; but they are very little used, and the better they are, the less are they employed; which altogether shows the folly, not to say wickedness, of leaving the arrangements and performances of 'sacred music' in the hands of ignorant and incompetent persons.

"I am sure you will be surprised that Christian churches can be satisfied with this state of things; but I hope better views of this matter are beginning to prevail. The people here, generally, (I really believe,) think good congregational singing impossible. But how wrong this idea, it is unnecessary to tell you. You know, both how practicable and how delightful good congregational singing is.

* * * * *

"Let the church choose and engage as their Organist a pious man, one who has a true sense of religion, and who is a sound and intelligent musician; one who not only can perform with correctness and precision, but can also give the singers the necessary instruction, and be able spiritually to direct them; one who has a regard and love for his office in the church. Such a man will consider the place where he is, and the nature of that God, he serves, and endeavor to conduct himself accordingly. He will, of course, both be active in the church, and sympathize with her wholly. Moreover, he will, in all probability, succeed in training suitable members of the church for an efficient choir, whose independent style of execution will allow him by degrees to lighten and simplify his accompaniment, till the voices shall have a sufficient prominence, and the enunciation become distinct and impressive. And, if, after having succeeded thus far, he would invite all those among the church and congregation who have good voices to meet with him once or twice a week in the church to practise, he would soon have a sufficient number of trained singers to lead the whole congregation. He should then invite them all to assemble in the church to practise: (the weekly meetings could perhaps, for that purpose, be occasionally held in the church.) Let the above mentioned practised singers be stationed in different places in the church; and then, if the same tune were always used to the same psalm or hymn, the whole congregation would, in a short time, be able to sing not only a large number of the best tunes, but to sing them correctly, too.

"Such a delightful state of things might easily be produced, if the churches would awake to the proper discharge of their responsibilities in this matter.

"As to the manner in which music, in my opinion, ought to be regulated during divine service, I would recommend the following. In the opening Voluntary, while the minister is ascending to the pulpit, the Organist should try as far as possible, by some soft and melodious chords, to prepare the congregation for the solemn and holy purpose for which they have met. And then, when the minister is seated, let a good anthem or chant be performed by the choir; but in choosing this, the Organist ought to take great care both in regard to its character, and the effect it will produce upon the congregation; it should be in keeping with the rest of the service, and in every respect be such as will impress and solemnize the minds of those present.

"In giving out the tunes the Organist ought to use such a combination of stops, and, (if the construction of his instrument allow of it,) to arrange them, that the melody may predominate. To accompany well, requires no little experience, even where there is, in other respects, much practical skill; and, in accompanying the choir, the Organist must, as the celebrated Handel and Rink say, "be the guide as to when the music shall begin;" and all should be loud and soft together, and close together, otherwise the harmony will be destroyed, and the ear offended. Nothing can be a greater fault, than when the Organist, by using too loud an organ, overwhelms the voices, instead of swelling and softening his instrument to suit the voices, thus both leading and supporting them. But he should always keep the volume of the Organ a little below that of the voices.

"During the taking up of the collection, some devotional subjects from the works of Handel, Bach, Rink, Mozart or Beethoven, should be played alternately on the swell and choir organ; and sometimes with some of the solo stops, this would be acceptable.

"Finally, as to the concluding voluntary, I think there is so large a field for selection in the masterly fugues of Sebastian Bach, Handel, &c., that an intelligent Organist will have no difficulty in selecting such pieces as are suitable. Once more, I repeat it, let the music never be a contrast to the gravity and solemnity of the place, the occasion, and the services of the House of God."

Antonio Salieri.

To the Editor of the Journal of Music.

DEAR SIR,—I see in the leading article of the last number of your Journal, the statement that Franz Schubert studied dramatic composition with Salieri. Allow me to correct the error; it should be Salieri,—old Salieri,—who died in 1825, at Vienna, after having been in the musical service of the imperial house for fifty-eight years, under Maria Theresa, Joseph, Leopold and Francis. Salieri was born in the Venetian territory, Aug. 19, 1750. He was a little, dark, wide-awake, handsome fellow, full of fun and glee and stories, ready at any moment to fly into a passion, and just as ready to make friends again. But Antonio Salieri is worth a word or two more than I intended to write. He was brought to Vienna, an orphan boy of 16, by Gassmann in 1766, and put to the study of music in the old, strict German manner. Four years afterward Gassmann went to Rome to compose and bring out an Opera, and was detained so long, that the writers of the text to the opera "Le Donne Literate," at Vienna, had to look about for a new composer. Antonio, in the course of his studies, had already composed a mass of music in all styles, and the poets put their verses into his hands to see what he could do. He was delighted with the opportunity, gave day and night to the work with his whole soul, and before a month had passed had perfected two-thirds of it. In this condition, without Salieri's knowledge, a rehearsal of the new opera was appointed, and Gluck and Scarlatti were invited to be present to judge of the music. A hard trial for a twenty-year old composer! All went to more than his heart's content, and soon the little man saw his name on all the street corners of the Austrian Capital as composer of the new opera. From this time his pen was never idle. He composed some forty operas, and an immense quantity of sacred music in all styles; in short, there is hardly a style of composition in which he did not write. Think of over two hundred canons, and similar compositions for two, three and four voices!

Your readers will find in Holmes's "Mozart" something in relation to Salieri. There was a silly story that he poisoned the author of Don Juan and Figaro's Hochzeit, from envy; and so much credence was given to it, that long years after, when he lay on his death bed, he solemnly declared his innocence. Salieri was not only Schubert's teacher in Dramatic composition, but that of the master of all masters, Beethoven. That the latter was an apt pupil, the magnificent work, Fidelio, is sufficient proof. Among the few autographs which I possess and prize highly, is a comic sort of glee or catch, Il Spirito di Contraddizione, signed at the bottom of the page,

THE DUSSELDORF GALLERY will open on Monday next for another season. Lessing's magnificent picture, "The Martyrdom of Huss," has been added, and we learn that a number of new pictures are expected to arrive from Europe in the course of a few weeks.

ARCHILOCHUS was the inventor of ancient dramatic melody, which was similar to modern recitative. This was 724 B. C. In his youth he served in the army, and in his first battle he lost his buckler and saved his life by taking to his heels. He is supposed to have been the inventor of the lyric and some other kinds of poetry.

FLUTE PLAYING. For a long time the flute was only played by poor people, and thought a vulgar instrument and unworthy a freeman, in some parts of Greece. But after the defeat of the Persians, and the introduction of affluence, ease and luxury, it became a disgrace not to be able to play on it. An opposite effect would have been produced in these times.—Bird's Hist. of Music.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

MISS CELINI FAIRFIELD, as will be seen by our advertising columns, will give her first Concert at the Melodeon, this evening. Miss Fairfield's name is not known to our musical public, but we are confident that she will obtain a fair hearing from a Boston audience.

In the list of passengers by the Niagara, which arrived yesterday, we observe the name of Mr. WILLIAM MASON, son of Mr. Lowell Mason, of this city, who has been engaged for several years in Germany in musical studies. Mr. Mason was considered as one of the most promising of our young pianists, and we doubt not that he has turned to good account his three years study under the best European masters of the piano.

THE MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY gave its first public rehearsal on Friday of last week. George S. Hillard, Esq., at the request of the Government, and in behalf of the Council of Advice, read the usual annual statement of the plans, prospects and conditions of the Society. He spoke of the disastrous loss sustained by the destruction of the Library in the burning of the Tremont Temple, and made mention of the donations to the new Library just received from Mr. PERKINS, whose name he said should never be named before a Boston musical audience without an expression of gratitude and respect. Mr. Hillard also made an appropriate notice of the liberality of Mme. GOLDSCHMIDT. He endeavored to impress on his hearers the fact which does not seem to be sufficiently understood, that artists must live. That if the painter paints what no one wishes to see, his occupation is gone; and that the musician must have hearers, appreciating, attentive hearers, who shall reward his efforts. Mr. Hillard's remarks were listened to with much attention, and we regret that we are unable to give our readers a fuller sketch of them. The orchestra played among other things, Caraffa's overture to Masaniello, and the Andante from Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. A considerable improvement is to be noticed in the performance of the music, attributable, we have no doubt, to the new system of private rehearsals. The advertisement of the Society will be found in another column.

THE GERMANIA SERENADE BAND, on account of the storm on Wednesday afternoon, had but a very small audience, not sufficient, we should think, to pay the door-keeper; so that it was judged best to postpone the Concert to Wednesday next, when the programme prepared for last Wednesday, will be performed, and when we hope to see an audience that shall at least remunerate the Band for their services. An orchestra like this should not be neglected by our musical people. It is made up from musicians living among us, and equal in talent to any who come here from abroad. We hope that these delightful Concerts are not to be given to empty benches, and that the members of the Band are not to find themselves absolutely out of pocket by their meritorious undertaking.

Mlle. LEHMANN. We find in a New York paper the following additional particulars about Mlle. Lehmann.

"She is expected to arrive at Boston, in the next steamer. She will make her first appearance in New York, about the middle of October, when we shall be most happy to record her success. Gade, the distinguished composer, expresses unqualified admiration of her school, and more especially of her voice, which is a mezzo-soprano of great compass, (reaching from F in the bass to C in alt, a distance of two octaves and a fifth,) of a rich tone, and of the most sympathetic quality. She is yet very young, being but twenty-two, has rather a handsome, prepossessing face, and a fine figure; in fact, she has all the physical and mental qualities to constitute a great and popular artist. The Mendelssohn Quartet Club is a most meritorious association; and we hope their visit to New York will be crowned with deserved success."

THE MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY commenced its rehearsals September 13th, at Cochituate Hall. Mr. Mason and Mr. Webb have still the supervision of affairs, and Mr. Mueller has been engaged as organist and pianist. The Society will give three oratorios, if sufficient encouragement is extended, during the season.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY have also commenced their rehearsals, and we learn that Mr. Mueller, well known here a few years ago as one of our best organists, has also been engaged by this Society as organist. The Handel and Haydn Society have engaged the New Music Hall for their performances.

MUSICAL CONVENTIONS.—The Penobscot Convention meets at Bangor on 21st of September; the Niagara Convention at Lockport, N. Y., on the 28th; the Maine State Convention at Windthrop, on 5th of October, and the Worcester County Convention at Warren, Mass., on Tuesday the 12th of October. Prof. B. F. Baker will take charge of all these Conventions, and will be assisted by Miss Bond (his pupil), and by Mr. Southard. Prof. W. B. Bradbury will assist at the Penobscot Convention.

The Musical Convention under the direction of Messrs. Johnson and Cutler, recently assembled at Le Roy, N. Y., closed its session this year with a sacred concert on the 9th, consisting of selections from the Creation, David, and other Oratorios. A full audience was in attendance.

New York.

The Musical World speaks thus of the monster brass band concert: "The pieces performed by the united bands were, as compositions, weak, unsuited to so grand an occasion and far inferior to the solo performances of the separate bands: even the march of the great Meyerbeer from the Prophète can be made no exception to this. As a general thing the drums were, throughout, too lavish of their clamor. If called upon to give the preference to any one of the bands present, either for skilful performance, or superior selection of pieces, we should give the palm to the 'Seventh Regiment Band,' which received the warmest applause, and, in fact, proved itself the ablest of all. This superiority was owing in part to the structure of the band, being composed of reed instruments, such as Oboes, Clarinets, Piccolo, &c.; and brass instruments, such as horns and trombones with sliding pipes,—instruments, which, we regret to see, are generally excluded from New York bands."

The same criticism on the structure of the bands applies here to our Boston military bands. We hear nothing but sounding brass and tinkling cymbals and look back with many regrets to the old Brigade Band as it was, when composed of reed instruments.

The Tribune speaks thus of ALBONI's last concerts:

"Madame Alboni is generous of her favors; we had no less than six pieces from her last evening, from the highest gems of German opera to the plain, sweet melody of an English romance. Rossini contributed the terzetto, Ah! qual colpo, with the pretty allegro, Zitti, zitti, which was neatly and expressively rendered.—From Donizetti, she borrowed a share in the duet in Don Giovanni, Signorina, tu tanta petta, and though a severe critic might have complained of her want of animation, her style was as good as usual, and her vocalization perfect. Mozart furnished Batti, batti, from Don Giovanni—so delicious in its touching simplicity and soul-stirring melody—so soft in its chords—so deep in its meaning. As her voice gradually fell to a whisper, and the room was hushed to catch every syllable, it was impossible to drive out of one's memory the hacknied lines:

"Her's is the lay that lightly floats,
And her's are the morn'ring, dying notes,
That gently fall like snow in the sea,
And melt in the heart as instantly!"

"We are inclined to think that Madame Alboni left a less lasting impression on her hearers at her last than at any of her previous concerts. Not that her programme was selected with less care, her songs executed with less science, or her voice less pure, less thrilling than usual. But the aim of the popular favorite ought always to be to leave the greatest triumph to the last moment; to lead the spectator gradually, step by step, from delight to delight, and finally to dismiss him with the richest, noblest notes of the artist fresh ringing in his ear. Thus, in our opinion, the Brindisi, or the Ah! non Giunge ought to have been the finale of the Concert, instead of the song from Betty, which, though lively, and pleasant to listen to, cannot reach our inward soul like the others. . . .

"A little duet from Ernani, was coldly received by the audience. She smiled, and after a moment's breathing time returned with the Il segreto per esser felici in her hand. It is impossible to describe the sensation which this song created. The audience forgot the fatigue of the songstress, peremptorily silenced the chorus, and kept up a deafening din until Mme. Alboni had complied with their request for an encore. We consider the Brindisi from Lucrezia one of Mme. Alboni's greatest triumphs. She sings it with more spirit than the other opera airs, and is not less dazzling in her shakes, runs, ornaments, and notes sostenuti, than in the Non più Mesta. In London, Il Segreto was pronounced her best song."

The first Concert of Madame SONTAG will take place on the 20th inst. In addition to the artists who accompanied her from Europe, and to a grand orchestra, she has engaged the choristers of the Italian Opera, whose assistance will add another feature to the perfection of her Concerts.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—M. Jullien's new opera, Pietro il Grande, was represented for the third time on Saturday night. The music improves on closer acquaintance—a strong testimony in its favor. In noticing the first performance, we felt it our duty to criticise it in several particulars, while in others it was our more agreeable task to bestow unqualified praise. Its undue length was condemned, and considerable abridgement recommended. M. Jullien—with all his musical talent, not too conceited to profit by good counsel—has shortened the duration of his opera by nearly one hour, and greatly enhanced its attraction. The diffuseness of which we had to complain has vanished, the effects come closer together, the interest is more uniformly sustained, and the drama and the music are equally gainers. By curtailing the ritornellas and omitting the repeats in some of the airs and choruses, by compressing the ballet where it was too much spun out, and by reducing the concerted music, M. Jullien has brought his opera within reasonable limits. The second performance was an improvement on the first, and the third on the second.

Pietro il Grande, with all its failings, is a work of more than common merit. It is M. Jullien's first opera, and few first operas have held out better promise of the future. The "noise" objected to on the first representation was chiefly confined to the second act, and by the omission of the battle scene, has sensibly diminished. The first and third acts can scarcely be distasteful to ears "classical" and polite, on the same pretext, since they are freer from noise than many well-known operas against which no such exception has ever been taken. There is, to speak faithfully, much to admire in Pietro il Grande.—The Times, Aug. 23.

Punch, in a critique on Pietro il Grande, discourses after this manner on Jullien's new opera:

"There is no doubt but Jullien's Opera has made a great noise in the musical world. In fact, so great was the noise, that we determined upon keeping away. All the reports we heard were those of thunder. It did not contain an air but what there was thunder in it—and thunder, too, of the loudest description. Jullien, we were told, was a sort of Jupiter Tonans, who for five hours kept flinging his musical thunderbolts about in all directions. It was certain deafness for life to go near him.

"Preparing for the worst, however, we stuffed our pockets full of wool. We listened to the first Act, and were charmed. There is a chorus in it that is as fresh as anything Auber ever wrote. There is some dancing music that makes you long to rush upon the stage, and join in it. There is a little noise in the act, but not sufficient to wake a child. We had no occasion to draw upon the friendly aid of our ear-protector.

"The Second Act contains a little more thunder; but when we say that it is loaded full of war—as full as a cannon—perhaps the thundering accompaniment may not be, in a musical measure, altogether out of place. Peter has to dictate the plan of his campaign. A series of flutes are not the best instruments to interpret such a martial subject. Then he has to address his troops, and urge them on to glory. This could scarcely be done through the soft medium of a piccolo. After this follows the Battle of Pultawa. Well, a battle was never won yet to the inspiring sound of a penny whistle, and so we must not blame Jullien too harshly if he has sent three military brass bands to follow the Russian army to 'Victory or Death.' It is not every battle, like the Battle of Prague, that is fought on a cottage piano! But, after all, the thunder is very quiet: what our brother Yankees would call 'battered thunder.' Compared to thunders we have heard in other operas, it is as soft as one of MARIO's serenades. For instance, it is as mild as milk, or a cigar, compared to the thunder that kept roaring, clap after clap (although none of them came from the audience), in M. Halévy's Tempest: we confess that once or twice we were a little stunned, but still our wool was no more exhausted than our patience."

Italy.

ROME.—"The musical world here," says a letter from Rome, "has been much taken up with an entirely new production, consisting of a triple oratorio, entitled 'Potiphar, Joseph and Jacob.' Each of these parts is first performed singly, and afterwards all three together, executed by four hundred performers, forming a monster concerted piece of great power—three lyric dramas in one! The composer is the Chevalier Pietro Raimondi, of Rome; and his success, notwithstanding the heat of the weather, has been unexampled, so that his name is fully established in the annals of musical fame—the first of Rome being considered conclusive in these matters."

The Germania Musical Society

RESPECTFULLY announce to their numerous friends, and the public in general, that it is their intention to remain the coming winter in the city of Boston for the purpose of giving, during this period, a series of TEN CONCERTS, (one Concert every two weeks,) like those given by them during the last winter, in this city, at which they will produce the masterworks of BEETHOVEN, MOZART, HAYDN, MENDELSSOHN, SPOHR, MEYERBEER, ROSSINI, &c., such as Symphonies, Overtures, Quartets, Quintets, and selections from the Italian and German Operas, Solos on almost every instrument used in their Orchestra, and a judicious portion of lighter music.

They are constantly adding to their already large Catalogue of choice Instrumental Music, the latest publications, by which they are now enabled to furnish entire new programmes for every Concert, and mostly of such pieces as have never before been performed in this city.

The best vocal talent available will be engaged for the Concerts. MR. ALFRED JAEHL, the celebrated and unrivalled Pianist, will perform at all of our Concerts for the whole season. The Concerts will be given at the splendid NEW MUSIC HALL, entrance on Winter street and Bumstead place.

A package containing Thirty Tickets, to be transferable, and be used at any of the Ten Subscription Concerts, $10. Half Packages, Fifteen Tickets, $5.

Subscription Lists to be found at the Hotels and Music Stores.

THIRD EDITION, NOW READY,
OF THE

Translation of MARX'S GREAT WORK on MUSICAL COMPOSITION.

THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF MUSICAL COMPOSITION, of Dr. A. B. MARX, of Berlin, is celebrated as the MASTER TREATISE on this subject, and its enumeration of its merits seems superfluous. Competent judges are unanimous in bestowing the highest praise on the manner in which Mr. SARONI has translated the original. The publishers have received strong testimonials of approbation from Messrs. Scharfenberg, Willis, Root, Bradbury, and Jackson, of New York; Messrs. Webb and Kreissman, of Boston, and other distinguished teachers and professors; and the following extract from a letter, recently received, will show in what estimation the translation is held by Dr. MARX, the distinguished author of the original.

BERLIN, June 23d, 1882

GENTLEMEN,—Your polite communication and the copy of a translation of my work on Musical Composition, have been duly received, for which accept my warmest thanks. ***
I find that your translator (as far as I am able to judge from a somewhat imperfect acquaintance with the English language) has done his work very practically and successfully; and I beg you to express to him, as also to the eminent men who have honored my work with their approval, my sincerest thanks; and also yourselves to accept the same for the very elegant style of the edition. ***

The present volume comprises all that portion of the original work which it was supposed would be at all adapted to the wants of this country, and embraces two of the German books, viz.: The Elements of Musical Composition, and the Harmonization of a Melody, including Chorals and Popular Songs.
The rapid sale of two editions has proved its adaptation to the wants of our musical teachers and students. It forms an elegant octavo volume, in cloth.
